The center of the Western world is Washington. A sound relationship with that center is the key to a good international policy. A formula will therefore have to be found which suits Spanish interests, as Mr Gonzalez interprets them, and U.S. interests, as Mr Reagan interprets them. The formula, which is certainly not easy; must be found and is essential.

If the bilateral treaty between Spain and the United States must be modified more radically to achieve this, let it be modified. If in order to achieve this, NATO must be considered by looking at Gibraltar and weighing up what can be achieved in a matter to which Felipe Gonzalez referred on the very night of the election victory, let this new perspective be adopted. The opening of the gate has already been spoken of as a Spanish initiative which will help unblock the situation and satisfy the inhabitants of the area.

The mere policy of waiting, postponement and ignoring the issue of NATO and the promised referendum does not seem to be the best in this instance. In order not to float dangerously in an ambiguous no-man's-land, Spain must begin its next legislative term by firmly tying up the loose ends of our relationship -- adjusted, of course, to a new majority's style and aims -- with the center of the world to which we belong, which is Washington.

AFTENPOSTEN VIEWS STATE OF U.S.-USSR DETENTE

PM301541 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 26 Nov 82 p 2

[Editorial: "For and Against Detente"]

[Text] There were some hints of a conciliatory tone in the speeches President Reagan and new Soviet leader Yuriy Andropov made at the beginning of the week, but otherwise there was little which was fundamentally new in what the two superpower leaders had to say. Andropov spoke in encouraging terms about the importance of detente and called it "the politics of the future," but he stressed at the same time, that the Soviet Union's military strength must be maintained and that the Soviet Union will not pay for detente and a normalization of relations with the United States with a compliant approach.

In his turn President Reagan said that he had sent proposals to Andropov for a series of measures to strengthen mutual confidence between the two superpowers. The proposals include improvement of the so-called "hot line" (the direct telephone link) between Washington and Moscow, and advance warning by both powers of all future missile test launches. In almost the same breath the U.S. President announced, however, that he had reached a decision on the deployment of the new intercontinental MX missiles. Ond hundred of these missiles will -- if Congress grants its approval -- be deployed in a large "pack" of subterranean silos in the western United States.

The MX missiles have long been the subject of discussion in the United States, and the arguments have chiefly revolved around how the missiles are to be deployed. Over the years a total of almost 30 different possibilities have been aired -- from having the missiles hover like satellites in space to spreading them "randomly" in the seabed of the world's oceans. After lengthy consideration, President Jimmy Carter decided to deploy the 200 missiles -- the number then being talked about -- in a total of 4,600 silos distributed across large areas of Nevada and Utah. The idea was that the missiles would be moved from silo to silo at irregular intervals, so that the Soviet Union would never be able to be sure exactly where they were.

At the time Reagan launched a tough attack on this plan, and came to power on a platform which included scrapping it, but also finding a better and safer method of deploying the missiles. In itself therefore, the President's decision on deployment can hardly have come as surprise for the Soviet leaders, even though it is questionable to what extent the solution chosen by Reagan, which will involve the construction of new siloes is in agreement with the still unratified SALT II Treaty.

Since the power handover in the Kremlin there have been noises of a cautiously conciliatory nature from both Washington and Moscow. The two superpowers have been testing each other's strength, and their leaders have spoken positively of detente on the one hand, and reflected attitudes which have little to do with detente on the other. Perhaps both Reagan's and Andropov's speeches should be seen against this background.

DEFENSE MINISTER RESIGNS, REPLACED BY THUNBORG

[Text] The minister of defense, Boerje Andersson, has resigned after barely 2 months as minister. Boerje Andersson says he is resigning because he does not like living in Stockholm; he misses his home and family in Borlaenge.

The new defense minister will be Anders Thunborg, who is Sweden's ambassador to the UN. He will take up the post of defense minister after the new year. Until then the minister of communications, Curt Bostroem, will deal with defense matters.[Paris AFP in English at 2125 GMT on 1 December in a similar report adds: "Replacing him [Andersson] is Sweden's representative to the United Nations, Anders Thunborg, aged 48, a former secretary of state for defence. Until his appointment last October following the Social Democratic election victory, Mr Anderson's political experience had been entirely in local government"]

DAGENS NYHETER ON MX DECISION, SOVIET REACTION

PM301355 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Sweden 24 Nov 82 p 2

[Olof Santesson editorial: "Reagan's 'Peacekeepers'"]

[Text] The disarmament issue is now reaching breaking point. If Ronald Reagan gets his way during the second half of the eighties, the United States will train a new type of land-based nuclear missile on the Soviet Union.

We can only expect that the leadership in the Kremlin will adopt countermeasures. A new wave of rearmament could sweep over us despite the oppposition of self-preservation which the peace movements are attempting to offer to our age's greatest lunacy.

In his speech to the nation on Monday evening, the U.S. President of course, gave a completely different picture of what is at stake. Pendantically, with many red and blue diagrams, Reagan contrasted Soviet rearmament with the absence of a U.S. program. The United States needs the new MX missile -- which Reagan calls the "peacekeeper" -- to persuade the Soviet Union to agree to mutual disarmament. It is not the first time that Reagan has justified U.S. rearmament in this way and he is not the first to do so. Unfortunately there is something in the argument. Compulsion plays a major role in persuading the superpowers to negotiate with each other.

By speaking of "the Vietnam veterans who have come home to the United States' heart" in the context of the inauguration of a monument in Washington, Ronald Reagan tried to strike a note of national unity. In a way that only Americans can appreciate, he described the United States as a nation apart, placed between two oceans by some "divine plan." He wants to allay the fears of a nuclear war, especially those among schoolchildren, with his "strategy for peace."

In objective terms Reagan made some excellent proposals: The exchange between the superpowers of basic new information about their nuclear forces, advance warning of nuclear tests, and attempts to further improve the hot line.

Unfortunately Reagan also wants his new weapons. A controversial project, this MX, since the first plans for a sytem of 4,600 launching sites for 200 missiles. The President has finally decided on deploying 100 missiles in a relatively confined area. The idea is that potential attacking Soviet nuclear warheads would create problems for each other (fratricide).

The idea here strikes many people as dubious. Despite some welcome in the state of Wyoming, where Reagan said the MX will be deployed, the President has little support for his plan. It is by no means certain that he will get his bill for funds for the project through Congress. He is bound to meet with even tougher opposition from the new Congress.

On the whole the mood in favor of continued rearmament in the United States has faded as economic problems have become more noticeable. The growing movement in favor of a nuclear arms freeze, which wants to halt the production of all new nuclear arms, bears witness to a deep distrust of both superpowers' deterrent policies.

The U.S. President has proposed to the Soviet Union a one-third reduction in the number of nuclear warheads. He is advocating a zero solution for NATO in return for the Soviet Union's dismantling of all of its missiles. Attention in the West however, has been directed more at alarmingly careless statements by the Reagan administration on the stated possibility of the United States' waging limited or long-term nuclear wars -- and "gaining the upper hand."

This controversial directive for a 5-year plan for U.S. defenses has been described by worried U.S. researchers as "almost a declaration of war." Columnist Tom Wicker has spoken of "war to the death," while Soviet U.S. expert Georgiy Arbatov calls it "guidelines for total war." Nor does it much help when U.S. spokesmen stress that the foundation of U.S. nuclear thinking is still deterrence.

There are also many people in the Western camp who suspect that the White House is actually trying to break the Soviet Union economically by raising the arms race to ever higher levels. The trial of strength in Norway revolving around appropriations for preparations for the possible deployment on the continent of new nuclear arms and the controversy in Denmark surrounding a UN proposal for a nuclear arsenal freeze are fresh warnings that Reagan runs the risk of putting too much pressure on NATO cohesion.

Moscow's initial reaction to Reagan's decision on the MX was critical as expected. There is a risk that new Soviet leader Yuriy Andropov, who has so far been cautious in his wait-and-see approach to the United States, will see the MX as more of a threat to Soviet nuclear arms installations and a challange to his own, naturally fragile prestige than as a call to compromises.

It is difficult to see how Ronald Reagan could make the United States and the Western bloc safer with his new missile. On the contrary, there is every danger that insecurity in the world will increase.

PAPANDREOU INTERVIEWED ON FIRST YEAR'S RECORD

DW301142 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 29 Nov 82 pp 146-164

[Interview with Greek Premier Andreas Papandreou by SPIEGEL editors Mareike Spiess-Hohnoltz, Heinz P. Lohfeldt and Istas Tsatsaronis at "Astir Palace" Hotel near Athens -- date not given]

SPIEGEL: A year ago, Mr Prime Minister, you promised the Greeks "allaghi," the "big chance," and thereby you won a triumphant election victory. But when looking around in Greece today, nothing much of a change, let alone a "big change" can be seen.

Papandreou: My aides and I myself are absolutely satisfied with the change that occurred during the past 12 months. But, of course, we all would prefer to announce to the Greek people that socialism promised by "PASOK," our Pan-Hellenic Socialist Movement, had already been implemented. The time factor, however, must not be underrated. During these 12 months we have made considerable headway and taken positive steps in various fields, as, for instance, in foreign policy, in public administration, in education, social welfare, in the economy, in justice, and in other fields.

SPIEGEL: Seen from abroad, it rather looks as though the change becomes manifest above all in your efforts at dissociating yourself gradually from your radical election campaign slogans. Just let us take, for instance, foreign policy and NATO. It is only a short while ago that you were determined to pull your country out of the alliance, that you were grumbling: "What kind of an alliance is this, what is Greece's business to be there: He who has friends like these doesn't need enemies:" What is heard and seen from you now looks much more pragmatic and realistic.

Papandreou: Greece does not want to belong to any military bloc at all and consequently also does not want to belong to NATO. But any step taken by us in the field of foreign policy must take our security, independence and national integrity into account.

SPIEGEL: You ought to define this somewhat more precisely.

Papandreou: As you know, our relationship with NATO is different from that of other alliance members: For 7 years NATO has supported a dictatorship in Greece; NATO approved Turkey's invasion of Cyprus as well as the occupation of 36.4 percent of Cyprus territory by Turkey....

SPIEGEL: ... And NATO refuses to guarantee your eastern border with Turkey -- which, after all, is a NATO country and not a member of the Warsaw Pact. But contrary to your announcement, you have not taken any steps to terminate your country's NATO membership.

Papandreou: At present Greece's role within the NATO military alliance is limited in a like manner, as it is vague.

SPIEGEL: Originally you intended to have the hitherto unpublished Rogers agreement on Greece's military reunification with NATO declared null and void by Parliament. This apparently is out of the question now, just like the ultimatum you wanted to deliver to the United States on the closure of its bases in Greece. Instead you are now negotiating with Washington.

Papandreou: I have stated time and again and I repeat it once again now: The existence of foreign bases on our territory constitutes a curtailment of our national independence and sovereignty.

SPIEGEL: What actually is it that you are negotiating? Is it the price the Americans are to pay for a prolongation of their permit to stay?

Papandreou: I wouldn't call it a "price." These bases are of no importance for the protection of Greek territory in the event of a local conflict and they also do not form part of NATO and -- with the exception of "Sudas Bay," the U.S. base on Crete, where the 6th U.S. Fleet is supplied, which on the one hand is attached to NATO and on the other is under the U.S. command -- it is a bilateral treaty that matters.

Just to make it absolutely plain: The bases are serving strategic interests of the United States that started on 27 October has one objective only, namely to agree upon a timetable for the closure of these bases and to fix the conditions for their operation until then. We do not determine this unilaterally; we will try to settle the matter, if possible, through an agreement. But one thing is absolutely clear; if the negotiations do not achieve any positive results in a period of time still to be determined, then the bases must disappear.

SPIEGEL: What are the conditions under which the U.S. bases will be allowed to exist for a certain while?

Papandreou: I do not want to elaborate, because we find ourselves in the midst of negotiations. But, at any rate, there exist two substantial conditions: First, the bases must not harm our national defense and security; and second, no actions against any of our neighbors, particularly against those adjoining the Mediterranean, with whom we maintain close diplomatic, economic and political relations, must come from them.

SPIEGEL: Once again; what do the Americans have to pay for a prolongation of their permit to stay? Indications are that a contribution of 1 billion is at stake.

Papandreou: There is no question of a leasing fee as in the case of Spain. What matters in our case is national security and this must be seen quite practically. This means that what matters to me is not a vague statement by the United States saying, for instance, that it is against any clashes in the Aegean Sea. This would not be of any worth to us.

SPIEGEL: It would be different, though, if the United States would give a binding guarantee for your eastern border?

Papandreou: A binding guarantee would require a treaty between Greece and the United States which would have to be ratified by Congress. One might speculate about it, but this is not realistic. Arms deliveries are much more realistic.

SPIEGEL: And, of course, the latest achievements in arms technology

Papandreou: The more modern the better -- for example, a few AWACS...

SPIEGEL: ...So that you could better keep an eye on your neighbor and NATO partner Turkey? This leads us to another case of rhetoric before the elections and pragmatism thereafter; just a year ago you still refused even talking to Ankara. Now, in July, you agreed with Turkey on a moratorium, the foreign ministers are talking with each other and the opposition here in Greece already charges you with hushing up violations of the Greek air space by Turkey, for instance.

Papandreou: Oh, come on, that is a lie -- we always announce such things. Besides, I made it clear to the Turks from the very outset that we will not exchange a single word or have any discussion before all provocative statements cease. We don't go to the negotiating table under pressure or duress.

SPIEGEL: And the Turks fulfilled these demands?

Papandreou: We are convinced that there have only been negligible transgressions since July. And when we protested against them, the Turks reassured us that it must be our mistake, that we read the radar screens wrong.

I don't consider these to be incidents worth mentioning, I believe that Turkey has kept its word.

SPIEGEL: Will peace commence now after decades of hostility, between a socialist government in Greece and a military regime in Turkey?

Papandreou: Just a moment. The foreign ministers will be meeting again on 9 December, and it will depend on this meeting whether a dialogue will materialize at all [SPIEGEL footnote: Last Wednesday the situation intensified again; Athens accused Turkey of a serious violation of its air space; the foreign ministers meeting seems to be called in question]. What matters to us is that the framework for such a dialogue will be set forth at this meeting. We sincerely wish to restore a relationship of friendship and cooperation with Turkey. But it goes without saying that you just don't begin a dialogue or open any negotiations if all that is involved is what you yourself are prepared to give. Dialogue, negotiations make sense only if both sides profit, the Latin expression for this being "quid pro quo."

SPIEGEL: You give something but want to get something in return.

Papandreou: Yes, I can't waive that. Greece does not raise any claims on Turkey, but neither are we prepared, on the other hand, to make concessions at the expense of our national territory and our rights which are moored in international treaties and agreements.

SPIEGEL: When Greece was at stake in the early seventies and the military junta was in power here in Athens, you did everything to convince the European governments "that the existence of a dictatorship in Europe not only represents a danger for the nation affected but also jeopardizes democracy in Europe at large." Is this statement still applicable today?

Papandreou: You know, I don't wish to provoke Turkey at this particular time. You must understand that we have considerable differences of opinion. We hope that this region will remain peaceful, we wish to avoid war. And we agreed in the moratorium to desist from any provocative utterances by the Turks about us and on our part about the Turks. But as far as the principle is concerned, I absolutely stand by what I said at the time, absolutely.

SPIEGEL: Will we be seeing Andreas Papandreou again soon as the southeast European As-Sadat who takes a trip to Ankara for the cause of peace?

Papandreou: I must decidedly reject any linkage of my name to As-Sadat, because unfortunately I consider him a politician whom I wouldn't want to emulate under any circumstances.

SPIEGEL: Would you rather be linked up with Libya's Muammar al-Qadhdhafi for whose visit to Greece you long so much? Or with PLO boss Yasir 'Arafat whom you welcomed so enthusiastically that the mockery already made the rounds in Athens that Greece is the only Arab state which really helped the PLO?

Papandreou: It is not just because of its geographical location that Greece is linked with the Arab peoples by a long, historical friendship. No doubt we are closer to them than are other European countries. And we deem it absolutely necessary for the community of nations to exert every conceivable pressure to clear the road for peace in the Middle East.

SPIEGEL: Do you have any new and concrete ideas of how a peaceful solution might be attained?

Papandreou: Well, surely the Reagan plan and the charter of the Arab summit are positive steps on this road. Yet there can be just and durable peace in this region only if the national rights of the Palestinian people, especially its right to an independent state of its own, and Israel's security within its former borders are recognized.

SPIEGEL: And Greece could make a contribution to it?

Papandreou: Our relations with the Arab peoples and beyond this to the countries of the so-called Third World form part of our independent, multidimensional foreign policy. This also includes our strong support to the national liberation movements and peoples in the Third World who struggle against dictatorships.

SPIEGEL: What kind of support is this? With 4,000 marks each per month, just as your PAK liberation movement once was supported by the German Social Democrats?

Papandreou: We render diplomatic support and thus build a bridge between the PLO and West Europe.

SPIEGEL: One could not help feeling, Mr Prime Minister, that your friendly attitude toward the Arabs is also aimed at closer economic ties, towards Arab investments in and long-term credits for Greece, because the economy by no means is in such a good state as the Greeks would have expected from the government of a former economics professor.

Papandreou: I have not promised any miracles.

SPIEGEL: No, but many Greeks have taken you for an economic magician and they expected miracles.

Papandreou: I can only tell you that our economic policy for 1982 will entail satisfactory results.

SPIEGEL: Really?

Papandreou: Yes. When we took office the inflation rate amounted to roughly 25 percent. This year it will be close to 20 percent. In 1983 it will decrease to 15 percent and in 1984 we should be in a position to attain the same level as the Western countries.

SPIEGEL: But in all probability you then will have equality also in the field of unemployment. In the past you have had not many problems in this respect, but meanwhile unemployment already is nearing the 10 percent mark.

Papandreou: Yes, unemployment is becoming a problem in our country as well. But we are making efforts to keep it under control so it will not assume disquieting dimensions.

SPIEGEL: How do you seek to manage it? Your partners in the West certainly would be pleased if you were to offer them a patent solution.

Papandreou: In our country it is, above all, young people, women and unskilled workers who are hit by unemployment. This is why we have launched a program for creating 20,000 new jobs for people below the age of 30, and we also take over part of the employment costs. In addition, there are plans for retraining programs, and, to be sure, we also expect positive results from our efforts in the agricultural sector, where we are trying to keep the people at their rural place of work so as to curtail the rural exodus which brings additional pressure to bear on the urban labor market.

SPIEGEL: Don't the problems in Greece considerably differ from those in the highly industrialized countries of the West?

Papandreou: Not at all, for our predecessors have left us nothing but scorched earth and with this I mean, above all, the economic mud we inherited.

SPIEGEL: This sounds familiar, it is the reproach made right now in the Federal Republic, too -- by the rightists vis-a-vis the leftists.

Papandreou: I believe that there has never been a more irresponsible government than that of Mr Rallis, our immediate predecessor. It has bestowed upon Greece a deficit of historical dimensions. For the first time in our history the deficit in the public sector amounted to more than 12 million marks. The most important task now is to cut down this deficit.

SPIEGEL: What is its level now?

Papandreou: I think that we were quite successful also in this respect, even if we have not been as successful as we would have liked. As to the purely administrative budget -- which does not include the overall public sector, that is to say not the state enterprises, public transportation, supply enterprises and so forth -- we can submit something unique to Parliament; our expenses are in keeping with the budget estimates.

SPIEGEL: This is quite remarkable.

Papandreou: Indeed, and, above all, at this period of time. Moreover, the deficit in our balance of payments will decrease by $500 million, meaning from $2.5 billion to $2 billion.

SPIEGEL: But this actually is also attributable to the fact that you receive roughly $1 billion annually from the EC -- the Community you could not stomach at all not too long ago.

Papandreou: We have not received that much. There is no question that we will receive something this year. But it is difficult to assess correctly the influence brought to bear by the EC, because there are many aspects involved. One of them is the purely budgetary aspect -- meaning how much one has to pay and how much one receives. This is an absolutely positive aspect.

SPIEGEL: So the EC does have its good sides.

Papandreou: What if the other aspect pertains to the effects on the industrial production and thus on the balance of payments, in other words, to the development of the economy; and there it doesn't work so well. From the very day of our accession the Greek trade balance with the EC dramatically worsened.

SPIEGEL: Do you still believe -- as you declared in a SPIEGEL interview shortly before the 1981 elections -- that Greece should be "neither an EC member nor associated with the EC; Greece should conclude a special agreement; and do you still want to hold a referendum on Greece's EC membership?

Papandreou: As you know we asked the EC for special arrangements which would take Greece's special situation into account. Otherwise, a country like Greece having a comparably low per-capita income cannot properly plan and pursue its agricultural, industrial, economic and social development. The Community displayed great interest and is respective to talks. The talks are in progress, and this is why I don't wish to go into further details.

SPIEGEL: But it is a fact that industrial production is not so much impaired by the EC, as you contended, but in all probability much more by your plans to nationalize large sectors of the Greek economy. How can you expect foreign investments to flow into your country under these circumstances?

Papandreou: The state as a producer bears a growing social responsibility for just a few albeit important sectors, namely, in national security and in the health sector. Supervisory boards will take over the control in other important sectors, boards which will be made up of representatives of the employers, the employees, the local self-government and the state.

SPIEGEL: That's your famous "third road" to socialism which, however, originally ruled out the private sector.

Papandreou: Since there is democratic planning the flow of information is better so that the private companies are well informed about the needs of the state and the future economic course, which again creates incentives for investments. Naturally we welcome any foreign investment if it benefits the investor and our economy. Naturally we especially welcome investments which bring technology into the country and allow a high level of domestic value to be added.

SPIEGEL: Mr Prime Minister, taking a look at the European countries which most recently elected socialist governments, we cannot but find that in these days even socialism doesn't have more to offer than the appeal to tighten the belt. You yourself warned your compatriots against "unjustified price hikes" and "inappropriate demands." Things don't look much better in the France of Francois Mitterrand. Similar appeals can be heard from Sweden's Palme, and surely they will soon be heard from Felipe Gonzalez in Spain as well. Is this attributable to the fact that things appear to be entirely different once one is in power?

Papandreou: I will not deny that. The objective compulsions narrow you down; they are obstructive, to be sure. This applies to Gonzalez who has different problems than I have, but he does have problems. And this also holds true for Mitterrand who is confronted in France with a highly capitalistic establishment.

SPIEGEL: How does a person feel if he cannot live up to his promissory slogans, if he must compromise and pragmatically approach the respective current problems?

Papandreou: What is decisive, after all, is to have a vision, to visualize a goal. How quickly this goal is achieved depends very much on the historical conditions in which one is moving....

SPIEGEL: ... Which now don't look all too promising, however.

Papandreou: I can't promise any miracles; all I can say is this: These are my concepts of value, these are my objectives, this is my credo, and I must tackle this in such a way that I will not expose Greece and the Greek people to any adventures. If I should expose the Greeks to any adventures I would not stand a chance of ever reaching these goals.

SPIEGEL: But aren't you afraid that the people will confront you with your slogans, take you at your word and expect the fulfillment of all the promises we are discussing here?

Papandreou: We are a young party, we just got organized in 1974, and a party needs an identity so that the people will know what the talk is all about. This needs to be hammered home, and not just in the initial phase but over and over again. And this identity must be something unimpeachable, regardless of the tactics which are applied to attain one's goal.

SPIEGEL: One of these goals -- you repeated it just recently after the local elections -- is the establishment of a "free and democratic society." Does this mean that Greece was not free and democratic under your direct predecessor?

Papandreou: Have we emerged from a dictatorship? No, we came to power through free elections. In 1974 it was Karamanlis' feat, and we recognize this feat. But definitely much in the Greek society violated what I would like to term the real functioning of democratic processes. There were Greeks who had all possible privileges, and others who had none. Then you can hardly speak of a really democratic regime. This is why we deepen democracy and enhance it as quickly as possible.

SPIEGEL: And Konstantin Karamanlis, who meanwhile is Greece's president, is going along with what you call "deepening" and "enhancing" democracy?

Papandreou: I can describe my relationship with the president only with one word, and that word is "optimal." He exemplarily exercises his constitutional rights, and this is a valuable contribution to the consolidation of our democracy and to a climate of mildness and calm urgently needed by our country.

SPIEGEL: If you talk about "deepening democracy" we cannot but confront you with the growing criticism of the inadequate democracy within your own party. You are accused of leading the party nearly autocratically, and comparisons are being made between the leadership of your movement and the former National-Socialist one in Germany. There has not been a single party congress since the founding of PASOK in 1974, you have never been elected chairman of your party.

Papandreou: I must reject the charge that my party is undemocratic. I certainly would like to know which party in Greece is more democratic. Perhaps the communists, or the right? They shouldn't throw any stones, sitting in glass houses. But I can reassure you that we will be holding a party congress in 1983. I have committed myself to that. And this party congress will also elect a chairman.

SPIEGEL: Do you believe that the new -- and old -- PASOK chief will be able to continue this unorthodox foreign policy toward the East, his deals with individual members in the Eastern bloc, now that a new boss has taken over in the Soviet Union and thus also in the Eastern bloc?

Papandreou: The new leadership in Moscow begins working at a time when tensions in East-West relations have increased and when it is clear at least to me that in a way we have returned to cold war. The change in leadership gives the Soviet Union an opportunity to correct its attitude toward the West in general and toward the United States in particular.

SPIEGEL: It may, and probably will, take its time.

Papandreou: Quite possibly. But the new leadership in Moscow could very well newly assess relations with the West.

SPIEGEL: Because the West's attitude has become harsher?

Papandreou: As a participant in NATO and EC conferences I had a chance to observe how the positions have hardened, especially on the part of Washington, but under Washington's influence also among European politicians. Just take the important matter of the pipeline embargo. Alright, Mr Reagan has lifted the sanctions now, but in return for that most Europeans are prepared to aggravate trade and economic relations with the Soviet Union. Thus, we must wait and see what policy the new Soviet leadership under Andropov will pursue ....

SPIEGEL: ... And whether the West at large, and Washington in particular, will continue its policy of confrontation.

Papandreou: Of course. In any event, it is of fundamental significance that the new leaders in Moscow declared directly that they would continue to pursue Brezhnev's detente policy ....

SPIEGEL: ... Which in turn would put you into the position to continue your Ostpolitik, Papandreou style, and to push the idea of a denuclearized zone in the Balkans, for example.

Papandreou: My talks with the leaders of Yugoslavia, Bulgaria and Romania convinced me that this idea really is contagious.

SPIEGEL: Where in the Balkans are nuclear weapons stationed now, anyway?

Papandreou: Please, every government must answer that question in its own behalf. I do not demand any statement from Zhivkov, Ceausescu, or the Yugoslav leaders whether any of them are stationed in their country or not. But I can say one thing; there are some in Greece.

SPIEGEL: American.

Papandreou: American, on Greek soil, with only one key and not with two keys. As for that, I must say that they don't belong to the bases. The negotiations on the bases don't involve nuclear weapons. These form another bilateral subject to be discussed with the United States, if you will.

SPIEGEL: And you feel threatened by these atomic weapons?

Papandreou: They are irrelevant for Greece's defense, except for the case of a world war, when the matter will look quite different. We, the Greek Government, bear responsibility for the Greek people's protection against this lethal threat. And, as I have stated repeatedly, this point is not negotiable for us.

Of course, several questions ought to be clarified in connection with the nuclear-free zone. We require certain information and we must solve the problem of verification. All this must be included, and this is why we also say that it may last for another one and a half years.

SPIEGEL: Aren't you somewhat too optimistic?

Papandreou: I was very pleased when Ceausescu told me that in his view Turkey, too, would join a zone free of atomic weapons. To be sure, he cannot make any binding statements for Turkey, but it was the impression he gained. When he will visit Turkey early in 1983 then this will be one of the most important topics of discussion -- and then all countries of the Balkans would have come to terms, with the exception of Albania with which we have had no contacts for a long time.

SPIEGEL: Do you believe that such a regional decision, if it were to materialize, would meet with the approval of the almighty superpowers, who, after all, will be determining more or less so as to what is going to happen within the two blocs?

Papandreou: We, at any rate, will continue to pursue the matter. Greece is determined to make a genuine contribution to detente.

SPIEGEL: Somewhat as a loner, though still a member of the alliance?

Papandreou: No, not as a loner but as a partner who serves the basic interests of his citizens and of Greece and at the same time makes a contribution to peace and detente, something that is a very critical topic today. And in case we do not watch out, then very soon none of us will be around to give or make interviews.

SPIEGEL: Mr Prime Minister, we thank you for this talk.

KARAMANLIS RETURNS FROM VISITS TO PARIS, BONN

NC012232 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] President of the Republic Konstandinos Karamanlis returned to Athens at 1600 after completing his long trip to France and West Germany. Before leaving Bonn, Karamanlis had another meeting in the morning with FRG President Karl Carstens. As has been learned, Karamanlis has invited the German president to visit Athens. Carstens accepted the invitation and the date will be fixed later. In addition, before departing Bonn President Karamanlis visited the bishopric of Germany, where he was welcomed by Metropolitan Avgoustinos and had talks with representatives of associations of Greek communities, representatives of Greek workers and students in West Germany, Greek professors and others.

NICOSIA CITES GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON ULUSU SPEECH

NC292231 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2100 GMT 29 Nov 82

Maroudhas said Ulusu's allegations are self-evidently unfounded and stressed that the defense of the Aegean islands is based on a UN decision that recognizes the absolute right of member states to organize their territory's defense. This, he added, constitutes an exercise of Greek sovereign rights. Maroudhas observed that it is tragicomic for Turkey to claim that it is being menaced by the defense of the Greek islands when on the opposite coast the Fourth Aegean Army has been deployed with a force of 100,000 men maintained at NATO expense in order to threaten Greece. Maroudhas stressed that to eliminate any doubt concerning the goals of this army, 79 large landing craft are anchored along the same coast opposite the Greek Islands. Does the Turkish Prime Minister want to convince us, Maroudhas concluded, that these strong forces feel that they are being threatened by our islands' garrisons?

In his speech the day before yesterday, Ulusu had claimed that the Aegean islands near the Turkish coast had been left to Greece on condition that they would remain demilitarized for Turkey's security. Greece, the Turkish prime minister had said, has violated its promises and it will be fully responsible for the unpleasant consequences of its activities.

KKE-INTERIOR MESSAGE TO 'ARAFAT ON PALESTINE DAY

NC010942 Athens I AVYI in Greek 30 Nov 82 p 1

[Text] The KKE-Interior Central Committee has sent the following message to Palestinian leader Yasir 'Arafat:

"On the occasion of 29 November, the world day of solidarity with the Palestinian people, the KKE-Interior Central Committee conveys warm, militant greetings to you and the hope that the Palestinian people's wish for an independent Palestinian state on the land of their ancestors will be quickly fulfilled.

"Our party, together with all the progressive and democratic forces of the Greek people, will persistently and firmly continue to fight for the recognition of the Palestinian people's rights and for the greatest possible support and solidarity from Greece and the world for the PLO, the only legal representative of the Palestinian people, until final victory is achieved. For the KKE-Interior Central Committee, Yiannis Banias, secretary."

FOREIGN MINISTRY COMMENTS ON GREEK 'MEGALO IDEA'

TA011549 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1545 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 1 Dec (AA) -- Foreign Ministry spokesman Nazmi Akiman, asked to comment on a recent statement by Mr Kapsis, undersecretary at the Greek Foreign Ministry who affirmed that Turkey was conducting an expansionist policy, said: "I do not believe that such allegations of a government which bases its foreign policy on the 'Megalo idea' can be taken seriously."

ULUSU CALLS FOR UNIFICATION OF BUSINESSES

TA300940 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0845 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Ankara, 30 Nov (AA) -- Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu received Monday officials of the Confederation of Traders and Artizans and told them the new Constitution was aimed at protecting their rights. From now on, it will not be possible to withdraw state support from the artizans, small scale traders and industrialists the confederation represents, he underlined.

The government was determined to adopt all kinds of measures required to support them, the prime minister stressed, adding that "and you, in turn, must no longer stay as small units surviving on a day to day basis, but organize at a scale and level that will enable you to establish a functional link with medium and big industry and contribute to exports."

Confederation president Husamettin Tiyansan thanked the prime minister for his deep interest in the problems of confederation members.

GOVERNMENT BANS PUBLICATION OF DAILY GUNAYDIN

NC020957 Paris AFP in English 0944 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 2 (AFP) -- Turkish martial law authorities have closed for an indefinite period the mass-circulations liberal daily GUNAYDIN after it reported yesterday that Turkey was stopping all but vital imports from France, ostensibly in reprisal for French customs restrictions on Turkish textile goods, official sources said today.

The paper was alleged to have flouted an official communique "banning divulgation and publication of the Turkish Government's decision to cease all its imports from France aside from goods deemed vital for the country's economy".

The newspaper backed up its report yesterday with an editorial in which the French Government came in for strong criticism over its decision to suspend imports of Turkish made bed linen and pullovers until the end of this year. The French measures were part of an overall policy of restrictions on Turkish textiles -- particularly cotton shirts -- by Britain, Italy and France within the Common Market framework. Negotiations between the EEC and Turkey opened last week on the issue of limiting Turkish cotton exports in 1983.

COURT TO PROSECUTE 18 WRITERS UNION MEMBERS

[Text] Istanbul, 30 Nov (AA) -- Martial law prosecutor demanded prison sentences ranging from 1 to 15 years for 18 Turkish writers who served as current and past officials of the writers' union since 1976, for "turning the legal union into an illegal one, engaging in communist propaganda and praising poet Nazim Hikmet." Those being prosecuted include leading Turkish humorist Aziz Nesin. Meanwhile, the prosecutor announced he will not prosecute Yasar Kemal, one of the founders of the union and its first president who recently won the French Del Duca award for his novel "Memed my Hawk."

NC301748 Paris AFP in English 1705 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Text] Ankara, Nov 30 (AFP) -- Eighteen leading members of the "progressive" union of Turkish writers are to be prosecuted for communist propaganda and associating with illegal organisations, a court source in Istanbul said today. In the indictment laid before Istanbul's military judge, the public prosecutor called for the union's permanent closure and prison sentences varying from eight to 15 years for its 18 leaders.

The union was founded in 1974 by Yasar Kemal. Its present leader is Aziz Nesin, currently undergoing medical treatment in Moscow. The judge said the founding members, including Yasar Kemal, were not among the accused.

Apart from Mr Nesin, the other accused include lawyers Mehmet Ali Sebuk, 76, and Orhan Apaydin, the front ranking supporter of the officials of the group of affiliated trade unions (DISC), who are all in prison.

The writers' union is accused of associating with banned organisations such as the pro-Soviet DISC, the Turkish committee for peace, the teachers' union (Tob Der) and other youth and progressive organisations.

HOUSING MINISTER VISITS FRG TO DISCUSS WORKERS

TA241102 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] A delegation headed by Housing and Reconstruction Minister Ahmet Samsunlu left for Berlin this morning to hold talks on the problems of Turkish workers employed in the FRG. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport before his departure, Samsunlu said that he would also hold talks with the Turkish workers who live in unfavorable conditions in Berlin, and would be briefed by officials on the issue. The delegation will then hold talks with the Bavarian officials in Munich and with the FRG housing and reconstruction minister in Bonn. The delegation is composed of representatives from the Ministries of Labor, Foreign Affairs, National Education; the Social Security Institute; the State Planning Organization; and the Religious Affairs Directorate. They will return to Turkey on 1 December.

Completes Visit

TA011743 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Minister of Housing and Reconstruction Ahmet Samsunlu has said that FRG officials attach importance to Turkish-German friendship and that they do not wish to forcefully send back Turkish workers.

The Turkish delegation headed by Samsunlu has concluded its contacts in the FRG and returned to Turkey. In a statement to a Turkish Radio and Television correspondent, Samsunlu said that he held talks with the governing mayor of West Berlin, five ministers in Berlin and the ministers of interior and reconstruction and housing in Bonn to discuss the various problems of Turkish workers employed in the FRG. He added that during their stay in the FRG they also met with government officials in Munich. He said that committees have been set up in the FRG to handle the problems of Turkish workers and that the problems will be taken up by the governments of the two countries after the committees complete their work.

EDUCATION MINISTER RETURNS FROM PARIS, FRG

TA020720 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] National Education Minister Hasan Saglam, who attended a UNESCO meeting in Paris, returned to Turkey last night. In a statement on his arrival at Yesilkoy Airport, he said that at the UNESCO meeting they discussed its program for 1984-1989 within the framework of UNESCO aims. Saglam pointed out that 28.5 percent of the world population, 814 million people, were illiterate and that 123 million children could not go to school. The minister said that after the UNESCO meeting he went to the FRG where he held contacts on the education problems of the children of Turkish workers in that country.

HUNGARIAN TV DELEGATION BEGINS DISCUSSIONS

[Text] Talks began in Ankara today on a protocol that envisages the exchange of programs, joint productions and technical cooperation between the Turkish Radio and Television (TRT) Corporation and Hungarian radio and television. The Turkish delegation under TRT Deputy Director Behcet Devay and the Hungarian delegation led by the deputy director of Hungarian television, (Karli Mageri), met today for the first time to begin talks on the protocol. The Hungarian delegation also visited TRT Director General Macit Akman. The protocol being discussed by the two delegations is expected to be signed in Ankara tomorrow. The Hungarian delegation will then proceed to II Istanbul for further studies.

Protocol Signed

[Text] A bilateral cooperation protocol has been signed in Ankara between the Turkish Radio and Television Corporation [TRT] and the Hungarian radio and television corporation. The protocol was signed by the deputy director of TRT, Behcet Devay, on behalf of Turkey, and by the deputy director of the Hungarian Radio and Television corporation, (Karoli Megery), and the head of the current affairs desk, (Guyula Cher), on behalf of Hungary.

TRT Director General Macit Akman said at the signing ceremony that with this protocol, cooperation between Hungarian and Turkish radio and television was placed on a more systematic and better foundation.

(Karoli Megery) said that the talks in Ankara were very useful. He pointed out that radio and television were very effective media and could be used by the respective radio and television corporations of the two countries to promote their cooperation. He described the protocol as an important step, adding that in this way, possibilities for cooperation between the radio and television corporations of the two countries have been created.

Devay expressed the belief that radio and television are the most effective media in the current world. He added that the protocol envisages program exchanges, joint production and technical cooperation between the two corporations. He noted that further developing this cooperation will also increase the existing friendship between the Turkish and Hungarian peoples. The Hungarian ambassador to Ankara was also present at the signing ceremony. The Hungarian delegation called on Akman before signing the protocol and conferred with him for some time.

ROMANIAN ECONOMIC DELEGATION SIGNS PROTOCOL

TA241845 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Nov 82

[Text] The meeting of the joint Turkish-Romanian economic committee has ended in Ankara. A protocol in connection with the talks was signed by Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk on behalf of Turkey and by Romanian Minister of Machine Building Industry Ioan Avram on behalf of Romania. Speaking at the signing ceremony, Canturk said that with this protocol, economic cooperation between the two countries will be increased. Avram expressed the belief that the developing economic relations between the two countries will strengthen the relations of friendship between Turkey and Romania.

According to the protocol, trade between the two countries will not be subject to a quota and will be conducted in exchange for foreign currency. Technical adjustments on the issue will be made by the central banks of the two countries.

An assessment of the Turkish-Romanian economic relations was made at the joint economic committee meeting and a unity of view was reached on increasing trade and on the speedy conclusion of the joint projects in progress such as the central Anatolia refinery. The Romanian delegation will leave for Istanbul this evening and will leave Turkey tomorrow.

Ends Visit

VOTCP: TURKMEN GIVEN SOVIET MESSAGE TO NATO

TA010623 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] The Soviet media have preminently reported the talks held between Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in Moscow on an official visit, and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. Press reports reveal that through Turkey, the Soviet Union has delivered a message addressed to the NATO headquarters. The message calls for the sides to exercise a flexible stand for the elimination of the nuclear war peril which is threatening the whole of humanity, and advising a constructive stance on current issues like disarmament and detente.

OUR RADIO COMMENTS ON TURKMEN VISIT TO MOSCOW

TA301052 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 30 Nov 82

[Station commentary]

[Excerpt] Dear listeners, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen met yesterday with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko. In this meeting, the Soviet foreign minister called on Turkey to raise its voice in favor of peace. Gromyko added that the continent on which both the USSR and Turkey are located must be an area of peace. He expressed his conviction that significant steps must be taken for cooperation between the two countries not only in the commercial field but also the political field.

Yes, dear listeners, once more the Soviet Union is extending its peaceful and friendly hand, expressing its wish to promote goodneighborly relations with Turkey. This gesture has its roots in the old days of Turkey's national liberation war.

In his reply, Foreign Minister Turkmen spoke about the significance attached by Turkey to bilateral relations with the Soviet Union. This question then comes to mind: If you attach importance to bilateral relations with the Soviet Union, what are you in fact doing to this end? Are you not the ones who call great friends Reagan and his followers who are trying to be the gendarme of the world? Are not the current junta heads the ones who have signed secret military agreements with the United States? Are not the 60 small and large NATO and U.S. bases, the aircraft based on them and the monitoring devices all directed against the Soviet Union? Why is a new military airfield being built in Mus? Why are the Van and Batman airfields being expanded?

For months now, the reactionary press organs and the junta's mouthpiece, Turkish Radio and Television, are spreading the U.S. slanders of a Soviet threat. In its issue of today, the Istanbul daily TERCUMAN says that the West is concerned over the latest visits by Turkish officials, that relations with socialism countries are being observed with interest in Europe and concern in the United States. While Turkmen is affecting a visit to Moscow, TERCUMAN has the courage to write so and the junta administration is turning a blind eye on these slanders against the Soviet Union.

While tens of thousands of patriots are being kept in dungeons, the members of the Turkish peace committee are being prosecuted for trying to prevent Turkey's transformation into a nuclear cemetery, and hostility is being fanned against the Soviet Union. Friendship and goodneighborliness are mutual. Under the shadow of U.S. nuclear missiles and the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force, the junta generals are undermining the promotion of friendly and goodneighborly relations with the Soviet Union. Friendship is established with deeds, not words.

MEETINGS END; GREEK-TURKISH ISSUE DISCUSSED

Bayulken Holds News Conference

[Turkish radio and television correspondent Mustafa Genc reports on the NATO defense ministers meeting from Brussels -- recorded]

[Text] This is Mustafa Genc reporting from Brussels. The NATO defense ministers meetings, which have been held for the last 4 days, have concluded. The joint communique on the activities of the Defense Planning Committee meeting which ended today and which was the last phase of the NATO defense ministers meeting is expected to be issued any moment now.

National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken held a news conference today while the NATO Defense Planning Committee meeting was in progress. Bayulken said that Greek Prime Minister and Defense Minister Papandreou brought the Turkish-Greek conflict to the agenda of the NATO meetings at a time when the alliance most needs solidarity. Noting that Papandreou reiterated the allegations that Turkey threatened Greece and that it violated Greek airspace, Bayulken added that he also claimed that Greece has the right to militarize Limnos Island. Bayulken said that the status of the Aegean Islands has been determined through international treaties; that according to international laws, in the event territorial waters extend to 6 miles, airspace cannot extend beyond this limit, and that the agreements in question cannot be amended by unilateral declarations.

Noting that Greece wanted to use NATO as a tool to serve its interests, Bayulken added that the Greek Government wanted to provoke anti-Turkish feeling among the Greek public. Pointing out that Turkey has no enmity against Greece and that it is ready to solve the problems through negotiations, Bayulken added that, however, Turkey is determined to defend its legal rights. Bayulken said: If Papandreou really wanted to solve the problems through negotiations, he could have allowed the meeting to have been held next week in Brussels between the foreign ministers of the two countries. However, this was unilaterally cancelled by Greece. Bayulken noted that those who view the Turkish-Greek dispute unilaterally and who have difficulty in understanding the problems should analyze the talks between Ataturk and Venizelos.

Bayulken later replied to questions by foreign correspondents. In reply to a question by a Greek journalist on the purpose of the establishment of the Aegean Army, Bayulken said that every country maintained troops on its border, but that this did not mean that that country was threatening other countries. He added that Turkey did not pursue an aggressive policy against any country. In reply to a question by another journalist, Bayulken said that the new Turkish Constitution was adopted by a great majority in the recent referendum and that the plan concerning the transition to a democracy was being implemented as had been announced. Bayulken noted that Turkey does not need to take lessons in democracy from anyone.

Meanwhile, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns also held a news conference. He said that Greece committed a grave error on the issue concerning the Limnos Island. He said that the Turkish-Greek dispute affects the alliance's southeastern flank and that it disrupts the defense of the alliance. He said: I hope that the dialogue between the foreign ministers of the two countries will be realized and that the existing crisis will be eliminated.

Meets FRG, Canadian Ministers

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken, who is in Brussels after attending the NATO defense ministers' winter meetings, held separate meetings with the FRG and Canadian defense ministers. Our correspondents report from Brussels that during his talks with FRG Defense Minister Manfred Woerner and Canadian Defense Minister Gilles Lamontagne, Bayulken discussed bilateral defense issues. The national defense minister will return to Turkey on Saturday.

Greek Amendments in Communique

[Dispatch from Brussels by Hellenic Radio-Television correspondent Thanos Oikonomopoulos -- recorded]

[Excerpt] This year's 2-day meeting of the NATO defense ministers, which concluded in Brussels today, has fully confirmed Greece's consistent and crystal-clear position toward NATO and its relations with it. A joint communique was released by the Defense Planning Committee. This communique not only confirms our national questions, that is, the framework of Greek-NATO and Greek-Turkish relations, but also the Greek Government's general goals.

It is noteworthy that with regard to the joint communique, not only were the phraseological amendments to the text of the communique accepted without discussion, but the clear reservations put forward by the Greek delegation were also accepted. These reservations refer to the deployment of new nuclear arms in Europe and to the need to base Europe's defense on the nuclear forces of both the United States and Britain because their conventional weapons are not sufficient. (?All Greek) reservations were included in the text of the communique.

Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou told the Greek political editors accompanying him, particularly in connection with our national questions, that he is leaving this year's NATO defense ministers meeting pleased, much more optimistic and with a sense of great security, because the climate has now clearly changed and NATO is much more sensitive to our positions. For the first time, NATO has carefully listened to the Greek views in connection with the existing problems and has officially admitted their existence.

At this point, it is worth noting the cases of Limnos and of Greece's insistence on refusing to participate in allied exercises in the Aegean that question our national sovereign rights. Most characteristic of the acceptance of Greece's positions is the fact that during his regular press conference at the conclusion of the meeting, NATO Secretary General Luns apologetically admitted that NATO was in error regarding the question of the cancellation of Apex Express 82. At the same time, he admitted that the cancellation is in no way connected with Greece's indisputable sovereign rights over Limnos and the presence of Greek military forces on the island. Mr Luns also said that Mr Papandreou strongly and consistently defended the Greek positions.

FRG's Woerner on Meeting

LD021744 Hamburg DPA in German 1642 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 2 Dec (DPA) -- Defense Minister Mandred Woerner is satisfied with the outcome of the Brussels NATO meeting. Woerner told DEUTSCHE WELLE that he has returned to Bonn with "exceptionally good impressions." The unity within the alliance is closer than he had thought. There is considerable solidarity on the decisive points.

FRG TV Assessment

DW021437 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Gustavo Trampe report in the "Heute" newscast]

[Text] In Brussels today, the NATO defense ministers made a point of counteracting the impression that the alliance might change its strategy of flexible response. Above all, they countered expectations that the alliance could renounce nuclear weapons or at least short-range nuclear weapons.

On various occasions, such speculation has recently been linked with the Rogers plan -- the plan of the NATO supreme commander to raise the nuclear threshold through greater efforts in the conventional sphere, that is, to reduce the dependence on nuclear weapons by relying on modern conventional weapons. Defense Minister Woerner warned in particular against abandoning the option of a nuclear defense. In principle, he said, it is also impossible to renounce short-range nuclear weapons. Woerner did not, however, come out against a reduction of these weapons and he also advocated raising the nuclear threshold.

Canadian Admiral Falls, chairman of the NATO Military Committee, summed up the opinion about the Rogers plan that is taking shape in NATO as follows: The strategy of flexible response continues to be valid and will remain so for the foreseeable future. However, we will also examine the possibilities arising in the weapons field due to the rapid development of technology.

The reserved reaction to the Rogers plan naturally is also based on financial aspects. The general has calculated that NATO members must increase their defense expenditures by 4 percent a year over the next few years, however, the money is not available anywhere. Nevertheless, the Rogers plan has not been wiped off the table, but its implementation will probably take longer than the general would like.

KOHL PLEDGES SUPPORT FOR SPAIN EC MEMBERSHIP

LD021336 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl has invited the new Spanish prime minister, Socialist Felipe Gonzalez, to pay a visit to the FRG soon. In a message of congratulations to the new Spanish prime minister, the German chancellor reaffirmed that the FRG will support Spain in its application for membership in the European Community. The FRG will occupy the EEC presidency during the first 6-months of 1983.

SOVIETS, FDP SPOKESMAN DISCUSS FUTURE RELATIONS

Gromyko To Visit 17 Jan

DW031047 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 3 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] Bonn -- Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko will come to Bonn on 17 January. FRG Foreign Minister Genscher welcomed the fact that the date for the initial visit by the Soviet foreign minister to the new Federal Government has now been set. The news was conveyed to the Federal Government by Vladimir Semenov, Soviet ambassador in Bonn. Genscher also supported the plan for the visit by a Soviet parliamentary delegation headed by Zamyatin, chief of the International Information Department at the CPSU Central Committee. The desire of the Soviet parliamentarians to visit the Federal Republic this year was conveyed to Helmut Schaefer, foreign policy spokesman of the FDP faction, during his stay in Moscow. Schaefer, who held talks with leading Soviet party-government representatives, found confirmation of the Soviet Union's interest in continuous relations with the Federal Republic.

Schaefer on USSR INF Posture

[Excerpt] Bonn, 2 Dec (DPA) -- The Soviet Union has announced comprehensive measures for arming if in the event of failure of the Geneva negotiations between the superpowers, the West actually begins to counterarm. These measures would include the Soviet Union's own cruise missiles [Marschflugkoerper] and new intercontinental missiles which could reach the United States, FDP foreign affairs spokesman Helmut Schaefer was told in Moscow.

Schaefer, who reported on his trip immediately after his return to Bonn, emphasized that his impression is that the Soviet Union has a great interest in a negotiated solution. Nevertheless, the Soviet side regards a "zero option" as being unacceptable.

It is of major importance to the Soviets to include French and British nuclear capabilities in the negotiations, Schaefer said. He indicated that in the long term he considers it unrealistic to exclude the British and French nuclear arsenals from the negotiations. Moscow is prepared to continue with negotiations if time should run short in the autumn of 1983. This willingness will not cease even if preparations for stationing the missiles have begun in the West. But the high-ranking Soviet Western experts with whom Schaefer met were skeptical about the seriousness of American intentions at the Geneva medium-range missile negotiations.

FRANCE'S CHEYSSON ARRIVES IN BERLIN FOR VISIT

LD021430 Hamburg DPA in German 1401 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Berlin, 2 Dec (DPA) -- French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson arrived in Berlin today for a 2-day visit. The minister landed shortly after lunch in a special aircraft in the military part of Tegel Airport, where he was welcomed by FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) and Governing Mayor of Berlin, Richard von Weizsaecker.

Reconfirms French Commitment

LD021720 Hamburg DPA in German 1616 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] Berlin, 2 Dec (DPA) -- France's commitment to Berlin's freedom and security were underlined by French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson during his visit to the divided city on Thursday. His country, together with Great Britain and the United States will look after its rights and obligations "today as in the future," the French foreign minister said. "Berliners can rely on us just as we know that we can rely on Berliners."

Cheysson arrived for a 2-day visit in Berlin this afternoon. He was welcomed at the military section of Tegel Airport by the three Western city commandants, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Governing Mayor of Berlin Richard von Weizsaecker. Immediately after his arrival he went on a tour of the city and laid a wreath at the memorial for escapees shot in Bernauer Street in the French sector.

While signing the Golden Book at Schoeneberg Town Hall, Cheysson referred to Berlin as one of the great capitals which has contributed toward the defense of human dignity, freedom and democracy. Through its special historic, geographic and political situation, Berlin is a "cornerstone of East-West relations," Cheysson said. The French Government is firmly resolved to make its contribution so that the hopes tied to the four power agreement of 1971 will be realized in the future also. This agreement created the foundations for a more stable and secure situation. However, progress was still possible and necessary. The increase in the minimum exchange levy by the GDR is "a regrettable measure."

Earlier, Weizsaecker, speaking in the Brandenburg Hall of the Town Hall, emphasized that the foreign minister's visit underlines the certainty that France, together with Great Britain and the United States, is committed to Berlin today and in the future in order to meet its responsibilities. Weizsaecker called defense preparedness and detente the two inseparable objectives. Berliners are hoping that the next few months will offer the opportunity to undertake new efforts in order to more successfully overcome recent tensions in East-West relations than to date has been achieved.

On behalf of the Federal Government, Genscher thanked the French foreign minister for the renewed affirmation of solidarity with Berlin. Germany's situation is reflected in the "focal point, Berlin," the federal foreign minister said. The four power agreement has proved itself; strict adherence and full application will secure stabilizing effects in the future also.

Views East-West Balance

[Text] [no dateline, as received] The French foreign minister has expressly warned against changing the military balance in Europe. During a dinner given by the Berlin press conference, he tonight called "absolute deterrence" the "only absolute weapon of peace."

Cheysson said that the massive deployment of precise and dangerous arms which could reach only part of the Western camp is therefore alarming and to be condemned "for between this part of our camp, and its opposite, there exists this balance only within the framework of total equilibrium." Hence, negotiations on medium-range missiles in Geneva are of great import. Parity in this area of the East-West argument will have to be reestablished.

Cheysson said that free expression of opinion is a precondition for the individual's development and therefore for progress of society. He referred to the peoples in the East who are all too often denied this basic right. Cheysson said that Berlin is a city where "passionate freedom movements" have been born, but where also "a monstrous structure of negation of mankind's fundamental values" has been able to grow and dominate. In alluding to the famous remark made by the murdered U.S. President John F. Kennedy, ("Ich bin ein Berliner"), Cheysson said: Yes, we all are Berliners because we are free and want to be free."

Cheysson will be leaving Berlin on Friday morning after breakfast with the governing Mayor of Berlin Richard von Weizsaecker and will go on to Copenhagen to attend the European summit.

Departs Berlin for Copenhagen

[Excerpts] Berlin, 3 Dec (DPA) -- French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson concluded his visit to Berlin today. He was seen off this morning by governing Mayor Richard von Weizsaecker in the military section of Tegel Airport. He left by air for the EEC summit in Copenhagen.

Before his departure, Cheysson breakfasted with Weizsaecker at the French ambassador's Berlin residence. According to Senate spokesman Meinhard Abe, they discussed Berlin problems and possibilities for the further development of East-West relations in the wake of the leadership change in Moscow. Weizsaecker also explained to Cheysson developments in the GDR and the East European countries from a Berlin viewpoint.

BORDER COMMISSION EXCHANGES DRAFT TREATIES

[Text] Bremen, 2 Dec (DPA) -- The joint FRG-GDR Border Commission exchanged draft treaties during its 2-day session in Bremen on an improvement of high-tide protection of the Elbe. This was stated to journalists by the head of the FRG delegation, Irmgard von Rottenburg, on Thursday in Bremen.

Both sides will now try to find ways of coming closer to the other side. .ne Border Commission also talked about a possbile agreement on the management of the Mittelland Canal. The central topic of the conference was preparation of the water management program for 1983.

The head of the delegation also said that, as at every meeting, border incidents had been mentioned. He did not release any details, but said the FRG recently has noted that the GDR has made fewer arrests in border violations. Members of the GDR delegation did not particpate in the press conference. The next meeitng of the commision will be on 2 and 3 March in the Thuringian town of Oberhof.

FINANCE MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON FISCAL POLICY

DW021839 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 3 Dec 82 p 23

[Interview with Gerhard Stoltenberg, FRG minister of finance, by editor Rudolf Herlt -- date and place not given]

[Excerpts] ZEIT: Mr Minister, how can measures to improve the economic situation and to reorganize state finances be in harmony with the principles with which the Kohl government took office? One of these principles was that state finances had to be put in order by limiting expenditures. As a matter of fact, however, increases in the value-added tax and compulsory loan from, or an investment aid tax on people with higher wages were decided on.

Stoltenberg: A clear differentiation must be made between the emergency program and the initial steps or declarations of intent regarding a long-term policy. After the government change, we had 7 weeks to enact legislation because all parties want to hold elections early next year. However, the initial decisions countain steps toward more long-term objectives. Additional savings in the federal budget of more than DM5.6 billion were decided on in the shortest possible time. Through this decision, the leander and communities will have their burden reduced by DM3 billion. In addition, we have taken the first steps toward fighting the economic crisis and solving unemployment through our special program for reviving housing construction and through decreases in taxes, in particularly the business tax.

For the second stage we have made preliminary decisions and issued program statements. The increase in the value-added tax, which is being criticized by some people, beginning 1 January 1983 is to be used to ease the burdens on trade and industry and to improve the financial situation of employees. This increase will bring in about DM4 billion. This will serve to change the ominous trend toward reduced capital stock at our enterprises as well as to strengthen their competitive capability. Also, for the period beyond 1983, we have taken initial measures to improve the hard-pressed situation of social insurance through an increase in health insurance contributions from pensioners.

ZEIT: Do you believe that more progress toward reducing interest rates can be made in the near future?

Stoltenberg: I hope, of course, that the Bundesbank will soon be able to further decrease the discount rates. Lower interest rates, however, must be warranted. The aforementioned decisions on cuts to be made by the new Federal Government and the assumption of the majority of the Schmidt government's bills on budgetary relief are to prevent the overburdening of the capital market in 1983, although newly incurred indebtedness in still too high.

Finally, international developments must be watched very carefully. The latest decrease of the discount rate in the United States is an encouraging sign.

However, uncertainties remain in the United States and in other important partner countries because their 1983 national deficits by way of comparison, will be even higher than ours.

ZEIT: Do you expect exports to increase again soon?

Stoltenberg: After a very favorable period lasting until this summer, we are now registering a very strong reduction in exports. Despite the fact that our foreign trade surplus is as high as before, the German share of world trade has noticeably declined during the past 12 years. In this respect, too, the expression "strengthening our competitive capability" is of central importance.

Experts as well as important independent people -- such as Helmut Schlesinger, vice president of the Bundesbank -- have publicly voiced cautious expectations regarding a definite revival of exports in 1983. There is this possibility, but considering the situation of important partner countries, a large number of imponderables and risks still exist.

ZEIT: How do you actually assess foreign clients who are able to make purchases?

Stoltenberg: Now as before, the main share in our exports is held by the Western industrial countries. Only a few citizens realize that exports to the Netherlands are higher than those to the Soviet Union. This is why the economic development of the United States and the West European industrial countries is actually of greater importance. However, despite the difficulties currently being experienced by the OPEC and CEMA countries, we certainly do not want to neglect the Third World markets.

ZEIT: Isn't there going to be a collapse on the international financial markets?

Stoltenberg: I believe that difficulties can be overcome if everyone concerned does what is required. What we need is concerted action on the international level. Governments, the IMF and banks have to cooperate.

ZEIT: What medium-term program has the Federal Government prepared to combat unemployment?

Stoltenberg: After the negative experiences of the seventies, we do not believe in short-term economic stimulus programs financed by credits. Such probrams have had only short-lived effects and the problems of a more far-reaching nature were not permanently solved. Above all, we must place our stakes on the strengthening of investment and competition capacities, especially in trade and industry.

ZEIT: Will any level of government ever be free of debt in view of the public debt which now amounts to about DM600 billion?

Stoltenberg: I want to be careful with predictions in this respect. It is absolutely clear, though, that a considerable reduction in net borrowing in 1984 and the following years as well as further decisions on savings must be given special priority. However, budget cutting alone will not suffice. We cannot solve problems with economy measures alone unless we achieve a phase of growth again and unless this development is supported in every way through the state's economic and financial policy.

ZEIT: When you speak of a decrease in income and wage taxes, what do you mean? Do you merely want to offset the progressive nature of the taxes or do you intend tax decreases to be used like those of the Reagan administration, as a means of expanding the economy?

Stoltenberg: After the experiences of the seventies, at least DM8-DM10 billion must be involved in decreasing wage and income taxes, otherwise, they will not yield anything at all for the individual. Comprehensive tax reform, about which there has been a lot of talk ever since the sixties and which has not been achieved by anybody until now, would involve even greater financial means. Thus, I want to be cautious with such announcements. In contrast to many cliches, we actually are not practicing Reagonimics.

ZEIT: Suppose you were able to decrease income taxes in the next few years. Would you increase the value-added tax even further to compensate for this?

Stoltenberg: There are program statements from the Union which consider a further shift of taxes in this direction to be possible. However, beyond the decisions made so far, no concrete plans exist to increase the value-added tax further.

BRIEFS

NOVEMBER UNEMPLOYMENT FIGURES -- At the end of November, unemployment in the FRG reached 2-million persons. According to DRA information, there were 2,038,000 unemployed people in the FRG at the end of November. This raises the unemployment level in the FRG to 8.4 percent, which is the highest unemployment level in the FRG for any November since the war. The highest total so far was registered in February 1950 with 2,288,000. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 0836 GMT 2 Dec 82 LD]

MITTERRAND INTERVIEW WITH INDIAN TELEVISION

AB021444 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1050 GMT 2 Dec 82

[President Francois Mitterrand interview with Indian television on 27 November; place of interview not given]

[Text] [Question] Welcome to our country Mr President. Today, economic development is of prime importance to us. But what do we see around us? A world in the grip of economic crisis resulting in the suspension of the North-South dialogue. You are presiding over the destiny of a highly developed country. In this position, can you propose a solution to the problems facing the developed countries, the developing countries and the world in general?

[Answer] You have just mentioned one of the consequences of this crisis which started many years ago. Of course, this crisis did not happen by chance. It is the product of a system, of the difficulty of industrialized society in adapting to new technologies and the fact that the number of people in the world who have been able to achieve industrialization is now much much greater. There is some retorgression by certain large countries which cannot understand what their responsibility in the world should be.

Finally, there has been a reduction of aid to the Third World, and what worries me more is the absence of sustained proposals. Many of us have warned international public opinion by demanding, for example, that global negotiations be initiated in order to frankly discuss the problems of development, especially within the United Nations. However, very concrete problems like the monetary system do not exist today; everything is subjected to the fluctuations of the dollar. Most countries which import their raw materials pay in dollars. They cannot balance their exchanges in the absence of a monetary system and guaranties for the prices of raw materials such as coffee, cocoa and timber, which are indispensable for the enrichment of the poor countries.

[Question] Mr President, you have been able to identify the problems very well and we know that you are one of the first to desire the resumption of the North-South dialogue. Do you think it is possible that it will resume again soon?

[Answer] I hope so. In the meantime, I have noticed that cooperation has been declining somewhat. I very much regretted the reduction of the aid from the Agency for International Development. I have discovered that the proposals made in Cancun -- where I was present together with Indian Prime Minister Mrs Indira Gandhi -- and which called for a policy of food self-sufficiency, a policy of development aid to non-oil-producing countries and so on, have not been implemented. This does not mean, however, that these proposals should not be repeated. The World Bank and the IMF are institutions where one make one's voice heard. One can mobilize international public opinion and I, who belong to an industrialized country of the North, must say that France has not only maintained its aid despite the general movement of the other Western countries, but has increased it. But of course, France cannot make up the deficiencies of other countries. It does not have the means to do so.

[Question] Mr President, from economics, I would now like to turn to political problems, for example, the problem of world peace. All around us, we see a constant rush for positions of power resulting in an imbalance of forces. This is due to the fact that emphasis is now being placed on nuclear arms instead of on conventional arms. In this context, what do you think about the doctrine of detente?

[Answer] Yes, but one should not mistake one's own wishes for reality. Of course, I hope for the return of detente but I am wondering; I am wondering why detente which existed has disappeared to give way to a competition which I would not call a cold war but which resembles it. And it is in wondering about the events of recent years that one can understand and analyze the present situation. What is certain is that the nuclear arms of the two superpowers have reached such a scope that it is undoubtedly on the balance of these destructive forces that the existing peace depends. At the same time, however, what a risk, to make peace dependent on arms.

[Question] Mr President, do you think that it is now time to achieve total nuclear disarmament, the interdiction of nuclear tests and the slowing of the production of fissionable materials?

[Answer] This is a moral, philosophical and ethical view. I will agree if you can obtain this from the Soviet Union and the United States. When you obtain it, I would be very happy to decide for France. But how do you expect a country like mine -- which is faced by two big countries that are arming and overarming themselves and which have never really engaged in negotiations on disarmament, but simply on negotiations to limit their overarmament -- to stop protecting itself? France's nuclear force is purely a defensive one. No one is insane enough to imagine that France could have aggressive intentions, but it must defend its territory, its soveriegnty and its national unity.

[Question] Mr President, does this demonstrate a lack of confidence among the world's great leaders and heads of state?

[Answer] This reflects a deporable reality, but it is obvious that the antagonism of the two superpowers is not always an antagonism; these countries sometimes agree to exert a shared influence. We cannot control this antagonism nor can we act as a referee with regard to it. Some countries, like mine, are engaged in a policy of national defense and are compelled to possess the means for it. Therefore, a country like mine cannot be the first to attempt this. I am ready to join a campaign which could make the superpowers disarm.

[Question] We in this part of the world know that France hopes for the departure of Soviet troops from Afghanistan. We also hope for it. But can one really hope that the Soviet Union will withdraw its troops as long as the rebels continue to receive aid from abroad?

[Answer] Let us not take the place of historians who will one day determine the responsibilities in this appair. What I do know is that the Soviet Union sent its army into the territory of an independent country and that this action must be condemned. There are international institutions in which one can peacefully discuss these problems. It is obvious that to put an end to this conflict, one must obtain the agreement of the main parties concerned and adopt a neutral attitude to remove their apprehensions.

[Question] Mr President, I would like to conclude with a word on the bilateral relations between France and India. For some time now, there has been an exceptional identity of views in the political field. In this context, could you inform us on the future prospects and how you want our bilateral relations to develop?

[Answer] I think I can say that the existing relations are good. They have made great progress during the past few years, particularly during the past few months. Many initiatives are being taken in very important fields such as scientific research, industry, agriculture, the military, as well as the available means for energy production.

How would I describe relations between France and India? They are good, very good. There are no disputes or conflicts between us. One can only say that we can do better and more. I am thinking about the cultural aspect in which we can do more. Even in the economic field we can establish exchanges and sign joint agreements. Besides, this is what we discussed today.

[Question] Mr President, we know that you are a great intellectual and that you are always interested in studies concerning our country's culture as well as your own. I am convinced that our cultural relations will always be good and, with these words, I thank you, Mr President.

[Answer] Nevertheless, I would like to say something before concluding. Since you have given me the opportunity, I should like to be able to address France's friendly greeting to the Indian people and in any case to the television viewers. In fact, these should have been my first words but it is never too late to do the correct thing. I would also like to say how very interested I was by the Indian leaders' very remarkable reception and hospitality.

DEFENSE'S HERNU MAKES OFFICIAL VISIT TO LEBANON

For Lebanese radio and press coverage of the visit by French Defense Minister Charles Hernu to Beirut for official talks, see the Lebanon section of the 3 December Middle East and Africa DAILY REPORT and subsequent issues.

Ministry Issues Communique

NC021958 Paris AFP in English 1946 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 2 (AFP) -- French Defence Minister Charles Hernu was due to arrive in Beirut late today for a three-day official visit, the Defence Ministry announced here.

Mr Hernu is due to meet with Lebanese President Amin al-Jumayyil and other political and military leaders, the ministry stated. France has troops both with the multinational peace-keeping force in Beirut and with the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL).

A ministry communique said that Mr Hernu would inspect French units with both forces during his stay.

The visit, the ministry said, shows the French Government's "desire to confirm its support to the efforts by the Lebanese Government to assure the restoration of the state and the re-establishment of a country particularly close to France."

HERNU ON VIABILITY OF NUCLEAR DETERRENT

PM031045 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[M.D. Report: "Hernu Proposes Revival of Cooperation in Arms Sphere"]

[Text] The French Government wants to give "a new boost to European cooperation in the arms sphere," [Defense Minister] Hernu said while speaking to the WEU assembly Tuesday, 30 November. Mr Hernu mentioned combat helicopter, the "tank of the future" (specifying that the 1980 Franco-German agreement "does not strike us as dead; quite the reverse"] and a tactical fighter plane as a program open to cooperation "without exception to all our European partners."

The defense minister began by saying that the international situation was characterized by "constant and dynamic action by the Soviet Union which is aimed at creating a strategic environment favorable to it," and by "the doubts" which are being shown in the United States "as to the scope and nature of its commitment to its European partners."

The Soviet Union, he said, "combines pacifist-type actions with total determination as regards the possible use of all its military means, which for around 20 years... have benefited from regularly increased investment. The USSR is pursuing its objective to cut the line between Europe and the United States, the main stage of which would be West Europe's denuclearization."

The Soviet SS-20 missiles, Mr Hernu continued, "are the military aspect of that separation."

They are deployed along the entire length of the Soviet Union and "they have the specific characteristic of being able to strike most of the world's cities and industrial or military zones aside from those situated in the American hemisphere. The whole of Europe, Asia, the Middle East and North Africa, in other words almost three-fourths of the earth's population, are within range of those devices." At the same time, the USSR's diplomatic action is aimed at preventing the deployment of U.S. missiles in Europe "whereas considerably more than 300 SS-20 missiles have already been deployed."

The minister did not rule out the possibility that Soviet strategy might undergo "major changes under Mr Andropov's leadership," but he fears that "those possible" diplomatic "overtures" might be subordinated to the effort to break the link between the European countries and the United States.

As for the United States, the minister said, on the one hand it is stepping up its military spending in a spectacular manner and asserting its intention of opposing the USSR "in all spheres," but on the other hand, the U.S. movement for a freeze on nuclear weapons in achieving "considerable success." What worries Mr Hernu even more are "the statements by four former top U.S. officials,; the very people who were responsible for the impressive U.S. arms effort in the sixties; the people who dropped on Vietnam a quantity of explosives greater than that dropped during the last world war," and who are now "explaining to us that the European states should in practice do without the U.S. security guarantee." [Footnote: Mr McNamara, Mr McGeorge Bundy, Mr George Kennan and Mr Gerard Smith]

"The U.S. uncertainties would be less worrying," Mr Hernu specified, "if very official voices were not tending to cast doubt on the nature of U.S. plans toward Europe. General Rogers, NATO supreme commander, has made an increasing number of statements over the past few months stressing conventional weapons." However, "nuclear deterrence has been the best means of preventing conflicts for more than 30 years and it still is.... In addition, we in Europe know that any war, be it conventional, chemical or nuclear, would be a holocaust. We are also afraid that any conflict, even a so-called 'conventional' one, even one accompanied by the 'no first use' pledge, might inevitably degenerate into a nuclear conflict. Thus, our aim is to prevent war. And only nuclear deterrence is capable of doing that."

The French Government has thus advocated the deployment of the U.S. Euromissiles in Europe and the improvement of its own deterrent force. Mr Hernu made the following remark in passing: "National studies on the enhanced-radiation weapons (neutron bomb) are conclusive. We could manufacture and deploy those weapons if the decision to do so was taken. I hasten to add that such a decision has not been taken."

During the debate which followed, the French minister spoke against a possible postponement of the deployment of the U.S. Euromissiles in Europe: "Yes, those Pershing missiles must be deployed on schedule (end of 1983)," he said, "if the negotiations (U.S.-Soviet negotiations on arms limitation) fail."

Returning to his criticism of the "Rogers doctrine," he explained that his government agreed "on the need to have modern, mobile multipurpose conventional forces," but, he said, "why emphasize that point now at the expense of others? By dint of wishing to place the emphasis on just one expect, the conventional aspect, you cast doubt on the rest, namely on nuclear deterrence as a means of preventing war in Europe....I have the impression that General Rogers is only telling half the story. If he does not tell the other half, then there is reason to be worried."

GENERAL POIRIER INTERVIEW ON NUCLEAR STRATEGY

PM021615 Paris LE MATIN in French 24 Nov 82 p 24

[Interview with Gen Lucien Poirier, director of the French National Defense Studies Foundation, by Jean-Luc Martin -- date and place not given]

[Text] LE MATIN: This year's defense budget is being strongly criticized. What is the state of the French deterrence strategy? Are we not now witnessing an erosion of its credibility?

Lucien Poirier: Our deterrence strategy has not changed since De Gaulle's days. A medium-sized power like France can only deter an adversary which directly attacks its national territory at the nuclear level. As for credibility, it does not lie in the confidence which we have in nuclear weapons, but in the adversary's perception of that threat and in what he would think of it in a crisis period when he would have to decide on his attack. A head of state can always display a particular intention, but in fact, only the real test in the form of a crisis counts. If Mr Mitterrand now said that he would protect allied territories during a serious crisis by threatening to use our massive nuclear reprisals, it is probable that nobody would believe him, and especially not the Soviets who are well aware that for the time being, for example, the French people would not risk their lives to protect Hamburg.

LE MATIN: Nonetheless, surely it is pure illusion to think that France could remain outside a conflict which would lay waste the neighboring countries?

Lucien Poirier: France has two strategies which are linked. One is its own defense and that is the nuclear deterrent. The other stems from pledges made with the allies. In that sphere at present, cooperation can only take place on a strategy based on conventional weapons. History teaches us that the coalitions and the firm statements made during peacetime completely collapse under the impact of a serious crisis. Although our political commitments are real, our strategic responses can only be hypotheses: We do not know how our allies would react in case of an open conflict. Hence, the need to provide oneself with a final solution -- and that is nuclear deterrence, the egoistical defense of our territory.

LE MATIN: If French deterrence is necessarily intended solely to protect French territory, is it not possible to conceive of nuclear deterrence on a European scale?

Lucien Poirier: Yes, if there is political unity first and if all the populations have feelings of solidarity with their neighbors. Yes, if the inhabitants of Bordeaux accept that the head of state could brandish and use the threat of a nuclear response just as much to save Munich as to save Bordeaux. Yes, if Londoners and Romans think that too. However, those conditions do not exist. Thoughts of a unified nuclear defense remain illusory as long as there is no political unity identifying the partners' risks and interests. That does not mean that we do not want to contribute to European defense. Some people make the defense policy say what it has never said, in other words, that it is neutralist.

It has always been said that we stood by our neighbors, provided they kept their promises themselves.

LE MATIN: Is there reason to doubt that?

Lucien Poirier: There is reason to wonder whether the Western world -- a consumer society -- would be capable of withstanding a serious military crisis. Can we imagine the psychological impact which a single nuclear strike in the FRG or France would have? Who can say how the peoples and governments would behave in face of their terror? That is what makes strategy difficult. What would an acute crisis between the superpowers be in the nuclear age? Nobody knows. Which military chief can be assured of waging a nuclear war on an authentic scale in such a small and densely populated theater as the European one? Which politician could rely on the cohesion of his people and his allies once the crisis began? It is those uncertainties which create the barrier between the superpowers, and at present prevent direct nuclear war between them. There is a kind of "rationalizing virtue of uncertainties." Nobody knows, so nobody makes a move.

However, that barrier implies indirect strategies. It seems to me that the main problem at present is not so much Europe's defense, as our reactions to the enemy's indirect strategies. For the time being the superpowers do not really stand to gain from starting a major crisis when they have the whole of the rest of the world in which to measure up to each other.

LE MATIN: NATO Commander in Chief General Rogers recently proposed strengthening the conventional forces in the European theater. What do you think of that attitude?

Lucien Poirier: The Americans have always tended to do that, especially since they are aware of the Europeans' reluctance to be the targets of a nuclear war on their territory. The Americans, and this is a logical example of differences among allies, stand to gain from deferring the use of nuclear weapons for as long as possible in order to maintain control over the escalation of a crisis. Thus, they give themselves the best possible chance of settling the conflict with the adversary before having to use their strategic nuclear systems. The Germans, however, stand to gain from the threat to use nuclear weapons being brandished as early as possible, in the hope of saving their territory.

LE MATIN: Do tactical nuclear weapons, the neutron bomb for instance, offer an intermediate strategic solution which is likely to lead to closer cooperation among allies?

Lucien Poirier: Nuclear weapons, be they low energy weapons or not, tactical or strategic, cannot be shared. They are still now national weapons. The Americans have placed nuclear weapons at the disposal of the Allies' Command in Europe, but they keep over their use. In other words, in Europe, aside from France and Britain, the decision to use nuclear weapons could change some technical and operational facts, , but the bases of our strategy remain unchanged. I repeat: If we want to contribute to our allies' defense, that can only be done with conventional weapons.

LE MATIN: What choice would you make if you had to decide the orientations of defense policy?

Lucien Poirier: I note that in the discussion on the defense budget, references to the principles of our strategy are constant: nuclear deterrence on the one hand, foreign action on the other. Having said that, it is natural that preference should be given in the arms programs arena to nuclear weapons systems which contribute to the credibility of our threat of reprisals.

In particular, the nuclear submarines. Moreover, I would warn against all technical solutions which would conflict with the strategic principles. Thus, improvements to our tactical nuclear panoply should remain compatible with the logic of our strategy of deterrence of the strong by the weak. As for military support for France's foreign policy, as for the defense of our interests outside Europe, it is clear that we must have the means of shouldering our responsibilities in the world. The recent example of Lebanon, like previous examples in Africa, demonstrate that there is no lack of opportunities for military action.

PRESIDENTIAL AIDE IN DPRK; RECOGNITION HINT

PM021325 Paris LE MATIN in French 25 Nov 82 p 10

[Christian Casteran report: "One of Mitterrand's Advisers in North Korea"]

[Excerpt] Has one more step been taken toward France's recognition of North Korea? Francois de Grossouvre, Francois Mitterrand's adviser at the Elysee, at present is in Pyongyang. This is the second visit to North Korea by a French Government "special envoy" since the visit made by Socialist Senator Philippe Machefer in December 1981. It is recalled by the French side that Francois de Grossouvre had accompanied Francois Mitterrand to Pyongyang during a visit which the latter made in February 1981, when he was merely the PS first secretary.

Francois Mitterrand's "adviser's" present mission to Pyongyang is not, Paris asserts, aimed at "preparing for France's recognition of the North Korean regime. The aim is merely to maintain contact." Nonetheless, it is added, "the idea of recognition is still being considered." This idea is ambitious; France would establish diplomatic relations with Kim Il-song's regime if an Eastern bloc country did the same with South Korea. Nonetheless, it is indicated, France will not recognize Pyongyang before the president of the republic has visited Seoul. That visit is scheduled for May.

BERLINGUER ADDRESSES SESSION ON PCI DOCUMENT

[Text] The publication of the document drawn up by the commission elected by the Central Committee and Central Control Commission and which is now submitted to this meeting for ratification and amendments will mark the specific start of the pre-congress debate throughout the party. It should be published on 28 November.

The postponement by a few days from the envisaged date, caused partly by the government crisis, means that the date of the national congress will also be postponed by a week and will therefore take place on 2-6 March.

It is our belief that the fact that a government crisis -- still unresolved and of uncertain duration -- has occurred in the interim must not influence the congress timetable, unless the crisis unfortunately leads to the early dissolution of Parliament and a general election.

We have clearly stated our opposition both to an umpteenth revival of the five-party coalition, following its repeated failures, and to a short-term government which, in view of the dramatic problems that need to be resolved, would be an irresponsible decision in the country's eyes. At the same time, while standing firm on the prospect of the democratic alternative, we have indicated, as we did back in August, the new criteria and methods that should be followed in the composition of any new government and certain immediate priorities including, first and foremost, that of making the General Confederation of Italian Industry step down from its stubborn and narrow-minded position in the negotiations with the United Trade Union Federation. We have also suggested measures for positive intervention in the economy and the public budget, starting with a revision of the finance bill.

The fact is that while the country's overall conditions are deteriorating -- and this is confirmed to us by every new fact that emerges -- the government crisis drags on in a confused and obscure manner without any hint of responsible solutions, new ideas or lasting programs emerging.

Up to now, nothing is known about how it is intended to settle the conflicts of approach and method that have characterized the life of the ministries in the fallen government. The impression is that every party is still carrying grist to its own mill as best it can and concerning itself with presenting its own side to the public, with attention solely on its own true or supposed interests with a view to more or less early elections.

And, while everyone is crying and shouting about a situation that is described as verging on disaster, none of the parties will consider emerging from the political framework and from the kinds of government that have existed in recent years, each of which has provided its own impetus to the country's slide down the slope to disaster now being deplored.

The contradiction is huge. In the past few days there have been hints from various sides of a willingness to establish new relations with the Communist Party. Their characteristics, however, remain hazy, without any specific substance or proposals. No one has stated clearly what is being asked of us. And here there emerges another obvious contradiction in the conduct of the parties negotiating for the formation of the new government.

While reserving the right to judge the development of the crisis as it progresses and its conclusion, it can already be said that if a government emerges on the bases now being negotiated, it will again be a precarious, weak, divided government, unequal to the country's needs.

Therefore, it is all the more important that our party present a new and clear proposal -- a proposal capable of modifying the grave national problems, indicating possible solutions to them.

This is the purpose of the document to be presented to the Central Committee today. It has been drawn up by the commission which we appointed for this purpose -- and which has therefore completed its activities -- and received contributions, in the section concerning the party, from the commission on organization and regulations, which will continue its activities until the congress. Both commissions have worked very hard. The former held five plenary meetings and delegated certain comrades to hold meetings -- with the help of the economic policy studies center and the center for state reform -- with two groups of experts, one composed of jurists, the other of economists. Both these meetings, which were attended by eminent scholars, including nonparty members, proved very useful in the formulation of specific proposals.

The second commission held four meetings, discussing many aspects of the life of our organization, not all of which, obviously, could be included in the section on the party, to avoid overburdening it, but which themselves constitute useful material on which to work with a view to the congress.

The document, as we established at our previous session, is not in the nature of "theses" such as those submitted to the 15th congress, which redefined all aspects of the party's stances and which, in their fundamental formulation, must still be regarded as an integral part of our political and ideological platform. The chief aim of the document for the 16th congress was to define and specify the various aspects of our proposal of the democratic alternative. This task has led us to define our program objectives so that the alternative about which we are talking can have the necessary precise substance in the economic, institutional, cultural and foreign policy fields.

This also explains the scale of the document, which we certainly wish could have been briefer, though the text submitted here is nevertheless more concise than the theses for our previous congress.

Following the positive discussion of economic matters, it was necessary to provide a summary of the proposals that we put forward for a new kind of development capable of providing fresh stimulus to the production forces: tackling inflation, the very serious situation affecting the public budget and the tangle of interests, corporative impediments and cronyist structures that lower the Italian economy's average output and that form the substance of the DC's power system. This section highlights the topic of the reform of public finance and the utilization of currently unused resources and production factors. One mainstay of the section of the document on economic policy is the indissoluble link between strict and rigorous measures and criteria of social equity and fiscal justice, with a view to starting a qualitatively diffferent kind of development, with broad consensus.

A special section is devoted to the subject of culture, regarded both as a resource and as the objective of a new development; in it particular emphasis is placed on the commitment needed to guarantee the country the indispensable scientific and technological updating which it needs to remain among the most highly developed countries.

The need for a new kind of development and and its indispensable democratic planning raise the entire issue of the reform of the state and of the public administration. And this constitutes the material of another part of the document.

The problems of Italian democracy are primarily political, since they stem from the anticommunist discrimination that has made our democratic system defective, incomplete and distorted. But there are also specific problems in the functioning and reform of the institutions, which concern both "upper branches" of the state -- Parliament and the government -- and the so-called "lower branches," that is, the structures of the state and of the public services with which the citizens come into contact; not to mention the restoration of correct relations between parties and institutions and between parties and society.

It was also necessary to explain our foreign policy proposals, in which a confirmation of the PCI's verdict on Italy's international position is accompanied by indications of line and initiative on the many grave unresolved problems in the world. In this connection we are watching attentively and hopefully signs of an alleviation of tension that seem to have emerged in the past few days between the USSR and the United States and between the USSR and China. But we must avoid lapsing into complacent optimism, because the arms race continues unarrested -- (the MX program was announced yesterday) -- and because such unresolved problems as those of the Middle East, Central America, Afghanistan, Poland and other parts of the world are still acute.

The body of program proposals contained in the document has assumed a form that is basically positive and innovative. At the same time, it is so substantial that, on a final overall reading, the proposal concerning the social and political forces essential for the alternative seemed to assume a rather too marginal significance, as if it were an afterthought to the exposition of the substance. The editorial committee has therefore rearranged this sections of the document, partly to facilitate reading, starting, after the introduction, with the exposition of the line regarding the social and political forces, then proceeding to the remainder of the prbgram.

The document ends with the topics of internationalism and the party -- that is, our view of socialism -- with a confirmation of the stances adopted over a long period of time and developed recently, with special emphasis on the aspects of party life that seem most important for satisfying present needs and our policy.

As the comrades can see, the precongress document broaches issues and puts forward proposals that transcend the immediate political situation. But it is by no means divorced from the emergency being experienced by the Italian people, and indeed it proceeds directly from it, indicating the efforts which can be made at once for a thorough change of course in which the forces of labor and change must be mobilized.

Following the Central Committee's ratification and its publication, it will become the subject of a broad and free discussion among all comrades, and also an exchange of views with other political and social forces and comments from the public and the press. We must be prepared for and open to all contributions, including critical ones, that move toward giving Italy a new and advanced political and economic order.

Far from closing the party in on itself, the precongress document should, by virtue of its very nature and the objectives that it sets, stimulate multifarious initiatives from its organizations, starting with the more pressing issues facing us.

Tomorrow there will be a general strike by industrial workers, which will doubtless be followed by other events in the harsh struggle which the trade unions are forced to wage because of the narrow-minded and arrogant attitude of the General Confederation of Italian Industry, which is aimed at gaining class retaliation. The entire party must make a thorough commitment to support the workers' struggles. Next Saturday will mark the beginning of a new stage in the antirearmament movement, with the commencement of the Milan-Comiso march. Following Palermo, Verona and Ottaviano, several more mass initiatives promoted by the party and by joint committees are planned against the Mafia, the Camorra and drug abuse. Then there is the 1983 membership and recruitment campaign, which is now of particular political importance in reaffirming the party's mass character and its more open relationship with society.

These are only some examples that show us how much is required from the party in connection with struggles and the labor world during the course of the debate for its 16th national congress.

Document Amendments Discussed

PM011533 Venice L'UNITA in Italian 26 Nov 82 pp 1, 22

[Giorgio Fransca Polara report on PCI Directorate members Edoardo Perna and Adalberto Minucci 25 November press conference in Rome: "Central Committee Launches Document. Approach to Congress Begins"]

[Text] Rome -- At the end of a busy working session lasting 2 and 1/2 days, the Central Committee and Central Control Commission yesterday evening approved the final text of the policy document that will form the basis for discussion with a view to the 16th sections: The document consists of an introduction and seven sections: The democratic alternative, the economic crisis, culture as a national issue, institutional reform, Italian foreign policy, the future of socialism, and the regeneration and development of the party. The full text of the document will be published by L'UNITA Sunday.

Yesterday there was once again an examination of dozens of amendments and repeated votes. Comrades Edoardo Perna and Adalberto Minucci reported to journalists on the most significant aspects of the discussion at the usual meeting at the PCI headquarters' press room yesterday afternoon. Newsmen's questions concentrated first on the section devoted to the future of socialism. In particular, it was asked whether the text of the document confirms the concept of the "exhaustion of the driving force" of the October Revolution and what stance was adopted by Comrade Armando Cossutta.

"There was an in-depth debate on these issues in the commission responsible for drawing up the draft document," Perna said. "The theme proposed to the Central Committee and Central Control Commission, citing well-known documents and the stances adopted following the events in Poland, embodies the idea of the exhaustion of the propulsive thrust of a historical experience of socialism -- the one characterized by the political, state and ideological model realized in the USSR. There was further discussion on this issue and Comrade Cossutta submitted amendments that confirm his known positions."

[Question] Were there a series of amendments or a single, substantial document?

[Answer] Cossutta decided to present his overall position, explaining the significance of his amendments partly in connection with the parts of the draft document that he himself believed should be retained. Then we proceeded to a discussion of his amendments.

[Question] Were Cossutta's amendments signed by him alone?

[Answer] Yes.

[Question] At a previous Central Committee meeting, Cossutta presented an opposition line not only in foreign policy but also in domestic policy and particularly on economic issues and on the indexing system. Was this stance reflected in a homogenous body of amendments?

[Answer] No. The evening before last, Cossutta submitted an amendment on the section devoted to the economic crisis which, together wuth several others, served to amplify the original version. [answer ends]

Perna said that the discussion was richest and most extensive precisely on the sections concerning the economy and the future of socialism, on which the most amendments were submitted. "In the section on the economy," he said, "there were no outright contrapositions of line. Rather, there was a concern to update our arguments on the latest events indicating a further exacerbation of the socioeconomic situation, taking account of the developments in the trade unions' initiative."

Comrade Municci gave some examples in this connection: "We discussed the function of the development of social services and investment aimed at improving living standards, partly with a view to providing incentives for the production of goods and the expansion of the economy as a whole. A positive answer was given, and precise amendments in this direction were approved." Minucci was asked for an assessment of Fanfani's program. Having stressed that this topic naturally lies outside the congress document, Minucci issued a negative verdict. "The impression that one derives from the prime minister-designate's 18 points," he said, "is that in some cases we are actually witnessing a deterioration with respect to the outgoing government's economic policy stances. Everything is very generic, but the aim is to hit low incomes again. This is the most negative factor. There are also many ambiguous points -- for instance, the reference to a wealth tax, which is entirely vague. In any case, the trade unions have also issued a negative verdict."

Returning to the Central Committee and Central Control Commission proceedings, journalists asked further questions about the alternative, relations with the socialists and the recent CPSU leadership changes.

[Question] What is new regarding relations with the PSI?

[Answer] In our proposal of a democratic alternative, we reassert the idea that a political change must be based primarily on the leftwing forces. We criticize the PSI when it seems to make a possible alternative conditional on a future reduction of the PCI's size. We naturally reject this stance, while also rejecting any spirit of supremacy, with the essential intention of advancing a unitary and regenerative process and working for the prospect of surmounting old divisions between communists and socialists.

[Question] Can it be said, therefore, that the "historical compromise" is dead and buried?

[Answer] We have tried to give answers that leave as little as possible open to misunderstandings. I repeat: We consider as essential to an alternative those leftwing forces and also any other forces that may be able and willing to participate in it. We do not believe that the objective of change can be achieved by means of a government understanding with the DC. This does not mean that the alternative implies a split down the middle of the country or a rupture between the major democratic forces on key topics such as the defense of democracy and peace.

[Question] What about the innovations in Moscow?

[Answer] These were only mentioned during the debate; but the general assessments contained in the congress document are obviously not bound to temporary factors, however important these may be. The document contains a reference to the resumption of relations between the USSR and China -- a factor that we consider positive and that demonstrates the validity of a viewpoint that we have expressed for some time regarding the possibility, irrespective of even substantial disagreements of opportunities for rapprochement on essential topics such as the safeguarding of peace.

ANTONOV LAWYERS ARGUE INNOCENCE BEFORE COURT

AU030855 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 3 -- All the findings turned up by Rome magistrates investigating the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II on May 13 last year have been turned over to the three judges of the grand jury who will be asked to rule on a motion filed by the defense for Bulgarian Sergey Ivanov Antonov, detained in connection with the shooting.

The assistant manager of the Bulgarian airlines office was arrested by anti-terrorist police on November 25 and charged as an accomplice to the crime. Self-styled Turkish terrorist Mehmet Ali Agca was captured at the scene of the shooting in Saint Peter's Square and sentenced to life imprisonment following conviction on the charge of firing shots which seriously wounded the pope.

In their motion, Antonov's defense attorneys argue against the allegation that their client was present in the square that day and cite statements made by the defendant's colleagues in testifying that he did not leave his office at any time during the day of the shooting.

The Court of Freedom, Italy's version of the grand jury system, was instituted in the summer and is made up of three magistrates who must determine whether the arrest was legal, if there is sufficient evidence to substantiate the charges against the prisoner or to warrant continued pre-trial detention and similar issues. When a motion is filed with the court, the judges must rule within five days whether to hold the prisoner or release him.

In a related development Thursday, the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome released a note thanking the "numerous Italian citizens" who have voiced their solidarity with Antonov since his arrest last week.

The statements represented a marked shift away from the tough line taken by the embassy earlier in defending the airlines manager. In conciliatory tones, the note said that there is no doubt that Italian magistrates will find that he was not at all involved in the allegations raised against him and "renewed...the full confidence and consideration of the Bulgarian Government" as regards these magistrates.

Earlier this week, Bulgaria hinted at a possible exchange of two Italian nationals, detained in Bulgaria on espionage charges, for Antonov.

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS HOLD 1 DECEMBER MEETING

NC012032 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 2000 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] Another meeting within the framework of the intercommunal talks was held at the Ledra Palace Hotel this afternoon. According to a UN statement, during this meeting there was a general exchange of views. Also according to the statement, there will be another meeting next Tuesday [7 December].

Current Phase Ends

[Text] The last meeting of the current phase of the intercommunal talks is taking place at the Ledra Palace Hotel, the next meeting will be held at the beginning of January.

Prior to the meeting, Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, stated that next Sunday he will go to New York to brief UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar on the last phase of the intercommunal dialogue. Mr Gobbi declined to make an appraisal of the course of the dialogue, saying that he did not want to clash with either side. He clarified, however, that the most sensitive points of the Cyprus problem have not yet been solved and that the two sides have different approaches to the territorial aspect.

Greek Cypriot interlocutor Mavromatis stated that today's agenda is open to discussion of any question. Answering questions, Mr Mavrommatis said that there was an indepth discussion on the territorial aspect during the previous meeting. He added that discussion of the territorial aspect will take many meetings and much time. He stressed: We have not abandoned the territorial aspect. We are simply following various ways in order to deal with all questions.

Turkish Cypriot interlocutor Onan stated that at today's meeting a general exchange of views was to take place on the questions which have already been discussed, including both the territorial and the constitutional questions. Mr Onan declined to comment on reports that he has asked for the submission of a new map by the Greek Cypriot side and said that whatever he was asked has been at the negotiations table.

DENKTAS SAYS TERRITORIAL ISSUE BEING DISCUSSED

TA011307 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 1 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that the territorial issue is being taken up at the intercommunal talks as a complete issue and regions were not being discussed separately. Sepaking to correspondents this morning, President Denktas recalled that the minipackage agreement had been obstructed by the Greek Cypriots when they rejected the Turkish Cypriot proposals on Varosha. He repeated that the territorial issue being deadlocked consistently because of the intransigent policies adopted by the Greek Cypriot leadership. President Denktas said that it had been the Greek Cypriot leadership which had rejected the positive proposals of the Turkish Cypriot side of the Varosha issue. He stated that because of these developments, the territorial issue was being taken up as a whole and a decision would be reached on the whole of the territory.

On the question that the Greek Cypriots would not present a new map for discussion at the intercommunal talks on the territorial issue, President Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriot side was not responsible for the actions of the Greek Cypriots.

PAPER URGES UN TO WORK FOR TALKS' PROGRESS

NC030915 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 3 Dec 82 p 5

[From the "Positions" column: "More Active"]

[Text] What Mr Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special envoy in Cyprus, said or implied in his statement prior to the intercommunal talks meeting on the day before yesterday admitted lack of substantive progress in the talks. Nevertheless, admission of lack of progress is not enough. Mr Gobbi must, of course, advise UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar to promote fresh methods or to pressure the Turkish side to abandon its negative attitude so the prerequisites for substantive progress in the dialogue may be created. It has been repeatedly said that the UN must undertake a more active role in the Cyprus issue. It appears that the UN secretary general does have such intentions. However, we note that we have not seen this more active role or increased interest demonstrated in practice one way or the other. With the passing of time it is noted that the dialogue cannot produce concrete and substantive results.

We will again reiterate that Mr Perez de Cuellar and the international community in general have increased responsibilities for the Cyprus issue, and they must seriously evaluate the lack of substantive progress in the talks. Let them thus seek ways and means for substantive progress to be made in finding a fair and permanent Cyprus solution, as the UN resolutions precisely provide. This is their responsibility and we believe that they will not fail to fully undertake it.

SPOKESMAN DENIES ALLEGATIONS ON TIES WITH ATHENS

NC021919 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] Referring to allegations in connection with Athens-Nicosia relations, the government spokesman has stated that cooperation between Athens and Nicosia is outlined in a responsible way in the communique released in Athens on 20 October and that any other assessment is arbitrary. The communique said that the Governments of Greece and Cyprus, within the framework of close and sincere cooperation and of their regular consultations and within a cordial atmosphere, review Cyprus developments, exchange useful views on the prospects in sight and make decisions on the necessary actions.

The spokesman added that the national question of Cyprus and the question of relations between the Governments of Greece and Cyprus are of such major importance that it is inconceivable that they should be involved in any electoral expediencies.

PAPER SCORES STATEMENT BY PASOK YOUTH OFFICIAL

NC030845 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 3 Dec 82 p 8

[Editorial: "Necessary Stance"]

[Text] The statement which PASOK youth representative Manikas made to journalists can be described as unfortunate, inadmissible and unacceptable. His obvious interference in the election campaign currently underway in Cyprus is equally inadmissible, particularly in view of the fact that it favors a specific political party which will be contesting the elections for the office of president of the republic.

We are, indeed, sorry for this event. Naturally we wholeheartedly hail Mr Manikas' presence in Cyprus as a brother from Greece. But along with this we cannot remain indifferent toward his unconstructive policy during his visit to Cyprus, because this policy cannot bring about anything positive. And this is dangerous for the entire Hellenic nation, particularly under the current historical conditions.

It is our belief that he acted spontaneously and under the influence of the environment which was hosting him. But along with this, we note the following:

Speaking on behalf of the Greek Government and PASOK, as Manikas himself hinted, means that he tried to involve the Greek Government and PASOK in the preelection activities taking place in Cyprus. In our opinion, such a thing would have been unfair.

It definitely would not have been proper and Mr Manikas would not have liked it if a party cadre from Cyprus visited Greece during an election campaign and embarked on the same activities as he himself has done during his stay here.

We believe that his statement is outside the spirit of the recent joint communique by President Kiprianou and Greek Prime Minister Papandreou.

The current crucial moments for the Hellenic nation and particularly for martyr Cyprus do not justify such behavior, especially when it comes from a leading cadre of Greece's youth movement.

We again express regret for what has happened. We accept with unlimited gratitude Greece's aid and alignment but we view with great concern anything that tends to disturb relations between Cyprus and Greece.

HURRIYET CLAIMS CYPRUS 'IMPORTANT' DRUGS CENTER

NC030732 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 28 Nov 82 p 6

[Excerpts] Since the Italian police recently uncovered the biggest narcotics and arms smuggling network in the world, attention has again been focused on the Mediterranean, known as Europe's largest narcotics center. In the Mediterranean, where vessels set sail for unknown destinations by frequently changing names, a vessel known as the "Red Sea" was captured last month with a heavy load of heroin.

The first information about the "Red Sea" had come from Corfu. The police had seized two small vessels loaded with hashish and heroin. The crew were also captured. During the investigations, one of the crew "sang" [otmus] and warned the police about the "Red Sea."

At this, Greek sea and air units and the Italian "Guardia di Finanze" put the southern Adriatic Sea under surveillance and the "Red Sea" was captured by a destroyer off the coast of Greece.

It is known that those who deal in such "obscure affairs" as narcotics smuggling in the Mediterranean frequently change the names of their vessels and assign ownership to imaginary persons. They also frequently change their crew. Generally, the vessel leaves port for a definite destination, but when it puts out to sea the captain receives instructions to change direction. During the trip, the vessel is painted anew, it is given a new pre-determined name and it is equipped with false documents.

On the other hand, because of the political disturbances that have been going on in Lebanon, Larnaca airport in the Greek Cypriot sector has become an important center for narcotics smugglers from all over the world to meet and act comfortably. Bags full of hashish, heroin and raw opium thrown into the sea are picked up by small fishing boats, brought to the shore and specially packed at small ports on the southern coast of Cyprus. It is possible to find large quantities of heroin in the canned cheese exported to Europe from Cyprus.

PASIN'S STATEMENT ON RETURN FROM GATT MEETING

[Text] State Minister Sermet Refik Pasin returned to Turkey today after attending the GATT meetings in Geneva. In a statement at Istanbul Yesilkoy airport, Pasin said that at the meetings the delegates discussed the present world economic crisis and ways of preventing the increasingly growing tendency of protectionism. He added that the ministers who attended the meetings had differing opinions about that, but that they had managed to agree on a joint statement.

Pasin pointed out that within the GATT framework, Turkey was considered a developing country, and for this reason it could benefit from the GATT resolutions. Pasin later went to Ankara from Istanbul.

[Text] Erzurum, eastern Turkey, 30 Nov (AA) -- Two convicts, Mehmet Savas and Dursun Ali Kucuk, were condemned to death Tuesday by the Erzurum Martial Law Court for homicide and attempting to "partition the Turkish territory." The judge commuted later the death sentence of Savas on the grounds that he had been a minor when he had committed the crime. Other defendants in the case were sentenced to 10 years each.

VOTCP: ECEVIT TO VISIT SWEDEN IN DECEMBER

TA270842 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 27 Nov 82

[Excerpts] Bulent Ecevit, the leader of the now-dissolved Republican People's Party, will leave for Sweden next month together with his wife as the guest of the Swedish Prime Minister Olof Palme. Palme has invited Ecevit and his wife to a meeting to be held with the Colombian Nobel literature prize winner. Taking into consideration that the invitation extended to Ecevit and his wife has no political implications, the Ankara Martial Law Command decided to issue a diplomatic passport for them.

VOTCP SCORES U.S. PROPOSALS AT NATO MEETING

[Unattributed Commentary]

[Text] The European NATO countries began their meetings in Brussels on 29 November. Turkish National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken and Deputy Chief of the General Staff General Oztorun are participating in these meetings. If you look at the issues being discussed at these meetings and at the developments in Turkey, you will realize that the Turkish people will be placed under a new and heavy burden of arming and military expenditures.

During these NATO meetings, through Defense Secretary Weinberger and NATO Supreme Commander Rogers -- who is a U.S. general -- the U.S. Administration is demanding an increase in military expenditures as well as the assumption by NATO countries of more commitments even outside NATO's area of influence. Rogers came to the meetings with the following proposals: The NATO countries must increase their arms expenditures by 4 percent, and the European countries must share the United States' commitments outside NATO.

With these proposals, the United States is asking all NATO member governments to reduce their budget allotments for the education, health and other social needs of their people, and to allot more money to arms in the name of defense. It is also asking the other NATO countries to undertake commitments for the Rapid Deployment Force [RDF] which was set up for intervention in the Middle East. Both proposals are of vital importance for Turkey. As you know, the U.S. demand to allot more money for weapons affects Turkey. The money alloted to arms and military expenditures in the 1983 budget was raised by more than 130 billion since last year to 450 billion. [currency not given]

As for the question of the RDF, with a new maneuver, the junta is trying to impose the RDF on the people. The day the NATO meetings started it was announced that a defense cooperation agreement was signed between Turkey and the United States. The fact that this agreement was signed only with the United States shows that Turkey immediately and with no hesitation accepted the commitments outside NATO which the United States has been trying to impose on the European NATO countries. In other words, it shows that the junta has accepted the deployment of the RDF in Turkey, and the entire load of the RDF at the expense of trampling our people's interests.

The agreement signed with the United States envisages the expansion and repair of airports in Mus, Van, Batman and other places; The placing of new military equipment in these airports; and the building of [word indistinct], fuel and ammunition depots there. The junta is trying to use the current NATO meetings in a bid to conceal this. The best evidence is the fact that the bilateral defence and cooperation agreement with the United States was signed on exactly the day the NATO meetings began.

PLO PERMITTED TO OPEN ONLY INFORMATION OFFICE

LD021448 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1300 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] The PLO will be allowed to establish only an information office in Finland. The Finnish Foreign Ministry clarified its attitude today toward the PLO's plan for an office, that there is no question of establishing a political PLO office in Finland. The Foreign Ministry said the PLO's office in Finland could only engage in information activity in Finland, but not in any kind of political activity.

The Foreign Ministry said it is necessary to clarify the attitude toward the PLO in order to avoid misunderstandings. A PLO representative, (Fuad Bitar), had talks with Foreign Minister Par Stenback and Foreign Ministry officials today. The PLO has been willing to set up a political office in Finland. PLO representative, (Fuad Bitar) said yesterday that an agreement in principle had been reached on the establishment of a political office in talks last summer. This was denied by the Foreign Ministry.

BATTALION FOR LEBANON TO BE REINFORCED

LD021920 Helsinki International Service in Finnish 1600 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] The Finnish UN battalion leaving for Lebanon will be reinforced with a guards' platoon of 33 men. Thus the total strength of the battalion will be 493 men. It was decided to revise the number of men following talks with the leadership of the UNIFIL and the UN Secretariat, the Ministry of Defense stated. The operational area of the Finnish battalion has also been fixed: The area borders in the north on the Litani River and in the East on the so-called Haddad country; in the south are Ghanaian troops and in the west, Nigerians until January. Advance units of the Finnish battalion have been preparing for the start of their duties in Lebanon since mid-November. The main force of the battalion will go to Lebanon in a week's time.

BULGARIAN KOMSOMOL DELEGATION VISITS ATHENS

NC031032 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 2 Dec 82 p 12

[Text] The visit of a Dimitrov Komsomol [DKMS] delegation, which arrived in Athens yesterday, constitutes an important step toward the tightening of relations between the Greek Communist Youth [KNE] and the Komsomol for the deepending of the friendship between the Greek and Bulgarian youths. The delegation, which is headed by Comrade Stanka Shopova, first secretary of the DKMS and member of the Bulgarian State Council, was met at the airport by a delegation of the KNE Central Council headed by its secretary, Comrade Spiros Khalvatzis.

The delegation met with a KNE delegation consisting of Comrade S. Khalvatzis and Comrades V. Papathanasopoulos, M. Angourakis and Nandia Valavani, members of the KNE Central Council, Amid a warm and friendly atmosphere, the two delegations briefed each other on developments in their countries and discussed bilateral relations. Special stress was put on the need for the Balkan youth organizations to undertake concrete initiatives in order to promote denuclearization of the Balkans.

In the afternoon the Bulgarian delegation attended a mass gathering held by the KNE at the Broadway Theater. Speaking at the gathering were Comrade Stanka Shopova and Comrade Spiros Khalvatzis, who reaffirmed the close brotherly relations between the KNE and the Dimitrov Komsomol -- relations which originate from the joint revolutionary theory of Marxism-Leninism and of proletariat internationalism. Today the Bulgairan delegation will meet with mass organizations and personalities.

OFFICIAL GAZETTE CONFIRMS CABINET APPOINTMENTS

LD031112 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0800 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Excerpt] This morning the ministers of the Socialist government will take the oath of office. The ceremony will take place at the Zarzuela Palace at 1230 in the presence of King Juan Carlos. Their appointment is published today in the official state gazette and takes the form of four royal decrees from the prime minister's office by which they are designated ministers and Don Alfonso Guerra is appointed deputy prime minister. The decrees also note the retirement of Juan Antonio Garcia Diez as deputy prime minister for economic affairs and of the ministers of the Calvo-Sotelo cabinet who hitherto have held an acting capacity.

Although Felipe Gonzalez, whose signature at the foot of these appointments appears for the first time in the official state gazette, reserved the right to make last-minute changes, the list of the new cabinet is the same as that which the prime minister announced during the investiture session.

EEC LEADERS DISCUSS ISSUES AT COPENHAGEN SUMMIT

NC031942 Paris AFP in English 1915 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] Copenhagen, Dec 3 (AFP) -- Leaders of the 10 European Economic Community countries met here today to shore up intra-market cohesion against a developing commercial threat by the United States that surfaced at the recent General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) conference in Geneva.

But the European Council's reinforcement efforts appeared diluted by accusations of protectionism, and a battle over a common fisheries policy.

West German Economy Minister Otto Lambsdorff accused France of protectionism, a charge sharply denied by French government spokesman Michel Vauzelle.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, according to a British source, was expected to push for a conclusion to a self-limitation accord with Japan. Mrs Thatcher was also expected to confront her Danish host, Premier Poul Schluter, over his refusal to go along with the other nine on a common fisheries policies as drawn up by the EEC Commission.

The 24th council summit was also to act on a bid to bring Spain and Portugal into the Common Market. Britain and West Germany called for a "strong political signal" in that direction, but France wanted to hold out until certain financial and economic problems had been ironed out.

The 10 were to deal as well with the problem of sparking the Community's economic growth, stagnating at a projected one percent for 1983, and reducing unemployment, anticipated at 12 million -- or 10 percent of the Community's aggregate population.

Tonight's traditional "fireside talk" at the Christiansborg Castle, seat of Danish Government and Parliament, was to be devoted primarily to an examination of East-West relations in light of the change of power in Moscow. Prospects of detente in Poland and the situation in Afghanistan were also on the unofficial agenda.

The Council today took no specific action on the implicit U.S. threat, raised at last week's GATT conference, to dump low-cost farm surplus on European markets, in retaliation to the Common Market's refusal to phase out farm subsidies.

The fisheries quarrel reportedly turned on Denmark's insistence on the right to fish 20,000 tons of mackerel, and on seven special licenses to fish the Shetland Islands. A British delegate said Britain would make no further concessions, saying, "this is the end of the road, and that is that."

Postpone Spain, Portugal Issue

NC032227 Paris AFP in English 2219 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] Copenhagen, Dec 3 (AFP) -- Leaders of the 10 European Economic Community countries spent the bulk of a five-hour discussion here this afternoon on how to spark the Community's economic growth in the face of stagnating development and an aggregate 12 million unemployed.

It took the heads of state or government only minutes, on the other hand, to postpone the single hard decision they had been expected to make here -- on the entry of Spain and Portugal into their grouping.

On that issue, which has been pending for years, it was decided to give the experts further time to review the "inventory" of all the problems the enlargement of the Community would have to face, and to take up the question again at another meeting in Brussels next March 21 and 22.

The main questions worrying the Ten about the two were reported to be the supplementary Community financing that would be required and how to protect Mediterranean agricultural products from such countries as France and Italy from the new competition.

Today's main subject was examined from the viewpoint of reinforced intra-market cohesion in the face of a developing threat from American trade, as it surfaced at the recent Geneva meeting of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT].

But such cohesion appeared difficult to obtain in view of charges traded in the current meeting here of increasing trends in Community countries toward self-serving protectionism. Accusations to that effect were notably voiced by West German Economy Minister Otto Lambsdorff against the French, who predictably rejected the charges immediately.

French President Francois Mitterrand said France was ready to dismantle any protectionist systems if its partners did the same.

Mr Mitterrand deplored a lack of "European consciousness", notably with regard to the United States, and declared that Europe could "not accept integration into a worldwide trade organization led by Washington", a reference to GATT.

He also said that it was not because of the Atlantic alliance tnat America should be allowed "to run our trade", an apparent reference to recent U.S. interference with European-Soviet cooperation on the Siberian gas pipeline project.

The French president also made a plea for an international monetary system that would link the joint Community currently, the ECU, with the dollar and the yen.

Another subject taken up by the meeting was a fishing rights dispute between Britain and host country Denmark that tonight seemed deadlocked, pending further discussions at an official dinner at Christiansborg Castle.

Kohl, Mitterrand View Entry

LD041136 Hamburg DPA in German 1056 GMT 4 Dec 82

[Text] Copenhagen, 4 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl, in a talk with French President Francois Mitterrand, emphatically advocated Spain's and Portugal's membership in the EC. During a working breakfast with Mitterrand at the residence of the French ambassador on Saturday, according to German delegation circles, Kohl said that the European Community was an incomplete body without Spain and Portugal. Membership was also necessary in the interest of democracy in the two countries.

Despite basic agreement on the political importance of an enlargement of the Community, Mitterrand pointed to the unsolved problems that Spain's membership posed for European, and above all, French agriculture (fruits, vegetables, wine, olive oil). The meeting between the two statesmen took place in an exceptionally pleasant atmosphere, persons close to the federal chancellor said.

Mitterrand on Protectionism

LD041400 Paris Domestic Service in French 1145 GMT 4 Dec 82

[Text] It is the second day of the European summit in Copenhagen. As expected, the 10 talked a great deal about customs barriers, how to conciliate protection of domestic markets and free trade.

This is the question the heads of state of European governments were asking themselves. For his part, Francois Mitterrand said that France is willing to undertake the dismantlement of protectionist systems should its partners be ready to make the same effort. Protectionism can only serve one purpose: as a retaliatory measure. Otherwise it is unacceptable, the French president said, who briefly and succinctly made his personal view clear to journalists this morning before returning to Paris. It looks as if the harmony within the 10 is far from being perfect. Here is Francois Mitterrand:

[Begin recording] I understand that certain complaints have been voiced on the temptation of protectionism in France. If there were to be any temptation, which is not the case, it would only be due to the effect of contagion which is a result of present protectionist policy from those countries who are denouncing it. This protectionism is rich in inventions and is generally very careful about not asserting itself through tariff measures, which are all too obvious, but does so through regulations, customs, habits and complications which many put into practice. I hope that all the irregularities from one country or the other will be brought before the European Commission in order to safeguard the internal homogeneity which is indispensable within the Community. This presupposes preferential tariffs, a customs union and the freedom of trade within the Community. Therefore, I hope that this clearing up is done as soon as possible. [end recording]

SPANISH PAPER INTERVIEWS CHANCELLOR KREISKY

PM031105 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 21 Nov 82 pp 8-9

[Interview with Austrian Chacellor Bruno Kreisky in Vienna by Pilar Zbonet -- date not given]

[Excerpt] Question: At a peace seminar recently held in Vienna you said that the small neutral states such as Austria and Sweden can contribute to international detente between the military blocs. In what way?

Answer: At the present time, the neutral states can play a very limited role. For instance, they can provide their services whenever they are requested by the various parties in a conflict. However, the cold war period made it clear that the nonaligned countries have formed an area of detente, a strip of disengagement in Europe. Austria, Switzerland and Yugoslavia -- two neutral states and a nonaligned state -- constitute a forbidden area as regards NATO, an area of disengagement running from the Hungarian Pannonian plain to the French Jura. Moreover, in northern Europe, Finland and Sweden from another barrier between NATO and the Warsaw Pact, in such a way that, except for the north cape, the two bloc systems, in fact, only touch each other on the border between the two Germanies and in Berlin. What I am now stating is that if the enlargement of this strip of disengagement is again discussed, a reduction of the military potential on both sides of the dividing line between the two blocs -- that is, in the FRG and in the GDR -- should be undertaken. To imagine this process taking place only on one of the two sides lacks realism.

Question: You have defended the Palestinians' interests in Europe. What in your opinion, is the solution to the conflict in Lebanon? On what should it be based?

Answer: In the first place, all efforts should concentrate on strengthening the Lebanese Government. And this, much to my regret, also involves setting up a Lebanese Army, since only a Lebanese Government with an army can ultimately secure the withdrawal of all the foreign troops occupying its territory. Austria, which was occupied by foreign troops, knows that a country is only free when there are no foreign troops on its territory.

So the first point of a solution would be the withdrawal of the foreign troops; the second, the humanitarian issue, lies in guaranteeing the protection of the 100,000 Palestinians who currently have no where else to go. Something like the Sabra and Shatila massacres must not be repeated. The third point is an attempt at the international level to induce Israel and the Palestinians to begin negotiations.

Question: How do you believe these negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians could come about?

Answer: The Palestinians should take into account the real situation. I will put it very simply: The PLO has secured all that it can expect from the USSR -- that is, just fine words. Now it is up to the Palestinians to find out what they can secure from the United States. This question has not yet been answered.

Question: Has President Ronald Reagan asked you for assistance in the matter of the Palestinians?

Answer: No, he has not asked me for assistance. It is a matter of cooperation. Reagan hopes for my cooperation, but he has not asked me for advice for assistance.

Question: What is your opinion of the Reagan plan for the Near East?

Answer: I believe that it is something which should be taken very seriously and in which Reagan should be supported. It represents a change in U.S. policy.

Question: You are of Jewish origin....

Answer: Yes.

Question: Yet, owing to its attitude toward the PLO, your government's relations with Israel are not exactly good....

Answer: We have normal and very good relations with Israel.

Question: But you have described Begin as a semifascist.

Answer: Yes, but that changes nothing; I have described Begin's government as semi-fascist, but relations are completely normal. We also had normal relations with Spain when that country had a fascist government. Relations among states are independent of systems. Nevertheless, relations with Israel will not be friendlier or closer as long as the regime continues as at present.

Question: Does being of Jewish origin mean anything specific to you?

Answer: It has no bearing because I am not a Zionist, however, I accept Israel as a state which emerged as a result of Hitler's persecution of the Jews. It is erroneous to imagine that all Jews are Zionists, just as it is erroneous to imagine that all Catholics have the same political tendencies or that all Germans are nationalists.

Question: How do you believe the international political situation will evolve following Brezhnev's death? Will Soviet foreign policy change under the new CPSU general secretary, Yuriy Andropov?

Answer: New men always bring new ideas with them. I do not personally know Andropov, but there are currently certain signs which can be described as positive. The ending of the U.S. sanctions on the turbines intended for the Soviet gas pipeline is one of them, since by this action the United States acknowledges that there are contracts with the USSR concerning the gas. This is very important.

In addition, the United States has sent a very high-ranking delegation to Brezhnev's funeral. The presence of Vice President George Bush and Secretary of State George Shultz is another good sign, as is also the telegram sent by President Reagan, and its wording. On the Soviet side there have also been positive signs, and now everything will depend on how the new men in the USSR behave -- not only Andropov but also the new head of state. Depending on who holds that post, there could also be a new Soviet foreign minister. Currently, it can be said that we are in a breathing space. Unlike the last few years, when one had no option but to be pessimistic, a little light can now be glimpsed at the end of the tunnel -- a little light at the end of a long tunnel.

Question: One idea of yours is the drawing up of a plan of economic assistance for Poland, in which Eastern bloc and Western states would take part together. What response has that plan had?

Answer: It is interesting to note that at first the idea had a very negative response almost everywhere, then it aroused interest, and now there is a relatively positive reaction.

Question: What states have expressed a positive opinion?

Answer: I do not wish to comment on this matter.

Question: Any Eastern bloc country?

Answer: Yes, in the Eastern bloc, too, there is a positive, interested reaction. The USSR has expressed doubts about the possibility that such a plan could be implemented without political strings, but it has not been negative.

Question: Austria is highly dependent on the Eastern bloc. Is that a handicap?

Answer: It is true that we are dependent for energy on the Eastern bloc, but the Eastern bloc needs our money as much or more than we need its electricity.

Question: What is your opinion of the current political situation in Spain?

Answer: In the first place, we rejoice at the Spanish Socialist Workers Party's [PSOE] overwhelming victory. Second, I am personally glad that [PSOE Secretary General] Gonzalez and his friends have behaved with such moderation and calm at the moment of victory, because that has dispelled a good deal of distrust.

Question: How are your personal relations with Felipe Gonzalez?

Answer: Very cordial. My personal relations with Felipe are very cordial.

Question: Better than with [French President] Mitterrand for instance?

Answer: I would not exactly say that. With Mitterrand relations has always been good. When Mitterrand became PS leader I was the first person to invite him to give a big lecture in Vienna, so that he might have the opportunity to address thousands of Austrian Socialists. With Mitterrand I have had very good relations; only on the issue of Israel have there been differences of opinion, which currently no longer exist.

With Felipe relations are very good but different. I had the opportunity to associate with him for the first time in Berlin, when he was still underground. I observed him carefully. Next I began to become acquainted with him and to esteem him. Later, we both flew to Tehran with Olof Palme. In that quite dangerous situation we became close friends, and since then our relations have become even more cordial, which is not common between such a young man and another who is so old. I am almost twice his age. Felipe and I esteem each other, and I have great confidence in him.

Question: What leading role do you believe the Spanish Socialists could have in Latin America?

Answer: Felipe did well to point out South America's importance. The Spanish Socialists certainly have the best prerequisites for understanding the situation in Latin America, and will be able to play a great role vis-a-vis the United States -- a mediatory role.

PLO REPRESENTATIVE GIVES 'STRONG' PEACE SIGNALS

AU041510 Vienna KURIER in German 3 Dec 82 p 3

[H.N. reports: "The PLO Now Hopes for 'Peace Through Moderation:' Palestinians Give More Signs of Moderation"]

[Text] In Vienna, the PLO has now given strong new peace signals. On Wednesday night, 'Abdallah Franji, head of the PLO office in Austria, stated in the presence of Austrian Chancellor Kreisky: "We want peace through negotiations, not through tanks and armies."

Franji listed the following as progress in the peace process, despite the Palestinian tragedy in Lebanon:

-- the PLO's readiness for a dialogue with those Israelis who "wish to conduct a dialogue with us."

-- The Middle East resolutions of the Arab summit of Fes: "This is new -- things in the Arab world have never before advanced this far."

-- The peace movement in Israel and the dialogue among Jews all over the world on a policy of reconciliation.

Chancellor Kreisky promised "out of his most profound conviction" to remain loyal to his solidarity with the Palestinians. Kreisky stated literally: "I stand on the side of the oppressed and persecuted. And it is to these that the Palestinians belong first and foremost."

WOERNER SATISFIED WITH STATE OF ALLIANCE

DW031137 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Interview with FRG Defense Minister Manfred Woerner by correspondent Gustav Trampe in Brussels on 2 December -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Woerner, what's the state of the alliance these days here in Brussels at the end of this meeting?

[Answer] In my opinion, the state of the alliance is quite satisfactory, if not good. This alliance is clearly able and willing to maintain its defense. Another thing that became very clear is that we are interested in constructive relations with the Soviet Union and that we adhere to the comprehensive disarmament offer of the Bonn summit and encourage the Soviets to respond to it.

[Question] NATO proposes to become less dependent on nuclear weapons and therefore to strengthen the conventional side. Whenever conventional defense is mentioned, people immediately think of the Bundeswehr. Presumably this will not be possible without additional costs for us.

[Answer] This is a NATO program which we have not yet given final approval to. However, we have introduced this program and it is now being carefully studied. This program is in keeping with our concept in the Federal Government -- just as we said while we were in opposition. This is not something concerning only the Germans; it is a matter concerning the whole alliance.

I think this will indeed entail some extra costs in the long run. We will just have to wait and see how much this amount is. However, I did not and do not leave any doubts that that in no event will any more funds be available -- at least not in the next 2 years -- than we have already raised with the greatest of efforts.

JENNINGER REPORTS ON TALKS IN EAST BERLIN

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- In the opinion of Philipp Jenninger (CDU), minister of state in the Federal Chancellor's Office, the GDR has come to terms with the change of government in Bonn. After his return from a 1-day talk in East Berlin, Jenninger told newsmen in Bonn today that this impression was underscored by the GDR's desire to continue the talks between experts in a number of areas. He had made it clear that in its policy, the Federal Government is guided by the principles of continuity, predictability and reliability. However, Bonn considers it important that East Berlin keep the agreements it has signed.

Jenninger said he repeated the federal chancellor's desire that GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker visit the Federal Republic some time next year. However, a date for the visit, which is regarded as reciprocating the visit to the GDR by former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, has not been set. Mid-1983 is under consideration. Conditions for the visit, however, are a good political climate and careful preparations, so that the high expectations of people in both parts of Germany will not be disappointed.

Asked about the compulsory currency exchange, Jenninger stressed that this topic remains open, but rescinding the increase by East Berlin is not a precondition for other talks. The present Federal Government has to accept what it found when it took office. In this connection, Jenninger denied press reports that the CDU/CSU has, through him, departed from "old positions" in East Berlin.

He also made it plain that the question of the compulsory currency exchange was certainly a main topic at a press conference in East Berlin, but not in his official talks with SED Politburo member Guenter Mittag and GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer. He said the GDR presented him with the old catalogue of demands. Jenninger also said the talks had been held in a friendly and businesslike atmosphere.

BARZEL ON INNER-GERMAN RELATIONS, PROBLEMS

DW031307 Bonn DIE WELT in German 3 Dec 82 p 5

[Interview with Rainer Barzel, minister for inner-German relations, by editor Wilfried Hertz-Eichenrode and Herbert Kremp in Bonn; date not given]

[Excerpts] WELT: Mr Minister, when you took office, among the problems you found with regard to relations with East Berlin was the unresolved question of the compulsory minimum currency exchange amount. Has anything changed in this respect since you have been in office? How is travel developing?

Barzel: Regarding the compulsory minimum currency exchange amount, the GDR has not moved so far. They know that we expect them to act according to our agreements. The current practice is in violation of the agreements. For this reason, and also because of the intolerable harassment, travel has been decreasing. Some 30 percent fewer people are traveling now than before the compulsory minimum currency exchange was increased.

WELT: Is a new deal being prepared under which the minimum currency exchange amount could possibly be reduced as a concession for large-scale projects such as the electrification of the Berlin-Helmstedt railway?

Barzel: The reestablishment of a situation we have agreed on is not something for which new services should be provided. That would also not be a prerequisite for further solid relations or for good-neighborly relations. We can certainly discuss new large-scale projects which are of interest to both parts of Germany. However, there must always be a balance between the activities on both sides. At any rate, I won't pay to have a violated agreement reestablished.

WELT: Do you consider the Elbe border line as one of the issues which cannot be resolved.

Barzel: This will be discussed. An old map has been rediscovered. We now have to take a close look at it and eventually it will have to be discussed. We are interested in the Elbe in connection with environmental protection problems, for example. The Elbe isn't clean enough and there are problems with fishing. As far as basic problems are concerned, however, I don't want to deal with them now.

WELT: When you were about to assume office in the new government, it was said that the other side would pursue a policy of "giving the cold shoulder." Has this negative expectation come true? Is there a "cold shoulder" policy?

Barzel: I know many people who feared there would be a "cold shoulder policy." However, it would be in the interests of the Soviet Union to maintain reasonable relations with the FRG. The GDR is also acting based on its own interests; it would serve their interests to have and develop the best possible good-neighborly relations. We have made it clear that we also want this. Now we should sit at the same table, but this should be done discreetly.

WELT: On 10-11 December, a conference between the chancellor and German economic managers will be held in Berlin. It is hard for many Germans to understand that although big automobilie firms are represented in Berlin, there is still one big government-owned automobile factory, namely Volkswagen, which has no production plant in Berlin.

Barzel: These are things which will certainly play a role in the talks between the chancellor and the businessmen in Berlin. I know how much is in the federal budget for Berlin and I know how important our subsidies are for travel to Berlin. Subsidies for air travel to Berlin will certainly not be cut. They are necessary for the city's viability. I know how important it is to have government-owned enterprises in Berlin. We will demand this.

BERLIN SPD CONFERENCE DIVIDED ON DUAL DECISION

[Text] Berlin, 4 Dec (DPA) -- The different views that exist within the Berlin SPD concerning the NATO dual decision became apparent on Saturday at the regional party conference during a discussion of an intra-German affairs motion to the SPD national party congress in January. The demand by the party's leftwing for an immediate halt to the deployment of U.S. arms on FRG territory was rejected by only a small margin following a heated discussion, which guest speaker, SPD National Executive member Erhard Eppler managed to prevent from getting out of hand.

Eppler affirmed his negative attitude toward the NATO dual decision, but warned at the same time that a position change on this question could "be understood or misunderstood as political tactics." Should the SPD decide to reject the NATO dual decision, then new, pertinent arguments would have to be found to justify this. Following Eppler's speech, the party delegates scheduled to speak decided not to discuss this subject.

DIRECT FRG-AFGHANISTAN FLIGHTS CANCELED

[Text] Bonn, 3 Dec (DPA) -- As of 1 December, there are no longer any direct flights between the FRG and Afghanistan. Ariana Afghan Airlines is no longer allowed to land in Frankfurt now that the old air traffic agreement, notice of the cancellation of which was given a year ago, expired on 30 November. This was confirmed by a spokesman of the Federal Transport Ministry in Bonn on Friday.

The cancellation took place because of a violation by Afghanistan of the international arrangement to combat air terrorism. Last year, Afghanistan received the hijackers of a plane flying to Pakistan. Other Western countries have also applied this regulation and blocked the Afghan airline. Negotiations over a new agreement are not in prospect at the moment.

PREMIER MAUROY CITED ON EUROPEAN DEFENSE

PM031413 Paris LE MONDE in French 1 Dec 82 p 8

["M.D." report: "Mr Mauroy Wants Negotiations To 'Reduce Risks of Conflict in Europe'"]

[Text] "There will never be real protection for Europe unless the Europeans in mainly provide it themselves," Mr Mauory said on Monday, 29 November, while being hosted at dinner by the West European Union Assembly. That was the first time that a French Government chief had attended a meeting of that European association, the only competent body in the defense sphere, which comprises the six founder members of the Community and Britain.

The premier also said: "If Europe is living in peace, it is thanks to unceasing vigilance... The French Government thinks it is vital to show the greatest vigilance toward any action which would lead to accepting the imbalance of forces on the European theater. Such a situation would eventually endanger peace."

"France will not drop its guard," the premeir also said, stressing that it is devoting 3.9 percent of its gross domestic product to defense this year and next year, "a percentage which was never equalled during the previous 7-year term."

Stressing that "France intends to freely decide the conditions for its security," the premier continued: "This fundamental principle -- that of our decisionmaking autonomy -- does not mean that France is unaware that its security is part of a European framework."

"It is appropriate to encourage increased responsibility by each of the European states," he said. Finally, turning to arms limitation "and eventually disarmament," Mr Mauroy stressed the role of the Soviet Union and the United States on whom "it mainly rests to adopt that course, in view of the considerable size of their respective arsenals," and concluded: "Our means could not initially be affected by negotiations which, moreover, we encourage. On the other hand, we are prepared to take part in negotiations which help to reduce the risks of conflict in Europe and remedy the imbalance of conventional forces by real and effective reductions.

MAUROY VIEWS NUCLEAR DETERRENCE, CIVIL DEFENSE

[Text] Chartres, France, Dec 5 (AFP) -- Premier Pierre Mauroy, inaugurating France's first nuclear-proof underground car park here, stressed the country's need for both a nuclear dissuasion strike force and civil protection.

Mr Mauroy said the two were "complementary". In the event of war, the parking lot would act as an atomic-proof shelter for 400 people. He said: "Those nations which are better protected against nuclear war, can speak and act with greater confidence."

He said Friday there were four main phases in France's civil protection policy:

1. Informing the general public of nuclear dangers.

2. Providing the necessary shelters and supplies for the civilian population in the event of a nuclear attack.

3. Building up a speedy alert system.

4. Boosting research into providing better shelters.

He called on local authorities to draw up a list of possible sites as anti-nuclear shelters.

MORE ETENDARDS, MUNITIONS SHIPPED TO ARGENTINA

NC032027 Paris AFP in English 2020 GMT 3 Dec 82

The third shipment of Super Etendard aircraft and related military equipment from Montoir port fulfilled a Franco-Argentinian contract of military sales that had drawn a protest from Britain.

London expressed "disappointment" at the second arms shipment that included Exocet missiles and five Super Etendard airplanes on November 17, but Paris justified the resumption of the shipments ordered before the outbreak of hostilities in the South Atlantic on the grounds that hostilities had ceased.

France embargoed military equipment sales to Buenos Aires after the outbreak of the war, but lifted the embargo on August 10.

French-built Exocet missiles launched by the Argentinian Navy sank two British vessels during the Falklands war.

ACCUSATIONS OF OAU SUMMIT 'INTERFERENCE' DENIED

LE MONDE VIEWS KARAMANLIS VISITS TO PARIS, BONN

PM031401 Paris LE MONDE in French 24 Nov 82 p 8

[Bernard Brigouleix report: "Greek Head of State Karamanlis in Paris and Bonn: A 'Private' Visit?"]

[Text] On Monday afternoon [22 November], the president of the Greek Republic, Konstandinos Karamanlis, who is currently spending a week in France [see LE MONDE of 23 November, had an hour-long talk with Mr Mitterrand at the Elysee.

The conversation enabled the two heads of state to carry out a traditional "review" of the international situation," which is something they had already had the opportunity to do at the beginning of September on the occasion of the French president's official visit to Greece. But this talk dealt more specifically with the building of Europe. With regard to that subject, Mr Karamanlis informed his host of his desire to see the integration process accelerated among the Ten. It appears that on that score, Mr Mitterrand was more reticent than the Greek president.

Theoretically, it is in a completely private capacity that the latter is visiting Paris. This is to be followed next week by a trip to Bonn. There too, however, he will have the opportunity to meet the head of state in the person of Mr Carstens, the president of the Federal Republic. It is being stressed by the Greek side that in both cases it is the question of a courtesy visit: While in Paris to take part in an extraordinary meeting of the UNESCO general conference, Mr Karamanlis felt obliged to call on and pay his respects to the French president and at the same time return the latter's visit to Athens; as for his West German colleague, he did invite him to Bonn....

To Seize the Initiative Again

All the same, it seems that the talks, the topics they deal with, the fair amount of publicity surrounding them and the commentaries they are giving rise to are more relevant to Mr Karamanlis' public function than to his private activities. The Greek head of state is probably not displeased to avail himself of this opportunity to reappear, albeit discreetly, on the international scene which he had long occupied as prime minister of his country. And in this way to remind people that Mr Andre Papandreou, the present head of government and socialist conqueror of the new democracy -- over whose destinies Mr Karamanlis had presided for a long time -- does not have a monopoly on representing Greece abroad.

At least three reasons may prompt the president of the republic to adopt that stance. The first is that, while his entente with Mr Papandreou is not always cordial -- far from it -- nevertheless there has been no real "clash" observed between the two men since the election victory of PASOK (Pan-Hellenic Socialist Party) and its head in October 1981. Mr Karamanlis has faithfully adhered to the rules of the institutions, which let the prime minister effectively direct the government, and has set about reassuring those on the left who had feared that he would abuse his top state position to counter the "change." No longer under suspicion on this count, he can henceforth permit himself to again seize the initiative in a few cases.

In the second place, the Greek president feels that Mr Mitterrand and Mr Papandreou did not get on together as well as had been expected -- and hoped for in Athens -- for reasons both of foreign policy and of personality. Although he himself belongs to the liberal right, Mr Karamanlis believes himself to be rather closer to the French head of state that is his prime minister.

Finally, it is certainly in the context of European policy and Western solidarity that the Greek president regards the "drift" of Mr Papandreou's government the most worrying: Whether it be relations with the East (the prime minister recently accepted an invitation from General Jaruzelski) or the danger of Greece's withdrawal from the European Community and the Atlantic alliance, which PASOK's electoral program threatened last year. Threats which Mr Papandreou is careful neither to act on nor to completely abandon.

L'HUMANITE REPORTS PCF-PCP JOINT COMMUNIQUE

PM031115 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 19 Nov 82 p 8

["Full text" of PCF-PCP joint communique issued in Paris on 18 November: "Uniting All Peaceful and Democratic Forces in Action"]

[Text] The following is the full text of the joint PCP-PCF communique:

At the invitation of the PCF Central Committee, a PCP delegation headed by Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal accompanied by Central Committee member Albano Nunes, visited France from 16 through 18 November 1982.

The PCP delegation had talks with a PCF delegation headed by Secretary General Georges Marchais and comprising Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz, Politburo member Francette Lazard and Central Committee member Henri Costa.

During the talks, which took place in the warm and fraternal atmosphere which characterizes relations between the two parties, information and opinions were exchanged on the political situation in the two countries and on the respective parties' activities and on topical issues.

For a Democratic Alternative

The PCP delegation reported on the struggle of the communists and people's masses against the reactionary coalition government's offensive against the nationalizations, agrarian reform, and workers' rights and in view of its policy of submission to imperialism.

It stressed that following the adoption of a law revising the Constitution -- a revision carried out with the help of the Portuguese Socialist Party -- the reactionary forces are aspiring to impose their subversive plans on the armed forces in order to stifle the workers' and people's movement, and restore the power of the monopolies and the large estages and destroy the democratic regime.

The PCP is constantly working to strengthen the powerful workers' and people's movement and to achieve cooperation among the democratic forces to defeat reaction and achieve a democratic alternative to the present government and its policy. To that end, the PCP is proposing four urgent and fundamental measures: the government's resignation, the dissolution of the republic's assembly, the formation of a democratic caretaker government and early parliamentary elections.

The PCP expressed the Portuguese Communists' solidarity with their French comrades' action to realize the prospects for social and democratic progress which was opened up by the left's victory in the May and June 1981 elections.

Complete Commitment

The PCF delegation reaffirmed the significance of the French Communists' complete commitment to the government and the majority, and to the action taken by its organizations to encourage the workers' intervention to crush the resistance put up by the right and the large employers in order to achieve determined progress in the direction of their interests and those of the country.

The PCF delegation expressed the French Communists' solidarity with the Portuguese Communists' and people's struggle to defend the achievements of the 25 April revolution and the democratic regime which guarantees them.

The Common Market

The PCP delegation thinks that possible Portuguese membership in the EEC would have disastrous consequences for the Portuguese economy, would seriously undermine national independence and is part of the effort to restore monopolist state capitalism which was destroyed by the revolution.

Peace and Disarmament

The PCF delegation recalled the reasons for its opposition to the expansion of the Common Market to include many countries.

The two parties stressed that the adventurist U.S. policy of reviving the arms race and supporting the most reactionary regimes is the main source of the increased tension in the world. It is a serious threat to international detente and peace.

That policy of confrontation adopted by imperialism is not a sign of strength. Faced with the socialist countries' achievements, role and influence; with the development of workers' and democratic movement in the capitalist countries; with the growth of the peoples' struggle for their national and social liberation; with the deep and all embracing crisis in its system of domination which has suffered setbacks; imperialism, which can no longer do what it likes, is trying to curb the peoples' emancipation struggles and regain lost positions.

In this situation, the PCF and PCP think that it is both possible and necessary to unite in action all the different forces which stand out in each country and throughout the world for peace, disarmament, social progress, democracy and national and social liberation.

The PCF and PCP regard the struggle for peace and disarmament as a major task. This movement is developing in Europe, and even in the United States both with objectives which are common to all peoples and with objectives which are specific to each country. It helped impose the opening of negotiations. The growth of that movement is crucial for ensuring that the Madrid, Geneva and Vienna negotiations achieve positive results. It is also crucial for preventing the implementation, under U.S. pressure, of the NATO decision to deploy new nuclear weapons.

The PCP and PCF welcome all initiatives taken in favor of disarmament, whatever their source. That is true of the proposals made and initiatives taken by the USSR, the neutral and nonaligned countries, other states and various political and social forces.

The Near East

The two delegations strongly condemned the violent Israeli aggression against the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples. They think it is essential that a just and lasting peace be established in the Near East.

The two delegations stressed the need for a settlement to be reached which includes Israel's withdrawal from all the occupied territories, the recognition of the Palestinian people's inalienable national rights which includes the right to their own independent state, and the guarantee of peace and security for all the states in the region.

They assure the PLO, the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples, the Lebanese Communist Party and the progressive forces of their active soldarity.

Solidarity

They also express their solidarity with the southern African peoples, with the Namibian people and SWAPO in their struggle to win independence, with the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola-Labor Party [MPLA-Labor Party] and the Angolan people and the Mozambique Liberation Front [Frelimo] and the Mozambican people in view of the South African racists' constant aggressions and with the South African people, the African National Congress and the South African Communist Party.

They condemned the United States' provocations, and threats of open military aggression in Central America and the Caribbean, expressing, in particular, their solidarity with the Cuban, Nicaraguan, Salvadoran and Guatemalan peoples.

In the international situation characterized by the tensions caused by imperialism's increased aggressiveness, the two parties think it is necessary to make major efforts and use all possibilities to unite all peaceful, democratic and progressive forces in action. They think that the communist parties have a major role to play at the national and international level in achieving that unity. In that spirit, mutual solidarity between communist parties should be increased and their cooperation developed.

The two delegations expressed their satisfaction with the relations of friendship, cooperation and solidarity existing between the PCP and PCF. They expressed their desire to further strengthen such relations in the interest of developing the friendly relations between the two peoples and countries and of the common cause of democracy, social progress, socialism and peace.

FORMER BULGARIAN EMBASSY EMPLOYEE SOUGHT

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 4 -- An arrest warrant has gone out here against yet another Bulgarian citizen in the ongoing investigation into the attempted assassination last year of Pope John Paul II.

Judge Ilario Mariella, who heads the probe, has signed an arrest warrant against Vassiliev Juelio Kolev, a former employee at the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome. At the time of the attack on the pope and up until six months ago Kolev worked in Rome as secretary to the Bulgarian military attache. He is the second Bulgarian citizen wanted in the shooting of John Paul II on May 13, 1981.

Nine days ago, Italian police arrested an official for the Balkan airlines, Sergei Ivanov Antonov in Rome.

The total number of arrest warrants in the case so far is seven: those against the two Bulgarians and five more against Turkish citizens. The warrants were issued as the result of testimony given by Ali Mehmet Agca, the Turk who was convicted of shooting the pope in St. Peter's Square. Agca is currently serving a life sentence in an Italian jail.

Investigators today confirmed the leak of Kolev's arrest which appears in the latest issue of the "PANORAMA" weekly, out on newsstands as of Friday. "PANORAMA" said that Kolev had returned to Bulgaria in June during the same period that two Italian "UIL" union officials, Paola Elia and Luigi Scricciolo -- arrested for spying for Bulgaria and complicity with Red Brigade terrorists -- decided to reveal their contacts at the embassy and with the terrorists.

The Bulgarian Embassy in Rome has repeatedly denied that Antonov or other Bulgarian officials were involved in the plot to kill the pope or engaged in any other terrorist actions.

Third Bulgarian Accused

LD051948 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Text] It has been confirmed that three Bulgarians are involved in the investigation into the assassination attempt against the pope. In addition to Sergei Antonov, arrested in Rome, and Vassiliev Kolev, who returned to Bulgaria 6 months ago, (Todor Ayvazov) has also been accused of being an accomplice of Agca. However, an arrest warrant cannot be issued against him because he is still a member of the Bulgarian diplomatic corps in Italy. Even though he has returned to Bulgaria, he officially remains covered by diplomatic immunity.

In order to eliminate this obstacle, Judge Martella, who heads the investigation into the assassination attempt, has asked the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to implement the necessary procedures.

The investigators are maintaining the maximum discretion as regards the information on which these accusations are based. The court is to decide tomorrow whether or not to accept the plea for release lodged by Sergei Antonov.

Antonov Release Denied

[Text] Rome, Dec 6 (AFP) -- A court here today rejected a request for the release of Bulgarian airline employee Sergei Ivanov Antonov, arrested on charges of "actively participating" in the May 1981 attempt to kill Pope John Paul II.

Mr Antonov's lawyers claimed that the Bulgarian was in his "Balkan Air" office in Rome at the time of the assassination attempt and not at St Peter's Square, as charged by the prosecution.

This was rejected by Judge Filippo Fiore.

Mr Antonov was arrested on November 25, and a warrant has been issued for the arrest of a second Bulgarian, who reportedly left Rome six months ago.

Bulgarian Envoy Summoned

LD041906 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 4 Dec 82

[Text] The Bulgarian ambassador to Rome was summoned to the Foreign Ministry today. He was received by (Videli Kreitzler), director general of social affairs. It was pointed out to the ambassador that the Italian Government considers absolutely unacceptable the possibility of any link between current proceedings in Italy against Sergei Antonov and proceedings underway in Sofia against two Italian citizens -- Paolo Farsetti and Gabriella Trevisin.

The Italian Government also considers inadmissible any attempt to subject the fate of the two Italian tourists to the outcome of the proceedings against Sergei Antonov. These proceedings are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the courts and totally independent of the executive power.

The Bulgarian ambassador was reminded of the fact that the Italian juridical system ensures the complete defense of the individual's rights and guarantees the fairness of any judgment.

It was also demanded that the Bulgarian Government give identical guarantees to our two fellow citizens.

Bulgarian Embassy Denies Interfering

LD052226 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2130 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Text] The Bulgarian Embassy in Rome has denied that its government attempted to obtain the release of Sergei Antonov, proposing the return of the two Italians arrested in Bulgaria as an exchange

In a communique read over the telephone this evening, a Bulgarian Embassy spokesman complained that no consideration has been given to Antonov's alibi regarding his presence in St Peter's Square during the attempt on the pope's life. Up to now, the authorities have in fact failed, the Bulgarian Embassy communique states, to interrogate other employees of the Balkan airlines present on that day.

Press Comment

AU021604 Rome ANSA in English 1549 GMT 2 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 2 -- Italian press speculation on what has been dubbed "the Bulgarian connection" in international conspiracies on Italian territory was enriched today by a lengthy article in the Socialist Party mouthpiece "L'AVANTI" which charged that Bulgarian secret services do the dirty work for the Soviet KGB in Italy. The analysis, written by "L'AVANTI" editor Ugo Intini, charged that "criminal and mafia-like organizations, terrorists, and special agents are implicated in conspiracies and arms and drugs trafficking which all lead in one direction - Bulgaria."

The article "points out the facts" and listed: The attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II by Turkish gunman Ali Mehmet Agca, "hired" by the "Turkish mafia" and "supplied with weapons and plans in Bulgaria."

The Bulgarian "coverage" to the "biggest arms and heroin racket" ever discovered in Europe (thanks to the efforts of a Trento investigator who ordered a number of arrests last week in northern Italy, ed.).

Suspicions that Bulgaria is the source of arms sold by the Sicilian mafia to Palestinian guerrillas in exchange for drugs.

Alleged links between "Bulgarian diplomats", former Italian trade union leader Luigi Scricciolo and the Red Brigades who kidnapped U.S. Brig. Gen James Lee Dozier a year ago.

From this the author of the article deduced that "since Bulgaria does not have autonomous international interests," the Bulgarian secret services materially carry out the Soviet KGB's secret operations in Italy.

While "L'AVANTI" offered an explosive hypothsesis, Milan's "CORRIERE DELLA SERA" observed today that Bulgaria has become more strident in what is developing into a major diplomatic incident between the two countries. The paper said that Bulgaria has begun interpreting last week's arrest in Rome of Bulgarian national Sergey Ivanov (on charges of complicity with Agca' in the shooting of the pope) as part of "an anti-Bulgarian and antisocialist campaign,"

The editor of the official Bulgarian "BTA" news agency, Boyan Traykov, has charged that the attack of the Italian magistrature and press is directed against "the detente process" and said there is a "direct link between the CIA and the Antonov affair."

According to "CORRIERE DELLA SERA", the Bulgarian stance in the Antonov affair and the plight of two Italian nationals detained in Bulgaria since August, "only confirms the deep difference between the two countries' political systems,"

Italian press commentators were unanimous in rejecting Bulgaria's hints at an exchange between the two Italians and Antonov. The Italians, Paolo Farsetto and Gabriella Trevisin, were arrested at the Bulgarian border and charged with spying on the basis of films allegedly in their possession.

Rome's daily "PAESE SERA" said that Bulgaria wants the matter removed from the magistrature and addressed on a political level, "due to the attention focused by the Italian press on the arrest and the allegations of Bulgaria's involvement in the attack on the Pope." But, the paper added, the Italian Government "replied by pointing out that in Italy judicial power is autonomous from political power, there is freedom of the press and the executive does not have the power to control."

Milan's "IL GIORNALE" commented sarcastically that "concepts such as investigators' independence cannot be grasped by those who are expert in yogurt but not in democracy." The paper concluded by saying that wanting to shift the matter from the magistrature to a political level, Bulgaria is threatening blackmail -- either you release Antonov or we will convict" two innocent people - and "one does not yield to blackmail."

FANFANI OUTLINES ECONOMIC PLATFORM TO EEC

[Text] (ANSA) -- Copenhagen, December 4 -- Italy's new Premier Amintore Fanfani outlined his government platform to European Economic Community heads of state and government and their foreign ministers during a two-day summit which began here Friday. The Italian leader noted that the high rate of inflation, enormous public and private indebtedness, growing unemployment and an imbalance in the balance of payments left Italy's economy particularly fragile and unlike the Community average. Italy is aware that is must lessen this imbalance in its own and in the Community's interest, he said.

For this reason he said that his new center-left coalition has taken on severe commitments in terms of economic policy. His government has pledged to substantially cut public spending and increase state revenues and to cut the current inflation rate of 16.7 percent to 13 percent by 1983 and to 10 percent by 1984.

Fanfani said that his government would back business and labor in the search for an understanding by attenuating fiscal drag on the workers and by easing the employer's contribution to worker benefits. The chief plank in the platform is to lower the jobless levels, he said.

The premier said that Italy was counting on the Community's help in achieving these goals. He also stressed the need for a coordination of economic policies within the EEC while also taking into account the diverse situations of the individual member states.

Further Statements

[Text] (ANSA) -- Copenhagen, December 4 -- Premier Amintore Fanfani, at the end of his first European outing as the head of an Italian Government in twenty years, told reporters here that the main purpose of his statement to his fellow heads of state and government from the European Community was to let them know that Italy is aware of the seriousness of its problems and intends to do everything necessary to correct them.

Fanfani, who was accompanied to the two-day EEC summit by Foreign Minister Amintore Fanfani [as received], said "diagnosing our ills, explaining the remedies we intend to apply, indicating the medicines we have prepared for the patient... by doing this, we feel we are working constructively within the community." He said he was happy to learn in Copenhagen that "the remedies we presented are neither so strong that they will choke the taxpayer nor (?limit) outlines." The premier went on to affirm that Rome government measures "bear a resemblance to those of other countries."

The foreign minister, it was learned, informed the European leaders of the outcome of talks he held in Rome with the special American envoy to the Middle East, Philip Habib. Colombo also warned them that it is increasingly difficult to clear Lebanon of foreign forces and that after the drive of the "peace in Beirut" initiatives, the situation in the country is deteriorating once again.

Fanfani and his new four-party coalition were sworn in on the eve of the EEC summit here, December 1.

PRESS REPORTS DC INFIGHTING OVER PORTFOLIOS

AU031613 Rome ANSA in English 1535 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 3 -- The vicissitudes of Italian Premier Amintore Fanfani's new government were virtually shoved off the front pages of the Italian newspaper this morning by yesterday's news of the artificial heart-transplant in the United States. But many newspapers reported that inter-factional infighting has already broken out in Fanfani's own Christian Democrat Party over his choices and exclusions in naming the cabinet.

The conservative Milan daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO, for example, ran a headline saying, "Flames Are Smouldering Under the Ashes in the Christian Democrat House." According to this source, most discontent has emerged over the exclusion of names like former Premier Giulio Andreotti, former minister of many portfolios Antonio Bisaglia, and former deputy party Secretary Carlo Donat Cattin.

The paper forecast that the effects of the polemic would "almost certainly" be felt when the Christian Democrat National Council, the steering committee elected to serve between sessions of the party congress, meets on December 16.

The Rome leftist daily, PAESE SERA, also mentions Andreotti's "ill humor" over the cabinet choices after his name had been bandied about insistently as the future foreign minister. This paper said party Secretary Ciriaco de Mita now "faces problems" in re-composing the polemics.

Another Milanese daily, IL GIORNO, even said that Andreotti's supporters were unwilling to vote confidence in Fanfani's new coalition with the Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals, though it also noted denials released by some Christian Democrats.

The Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, claimed that the exclusion of Andreotti has "been cut down to size in order to avoid a link between his failed appointment and the criticisms from his followers." [as received]

Other newspapers -- for example, the Roman LA REPUBBLICA, the CORRIERE, and the Communist Party mouthpiece, L'UNITA' -- stressed the replacement of Giuseppe Zamberletti at the Ministry for Civil Defense, a portfolio created for him in the wake of the popularity he won handling the earthquake disaster in southern Italy. He has been replaced by the Socialist Loris Fortuna. L'UNITA said "Zamberletti had one fault: his projects," while the Rome daily, IL MESSAGGERO, said it was not the first time he had been excluded, "amidst general surprise."

Polemics Between Parties

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome December 4 -- Now that Italy's government crisis has ended, the nations's newspapers today were focusing on the polemics within the four coalition parties over the failure of certain eminent party figures to nab important ministry spots. The papers also gave space to the dilemma facing the Republican Party which has not decided whether to abstain or vote in favor of the four-way coalition headed by Amintore Fanfani.

The four parties in the new administration are Fanfani's own Christian Democrats, the Socialists, the Social Democrats and the Liberals.

Rome's "MESSAGGERO" wrote that the exclusion from the cabinet of such big names as Giulio Andreotti, Toni Bisaglia, Carlo Donat Cattin and Antonio Gava was bound to leave the DC scarred within.

Both DC Secretary Ciriaco de Mita and PSI leader Bettino Craxi must now face the ill humor not only of those excluded from the cabinet but those who wanted to see the crisis settled differently, wrote Milan's CORRIERE DELLA SERA. De Mita Friday had to face the ire of Donat Cattin who accused him of yielding to external pressure in the choice of cabinet posts; otherwise, he maintained the exclusion of Andreotti, Gava and Bisaglia could not be explained, the paper reported.

Rome's "PAESE SERA" emphasized the fact that polemics were (?still) continues to rule out any government intervention on the indexation of wages, while Giuliano Amato openly refers to the Fanfani government as a bridge to a verification in the spring. The DC seems determined to pursue its hard line on the confidence debate in Parliament, PAESE said.

Another Rome daily "REPUBBLICA" said the difficult task [word indistinct] was an attempt to stitch up relations with the Republicans after they decided to bow out of any new coalition with the other four. De Mita has made an overture for rapprochement which has already been well received by Spadolini, according to the daily. No one is interested in pushing the PRI to the sidelines, LA REPUBBLICA continued. This was confirmed by a letter that Social Democratic Secretary Pietro Longo sent to Spadolini suggesting a meeting. However, the former premier showed no sign of being in a hurry, and while thanking Longo for the offer, said that any such encounter could take place only after the confidence debate. Despite Spadolini's willingness to eventually talk to his former coalition partners, it is clear that he has not forgotten the shabby way they treated him, the paper said.

SPADOLINI 'REGRETS' HIS FALKLANDS POSITION

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 4 -- In a lengthy interview published today by "LA REPUBBLICA", Giovanni Spadolini said he regretted above all one error made during his 18 months as premier (from June of last year up until November 13, 1982) -- Italy's position in the Falkland crisis. He noted that the two biggest parties in his four-way coalition government -- the Christian Democrat and the Socialists -- were opposed to economic sanctions against Argentina and that not even the Communist opposition backed the measures the European Economic Community adopted with regard to the [word indistinct] regime.

So as not to break with the European front, the only path that ordinarily would have been left open to Spadolini in such a situation would have been to hand in his resignation as premier, but he refrained from doing so to avert a referendum in Italy on severance pay, he told the interviewer. In fact, the referendum was avoided at the tenth hour only because of a law passed by the government modifying the legislation already on the books. "The main thing for Britain was our committment not to supply arms to Argentina," he said. This commitment was made and rigorously maintained, he added. Italy's relations with London, in fact, have not suffered, the former premier went on.

When two months ago during a UN vote on negotiations for the Falklands, the United States pressured Italy to vote in line with Washington's view of the Falklands dispute, Spadolini said Italy abstained along with the other members of the European Community. He said he came under heavy pressure to vote like America but that he held firm, backed in that case by Italian head of state Sandro Pertini.

Spadolini said that Italy lost a big order in Argentina because two years earlier he and the secretaries of the other parties had signed an appeal against repression in Argentina. The order went to France, he noted. "My own European vocation and that of my (Republican) Party is well known." Spadolini concluded. "Yes, I suffered over the Falkland issue. That decision cost me dearly," he sighed.

TERRORISTS 'COMMUNIST COMBATANTS' SHOOT DOCTOR

AU041351 Rome ANSA in English 0817 GMT 4 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 4 -- Three armed men burst into the Rome office of 34-year-old Dr. Giuseppina Galfo last night, tied up the three patients and a child sitting in the waiting room, and then shot the woman doctor through the head. The gunmen fled and the critically wounded woman was taken to a nearby hospital where doctors sought to save her life. Later the attack was claimed by a group calling itself "the Communist Combatants" allegedly as a reprisal for the death of a female inmate in Rome's Rebibbia jail. Police said that Doctor Galfo had been a member of the jail's medical staff at the time the inmate died three or four years ago.

GOVERNMENT WILL NOT ENDORSE EUROMISSILES

LD031322 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1130 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Excerpt] The first Council of Ministers session will decide that Spain will not sign the NATO communique in favor of Euromissiles. The new Spanish Government is thus preparing to distance itself from the foreign policy followed by Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo and has let it be known that it will not sign the joint communique of the meeting of foreign ministers of NATO member countries which will be held on 9 and 10 December in Brussels and which, among other things, will mean the deployment of Pershing-II and cruise missiles in Europe.

The daily EL PAIS says that sources in the new government have said that there are parts of the joint communique, such as those referring to martial law in Poland and the situation in Afghanistan, with which the Cabinet agrees, but considers it more responsible not to endorse the spirit of the document which confirms the installation of the Euromissiles.

KING SWEARS IN MINISTERS OF NEW CABINET 3 DEC

LD031154 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1130 GMT 3 Dec 82

FINANCE MINISTER BOYER ON PESETA DEVALUATION

[Passages within quotation marks recorded]

[Text] We open this news program with important economic news. Minister of Economy, Trade and Finance Miguel Boyer has made a statement. "Today I proposed to the prime minister -- and he accepted -- that authorization be given to the Council of the Bank of Spain to open operations next Monday on the foreign exchange market for the peseta to be exchanged at a rate 8 percent below yesterday's rate, that is, at 127.66 pesetas to the dollar, letting the market then freely determine the final closing rate."

So, the new government, through the minister of economy and finance, has announced the devaluation of the peseta by 8 percent. Mr Boyer now gives us the reasons for the devaluation: "The main reasons which have led us to believe this step is advisable are, on the one hand, that in the fight against inflation, which has failed over the past 2 years, the gap between our inflation and the mean of the countries of the EEC has widened and for this reason we have lost competitiveness in our exports to these countries. On the other hand, although we gained in competitiveness as regards trade transactions in dollars, this was because they were overvalued because of the high interest rates in the United States. The dollar is now coming down and we could lose our competitiveness again with serious consequences for our exports and for the balance of payments deficit which we want to reduce next year."

In his statement to RTVE, Mr Boyer referred to those who doubted the socialist government's resolve to fight inflation, holding exaggerated expectations over the past few months with regard to the necessary depreciation of the peseta which led to an outflow of currency which the government wants to stop as soon as possible. The minister of economy has responded to this situation. "I should like to say that these expectations are completely unjustified and that they are based on an error if they are based on the assumption that the socialist government is going to pursue an economic policy incompatible with monetary stability and the defense of the value of the peseta. The government will make the necessary efforts to introduce change into our economy and to fight the social evil of unemployment, but it will do so with a prudent policy, with a disciplined monetary policy which will aim to maintain the growth rate of the money supply at around 13 percent, enough to finance the expansion of the private sector; with a budgetary policy which will endeavor to contain the public deficit which has grown so quickly over the past few years; and with an effort to keep costs down so that the inflation rate is gradually reduced and comes down by around 3 points in 1983."

NEW DEFENSE MINISTER SPEAKS OF RESPONSIBILITIES

[Passages within quotation marks recorded]

The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Don Alvaro Lacalle Leloup, made a speech and put at the disposal of the minister the discipline and dedication which all members of the military display toward their commanders, the government -- the civil power-- and his majesty the king. The minister of defense replied to these words from Lt Gen Alvaro Lacalle Leloup with an important and significant speech from which we invite you to listen to three extracts. The first of these is a kind of statement of principle and intention:

[Serra] "I have been entrusted with this responsibility as part of a government which wishes to tackle with rigor and loyalty the political program which has received the broad support of the Spanish people in elections exemplifying a model of community spirit and participation. However, if the task of service to the fatherland acquires a dimension of state, this is also true of national defense. I should like to say, therefore, in this my first address, that I consider my mission to be totally imcompatible with any sectarianism, that I shall carry it out without the least partisanship because service to the Spanish people [from our position of] responsibility is certainly a mission of state."

The new minister of defense then referred to the modernization of the Armed Forces. He spoke about the provision of arms and the provision of economic means which are clearly conditioned by the crisis which our country is going through. At a later point he spoke about his dedication in this respect to human resources because the army consists above all of men:

[Serra] "But while arms and the provision of means are subjects of the utmost importance, at no time should it be forgotten that the armed forces are first and above all a body of men in the service of Spain. Consequently, I propose to give priority attention to human resources as a basic element of my department -- attention to their training, to their possibilities for improvement and full professionalization and to their daily living conditions, the living conditions of their families, their housing conditions, and, in general, all aspects of their social welfare."

Finally, in reference to some of the passages of the speech made by his majesty the king in opening the legislature, the new minister of defense spoke of the sacrifices which the armed forces are making and have made throughout this process of transition. He said:

[Serra] "The military institution, in spite of so many provocations suffered by its own flesh, has been able -- as it should -- to unite with the people and accompany them along the path which we Spaniards have chosen to take, the path of loyal submission to the legitimate power and the fulfillment of our Constitution."

Sr Serra ended this important speech with three "vivas" for the armed forces, the king of Spain and Spain.

MILITARY OFFICERS MARK CONSTITUTION ANNIVERSARY

[Text] Now a very topical and important report from our colleague Javier Arenas: A large group of military officers gathered at a Madrid restaurant this evening to mark the fourth anniversary of the Constitution. Over to you, Javier Arenas:

[Arenas] The dinner organized by a group of armed forces officers and senior officers to mark the fourth anniversary of the Constitution ended about 1/2 hour ago with toasts to the Constitution, the king and Spain. About 500 people attended the event, at which it was said that since 23 February 1981, coups that have occurred in the world have been in Third World or underdeveloped countries. The document adopted at the gathering contained the following words: We have every right to look to the future with optimism and hope. The elections of 28 October were a wind of freedom that blew through the hearts of the people of Spain, sweeping away fears, bitterness and injustice. It is a source of pride for us, say the members of the armed forces who signed the document, to be living under a Constitution that guarantees democracy for one's conscience. Therefore, it is logical that the Constitution should be a constant point of reference for the spirit and letter of our royal ordinances, which are the moral regulations defining the duties and rights of all members of the military. So, there are constant references to the Constitution, not forgetting discipline and the close relationship between the Constitution and military discipline.

[Begin recording] [unidentified speaker] Discipline finds its collective (?expression) in observance of the Constitution, to which the military as an institution is subordinate. Every member of the military must be fully conversant with and precisely fulfill the obligations that the Constitution sets forth. Where orders involve the commission of acts manifestly contrary to the law, and specifically contrary to the Constitution, no militaryman is obligated to obey them. [end recording]

ETA-MILITAR TO COLLECT 'TAX' FROM EMIGRES

[Text] ETA-Militar has decided to extend its sphere of action beyond the limits of the Basque country and search out those businessmen who left their homeland in the past few years because of political instability and the scourge of violence, in order to collect the revolutionary tax from them. Basque sources quoted by DIARIO 16 say ETA needs about 800 million pesetas a year to cover the high cost of maintaining its clandestine structure.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON GRAPO LEADER'S DEATH

LD051134 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 5 Nov 82

[Excerpts] The alleged top man of 1 October Antifascist Resistance Groups [GRAPO] was killed at 0900 this morning in Barcelona in an armed confrontation with operatives of the unified antiterrorist command. The unified command communique says:

At 0900 this morning during investigations being carried out by operatives of the higher police corps into the activities of the terrorist organization GRAPO, there was an armed confrontation with the alleged top leader of the organization, Juan Martin Luna, who was seriously wounded. He was taken to the hospital but was dead on arrival. The police operatives were unhurt. Martin Luna opened fire with a pistol which police succeeded in seizing.

Juan Martin Luna was from Cadiz, was 28 years old and was married with one son. He was a welder by profession. He was sentenced to 37 years in jail for the murder of Captain (Herdera). In December 1979 he escaped from Zamora prison. The antiterrorist squad has been searching for him for the last 3 years. Juan Martin Luna was considered the only founding member left of GRAPO. In April this year it was believed that Martin Luna had a group of 10 people around him.

THATCHER 'ANGRY' NO PROGRESS MADE ON EC BUDGET

LD041816 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1805 GMT 4 Dec 82

[By Geoff Meade, PA staff reporter in Copenhagen]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher gave notice today that another Common Market budget row is on the horizon unless swift progress is made towards agreeing to a long-term solution to keep down Britain's EEC contributions. After hearing a report at the EEC summit in Copenhagen on the recently announced proposals for curing the UK's future payments, the prime minister called for "verv substantial progress" and warned: "I don't want to argue but I will if I have to." Mrs Thatcher is angry that the Community's November 30 deadline for agreeing measures to tackle the budget problems for 1983 and later has passed with little sign of a settlement before the next European summit in March. At the end of the Copenhagen summit, she described the lack of progress as "unsatisfactory". She said: "Unless very substantial progress is made we will have to raise it again at the next summit meeting."

A deal to repay the government 480 million pounds of its 1982 EEC contribution, leaving a net payment of 387 million pounds, was only recently finalised. New proposals, guaranteeing rebates for the next two years and possibly a third year if necessary, have just been presented by the Brussels Commission, and given an initial glance by EEC foreign ministers. The continuing high cost of the Community's farm policy remains largely the cause of Britain's high net contribution, and Mrs Thatcher told her colleagues at the summit that the answer to the EEC's budgetary problems -- not just the UK problem but also financing an enlarged Common Market to include Spain and Portugal -- lay in more efficient control of agriculture spending. She emphasized her lack of commitment to any plans for increasing existing limits on the levels of gross contributions levied on EEC member states.

Most of the two-day summit was devoted to discussions on the Community's gloomy economic and social situation. Mrs Thatcher said everyone expressed concern about the recession, which she admitted was bigger and lasting longer than expected. She said the priority now was to find "enduring jobs" for the young unemployed. She said the continuing aims should be to get inflation down, to cut interest rates, and to reduce barriers to trade within the Community. "There has not been much progress towards bringing down certain barriers to trade", she commented. Mrs Thatcher identified the problems of European air fares, and differing views over the heavy lorries controversy, as the sort of areas in which there should be greater urgency towards genuine free trade in the EEC. She made clear that she was in favour of such anti-protectionist measures within the Community, but backed other EEC governments in calling for more protection for Community industries against imported goods, particularly in certain key industrial areas.

GOVERNMENT CONFIRMS EXPULSION OF SOVIET DIPLOMAT

LD031344 PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0934 GMT 3 Dec 82

[By Tom McMullan, PA dipomatic correspondent]

[Excerpts] The naval attache at the Soviet Embassy in London, Captain Anatoliy Pavlovich Zotov, has been asked to leave Britain by the middle of next week, the Foreign Office confirmed today. The Soviet charge d'affaires was called to the Foreign Office two days ago and was asked to withdraw Captain Zotov, who is a married man. A Foreign Office statement said: "There was clear evidence that he had been engaged in activities incompatible with his status." The foreign office refused to indicate what activities have led to his expulsion, but well-placed British sources said the incident is not connected with any of the security cases that have been in the headlines in recent weeks. A more complicated political explanation was offered for the expulsion. Since Britain was seen to have taken such a hard line to Mr Andropov, the new Soviet leader, it was argued that the expulsion might be an attempt to highlight Mr Andropov's previous connections with the KGB.

SPOKESMAN REJECTS DENKTAS STATEMENT ON VAROSHA

NC031205 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] The government spokesman has stated that the allegation by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas that the Varosha question has ceased to be a question of priority and that it constitutes part of the territorial issue is unfounded. That spokesman added: The Kiprianou-Denktas agreement clearly states that priority should be given to the question of Varosha, and nothing has happened to change this situation. Regarding the Turkish proposals on Varosha, the spokesman said: These were rejected because they were contrary to the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement and because they were unsatisfactory, and moreover because Mr Denktas always linked the return of the Varosha inhabitants to lifting the so-called embargo. The government spokesman also said the demand for lifting the embargo is merely a demand by Mr Denktas for consolidating the faits accomplis of the invasion and usurping the Greek Cypriot refugees' rights.

KIPRIANOU LAUDS PAPANDREOU POSITION AT EEC

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou lauded Papandreou's action in asking the EEC leaders to actively think about the Cyprus problem. I salute this action, President Kiprianou said, and I firmly believe that with the sincere cooperation which exists between the Greek and Cypriot Governments and with the determination of our people, which is proven, we will proceed and bring our mission to a successful end. Kiprianou also reiterated that democratic Greece, the government, the country's entire political world, the entire Greek nation and Hellenism throughout the world are the main support of our struggle.

Continuing, the president of the republic said we will continue our intensive efforts for the withdrawal of Attila from Cyprus and for a solution which will guarantee permanent freedom to our country and the right of refugees to return. We want, he characteristically stressed, a Cyprus which will be absolutely free from one end to the other.

Kiprianou said that international support for Cyprus is expanding and that the efforts toward this end will be continued so that Turkey may feel the pressure of international society and be forced to abandon its illegal plans in Cyprus.

The unveiling ceremony [not further identified] was attended by Archbishop Khrisostomos, by the president of the House of Representatives, members of the House, representatives of parties, the Greek ambassador, the commanders of the National Guard and police and other officials. Prior to the unveiling, archbishop Khrisostomos officiated at a commemorative service for Ethnarch Makarios.

ENVOY REAFFIRMS GREEK GOVERNMENT AID PLEDGE

[Excerpt] Greek Ambassador Khristos Zakharakis stressed that mainland Greece will determinedly continue to provide multifaceted and unstinting assistance to Cypriot Hellenism, without any ulterior motives and without fanfare, as a natural fulfillment of a national debt and as a fundamental expression of national identity within the framework of true and multifaceted alignment with the suffering Greeks of Cyprus until their struggle is fulfilled.

"This will continue," the ambassador said, "until a permanent and nationally acceptable solution to the tragic Cyprus issue is achieved with the withdrawal of Turkish occupation troops, the return of refugees to their homes and guarantees for the basic rights and freedoms of all citizens; until the return of all the country's productive resources to its legal government for the benefit of the entire population and until the reopening of the closed ports of Cyprus under occupation today.

"This will continue," Zakharakis added, "until the establishment of an independent legally administered state in which all citizens will live and progress under conditions of security, legality and respect for their state and of unhindered expression of their ethnic origin and character."

Zakharakis, who spoke yesterday during the ceremony of handing over the floating crane "Atlas" to the Cypriot Government, added that the Greek Government decided to hand over the crane at a time when, as everyone knows, there are many ports in Greece which could be improved and made more efficient if they had such a crane at their disposal.

ARCHBISHOP URGES UNITY, SUPPORT FOR PAPANDREOU

[Text] Archbishop Khrisostomos of Cyprus made the following statement:

"We are truly touched by the action of Kostas Pastellas from Vatili. [Pastellas is in the sixth day of hunger strike he started to promote unity in Cyprus] It reflects the concern and anxiety of our ordinary people when on the one hand they see the Turkish invaders trampling on our divided fatherland, and on the other they see the disruption of unity and fragmentation of our people's forces, largely because of party aspirations and personal ambition.

"Naturally, unity is a national demand, but the problem is how to achieve this unity. As we have had the opportunity to repeatedly state, unity is not possible around parties or personalities alone. Only when all of us agree on a joint line and joint goals of struggle can we possibly achieve this unity. What is this joint line and the joint goals?

"It is our recommendation both for a better conduct of the struggle as well as for the purpose of achieving unity, not only among the Cypriot people, but among all the nation's forces, that all the fronts of our people should accept the national policy of the current Greek prime minister, Andreas Papandreou on our issue. He is truly fighting hard both for the correct presentation of our issue as well as for restoration of our peoples' just rights.

"We congratulate Kostas Pastellas for his truly touching action. We believe that he has succeeded in passing on the message he wanted to pass to all, or at least to those who think along national lines. What they will do is up to their consciences to determine. It is for this reason that we call upon Kostas Pastellas not to insist on his hunger strike to the end, as he declared he would do if he met with no response to his appeal within a few days. Such insistence, irrespective of the fact that it stems from genuine and patriotic motives, leads to a form of suicide which is not permitted by our religion. He has done his duty. It is now the turn of others to do theirs."

O FILELEVTHEROS SCORES LACK OF U.S. ACTION

NC051004 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 5 Dec 82 p 5

[From the "Liberal" column: "Interests May be Genuine, But...."]

[Text] We will not say that U.S. interest in positive results from the intercommunal dialogue in Cyprus is false. It certainly is not. The United States does have a strong interest in seeing the Cyprus issue cease to exist as a problem because as long as uncertainty over the Cyprus issue continues, dangers will exist for the interests of the United States and its Western allies in our area. Consequently, U.S. interest for fruition of the dialogue is genuine. Here, however, we immediately have a question: What will the United States do toward this end? What action will it take in order to ensure progress in the dialogue?

Even the most uninformed person on Cypriot affairs, taking a look at the situation in Cyprus, could clearly see that it is Turkey who is unjust and Cypriot Hellenism which is being treated unjustly. It is Turkey which insists on occupying our lands, which continues to arm its occupation forces with the most modern weapons from U.S. technology and production and it is Turkey which "is the spoiled child" of the United States and the West.

Under these conditions, how is it possible to fulfill the goals of U.S. policy for a successful conclusion of the process supported by the U.S. leadership?

We also ought to note that by words, the Turkish leadership also supports dialogue. In action, however, its demands are tantamount to our unconditional surrender. Is this what U.S. policy wants? Does Washington align itself with Ankara's line of thinking?

Scores Reagan's Report to Congress

[From the "Liberal" column: "Where Did They Discover a Genuine Dialogue in Cyprus?"]

[Text] It is not the president of the country who is directly responsible for U.S. policy on the Cyprus issue. the responsibility for issues "shelved" by U.S. policy, like our issue, rests with the appropriate ministry. The fact that every now and again we are informed that the U.S. president -- whether his name be Carter or Reagan in the Cyprus issue does not mean that the head of the United States is eager to brief the legislative authority of any issue. Briefing within specified time limits is a legal obligation established when the U.S. Congress resolved to lift the notorious "embargo" against Turkey under the inviolable condition that it would be kept informed by the President on developments in the Cyprus issue because it was our own problem which led to the decision to enforce the "embargo" on Turkey.

This is what happened this time. The U.S. President dispatched his regular report to Congress. There is truth in the view that among all the countries of the world -- without exception -- that can exert influence (as much influence as can be exerted on the able and agile Turkish leadership, the United States is in the best position to act. It is for this reason that we are obliged to check U.S. policy on the Cyprus issue, because if we permitted things to proceed without our intervention, it is likely that we could be led to situations much more painful than the current ones.

From the latest report on the Cyprus issue prepared by the appropriate U.S. services and signed by President Reagan, it can be deduced that a genuine dialogue is being conducted in Cyprus. Where did the U.S. leaders discover the genuine character of this dialogue?

There was a genuine dialogue prior to the Turkish invasion, and this is the reason why that process came very close to a solution. After the successful Turkish invasion, the dialogue lost every vestige of genuineness. For years after 1974 we spoke at the meetings of the representatives of the two sides and Turkey kept silent. It limited itself to promises that at the next meeting it would come to the talks with views, but it always came with empty hands. Later, it did express certain views on the Cyprus issue, views which we considered and continue to consider as unacceptable, but Turkey insists -- right up to this very moment -- on repeating what it said the very first time. Consequently, there is absolutely no genuine dialogue today.

KLIRIDHIS REPORTEDLY SUPPORTS 'DOUBLE ENOSIS'

[Text] Kliridhis, as well as other Cypriot politicians who are satellites of the conservative and extreme rightwing, have openly expressed themselves in favor of double enosis! According to very reliable information, this new "repositioning" by Kliridhis took place recently during one of his trips abroad. The Democratic Rally Party leader said during a conversation (in a close circle) that he would not -- under the circumstances -- object to a double enosis solution.

Political circles here interpret the phrase "under the circumstances" as an admission by Kliridhis of Kiprianou's victory in the presidential elections. The reasoning by the leader of the conservative and extreme rightwing of Cyprus is based on the obvious conclusion that instead of having Kiprianou as president of an independent state, it would be better to be with Greece by abolishing Cyprus independence. This information is also strengthened by another recent "repositioning" by Kliridhis, who has openly sided in favor of a Western presence at the inter-Cypriot talks.

Western Intervention Rumors

[Excerpts] The Democratic Rally Party members and their satellites have embarked on "salon" dangermongering by spreading the notorious refrain that if Kiprianou is elected, the West will intervene. According to verified information, the "salon" dangermongering was intensified recently, particularly after the massive 28 November rally, which has left no doubts as to who will win the presidential election battle.

However, the dissolution of the independent and nonaligned state of Cyprus -- which is the ultimate goal of the Democratic Rally quarters -- is not an easy job because both the nonaligned and socialist countries will never accept the conversion of our island into a bridgehead of imperialism with a puppet in the position of president.

It is recalled in this connection that the Soviet Union has repeatedly urgently raised the question of respect for the independence, sovereignty and nonalignment of the Republic of Cyprus, as also was the case, according to political observers, at the Brezhnev-Ford meeting in Vladivostok.

Therefore, the new "bluff" by the Democratic Rally will also fall flat. Cyprus will acquire a president who will be thinking and acting on the basis of national interests and the declared nonaligned policy, and it will not acquire a president who will be a puppet of Western and imperialist interests.

KHARAVYI REPORTS 'ARAFAT MESSAGE TO PAPAIOANNOU

NC051013 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 5 Dec 82 p I-1

[Text] PLO leader Yasir 'Arafat sent the following message to AKEL Secretary General E. Papaioannou:

"Comrade Ezekia Papaioannou, I send you revolutionary greetings.

It was with great appreciation that I received your cable expressing solidarity on the international day of solidarity with the struggle of the Palestinian Arab people.

Expressing thanks for your firm solidarity, which is based on principles, I reiterate that the brotherly and militant relations which join us to the people of Cyprus are relations established within historic and geographic struggles. These relations are based upon our common struggle for liberty, democracy, sovereignty, social progress and the economic prosperity of our peoples.

"On this occasion, I reassure you that we will continue our just struggle for the restoration of the legal and inalienable rights of our people, including their right to self determination and the establishment of an independent Palestinian state on its national territory.

"I wish you health and progress and prosperity to your militant party.

"Revolution until victory."

KOTAK REELECTED LEADER OF TURKISH PARTY

TA051156 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Text] Mr Ismet Kotak has been unanimously reelected as the chairman of the Democratic People's Party [DPR] at the second congress in Nicosia today. In his opening address to the congress, the leader of the DPR, who is also the industry and cooperatives minister, briefly explained the activities of the party since the first congress.

Referring to the Cyprus problem, he stressed that the party would repeat its determination not to force the Turkish Cypriot community even one step backwards from the position it has attained after years of struggle and self-sacrifice. He stressed that the DPP supported the preservation and maintenance of peace in Cyprus and the Middle East and condemned the vile racist attacks by Israel against Lebanon and Palestinians. He expressed the wish for a bright and prosperous future for the Palestinian people.

Following Mr Kotak's address, the Executive Committee's administrative and financial report was presented to the delegates attending the conference. The conference is expected to end this evening with the election of the new executive committee.

PAPANDREOU ARRIVES IN COPENHAGEN FOR EEC SUMMIT

[Excerpt] The 10 leaders of the EEC held their first meeting in Copenhagen early this afternoon. Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou is attending the EEC session. Greek radio and television correspondent Oikonomopoulos reports:

[Begin recording] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou arrived in Copenhagen at noon today from Brussels to attend the EEC summit conference which started here early this afternoon. At 1400 the prime minister attended the official luncheon given in honor of the EEC leaders by Danish Queen Margrethe. The EEC leaders started their talks immediately after the official luncheon. During their first meeting, the 10 leaders heard Gaston Thorn give his report on last year and then they began examining the Common Market's problems.

[From the "Echo of Events" program: "Text" of Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou's statement on Cyprus submitted to the EEC summit conference in Copenhagen on 4 December -- read by announcer]

[Text] I would like to make a statement, and in particular, to draw your attention to the very disturbing, in my opinion, stalemate that has come about in the serious problem of Cyprus. For 8 years now, since the invasion, Turkey has been maintaining considerable military occupation forces on 36.4 percent of Cyprus, thus violating both fundamental rules of international law and various UN resolutions. The talks between Greek and Turkish Cypriots have not borne fruit for many years now, because actually it is not a dialogue between the island's two communities, but a dialogue between Nicosia and Ankara, with the latter imposing its will on Mr Denktas.

For the protection of the Turkish Cypriot minority -- a point invoked by Ankara -- we propose an increase of the UN peace force, the additional expenses of which would be borne by Greece so that with the withdrawal of the Turkish occupation troops, a free, authentic and substantive dialogue may at last open between the island's two communities.

We propose a repositioning or a reexamination of the problem by a UN special committee, by an international conference or through initiatives of leading personalities. Ankara is turning a deaf ear and refuses to withdraw its troops; it continues to exclusively insist on a sterile dialogue which merely perpetuates its occupation of the Island. The danger for the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of Cyprus is constantly increasing together with the danger for the security of the Greek Cypriots. The Turkish lira was illegally introduced some days ago as a national, official currency in the occupied areas of Cyprus. At the same time, legislation has recently been enacted on the distribution of Greek Cypriot property in the occupied areas to Turkish Cypriots and Turkish [mainland] settlers. Approximately 200,000 Greek Cypriot refugees have been waiting in vain for years now under miserable living conditions for arrangements enabling them to return to their homes.

And so, under these circumstances, with new threats or acts of violence daily by the Turkish side and the insecurity for the free part of Cyprus, the deadlocked dialogue is continuing.

It is replete with insignificant or misleading details and is dealing with the territorial issue in the light of property compensations, without touching at all upon the basic and principal problems so that there at last may be some progress, some hope for a solution in accordance with UN resolutions. Without asking that this dialogue be suspended, at least within the framework of an independent, sovereign, territorially integral, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyrpus as envisaged by all the UN resolutions, let Ankara tell us:

Does it or does it not accept the three basic freedoms, that is, the free movement of citizens of the Cyprus Republic, their free settlement and the free acquisition of property?

Does it or does it not accept the island's demilitarization?

Does it or does it not accept the bizonal or multizonal [dhizoniko i polizoniko] state in a federal form instead of the weak and dissolving confederation, namely partition, which Ankara is trying to impose through the dialogue?

Dear colleagues, from these questions, substantive discussion of which is systematically avoided, you understand how fruitless the dialogue is, and has to be in the manner in which it is conducted under the present circumstances. I ask you to actively consider the problem of Cyprus, which is so close to the Community's zone and which, at the same time, is fraught with real and immediate dangers for the whole area.

Remarks to Newsmen

[Recorded dispatch by special Hellenic radio-television correspondent Thanos Oikonomopoulos in Copenhagen]

[Text] The repositioning of the Cyprus problem and a special statement by Prime Minister Papandreou containing proposals for its solution, as well as the adoption of initiatives by the Greek prime minister within the EEC framework on the Polish issue, constitute the two most important achievements for Greece in the EEC summit conference, which ended today at noon here in Copenhagen. The joint communique of the 10 EEC member-states has been released. It refers to the significant measures that have been proposed for adoption both within the Community and at the (?national) level to revive the EEC economy and to deal with the plague of unemployment. The communique also contains the assessments of the Ten on issues of political cooperation, and East-West relations are mentioned in this context. The communique includes the Afghan issue, where the intention of the new Soviet leadership to pull out was noted, and the Polish issue, on which, after an interpolation by Greece and France, it states that the latest developments show that some positive steps are being made. It also mentions the Middle East situation and Lebanon and notes that a proposal by French President Francois Mitterrand has been accepted.

Speaking to Greek political journalists at the end of the conference, Mr Papandreou stated that with regard to the Cyprus issue in particular, he will bring up the subject once again at the conference of European Socialists to be held in Paris in mid-January to internationalize the problem.

Mr Papandreou did not want to elaborate on the initiative he has undertaken on the Polish issue within the EEC framework, but reiterated that an invitation has been extended to visit Warsaw -- a visit which will take place when the anticipated developments that would permit the visit occur.

[Begin Papandreou recording] In this statement that I have handed to you, I emphasize the fact that there have been no developments whatsoever in the Cyprus issue, despite the continuous negotiations or dialogue. I stress that this dialogue cannot be fruitful because it is a dialogue between the president of the Republic of Cyprus and General Evren; it is not a dialogue with Denktas. I also point out that there are certain dangerous developments such as the legalization of a certain currency in the Turkish Cypriot area. Of course, I have not proposed the suspension of the dialogue, but I have pointed out that this process not only does not lead anywhere, but also that it perhaps ultimately contains tremendous dangers of partition and the legalization of the faits accomplis. I specifically propose that other ways by which to intervene in the international aspect of the Cyprus issue be promoted by either a UN committee, a conference of governments under UN auspices or initiatives by various personalities. We ask: Does Turkey accept a federal solution or does it in essence promote confederation -- virtual partition? Does Turkey agree with the basic concept of freedom of movement, of maintenance or acquisition of property and of work in the two regions? If it does not agree, I will conclude that we are talking about confederation and that the dialogue is unnecessary because the Cypriot people will never accept partition. I believe that the statement which I have made and which I have submitted to them will undoubtedly renew their interest and spark their serious consideration. Within a few weeks, about mid-January, I will be able to go to Paris with other Socialist leaders, where I will again be given the opportunity, in another framework, to again bring up the Cyprus issue. [end recording]

In explaining the positions and views that were expressed on the joint communique, the prime minister stressed that on the issue of East-West relations and the Afghan and Polish issues in particular, a generally nonprovocative stand was adopted despite the contrasting views because, as he said, it is no time for bravados by the Community. Mr Papandreou pointed out with particular satisfaction that all 10 have agreed that unemployment, particularly amoung the young, is one of the most fundamental problems that the Community is facing at the social and economic levels, and noted that specific measures were proposed. The prime minister also said that during the discussion held last night after the dinner hosted by the Danish prime minsiter for the Ten, the general impression was that the Soviet Union gives great importance to the Geneva talks for the limitation of nuclear arms but that the prospects are not very good due mainly to the U.S. stand.

With regard to the Greek aid memoire submitted to the Community, Mr Papandreou stated that no discussion was held but that consideration of the aide memoire is continuing normally at the level of technocrats. The prime minister stated that French President Francois Mitterrand and other European leaders are taking a positive stand on most of the points of the Greek aide memoire.

Returns Home

[Text] At 1730 today, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou returned to Athens after a 5-day visit to Brussels and Copenhagen where he participated in the NATO defense ministers meeting and the EEC summit conference, respectively.

Summing up the conclusions from these two conferences, Hellenic radio-television special correspondent Khristoforos Kondaxis points out that Greece's presence in these two conferences was more significant and effective than at any other time.

Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou succeeded both at NATO and at the EEC in making the other delegations understand that Greece has its own voice, which is the voice of its people, and that the country's government is determined to defend its national interests.

Greece's presence at the NATO defense ministers conference was particularly dynamic and was felt both through its reservations on the joint communique and through its promotion of Greek issues within the framework of the alliance.

ALLEGED KARAMANLIS HURRIYET INTERVIEW DENIED

The new international agreement has special significance for Greece because it contains favorable clauses which strengthen Greek positions, primarily on matters related to territorial waters, the islands and the continental shelf. It is expected that the new international agreement will be signed initially by more than 70 states.

The Greek delegation will also have the opportunity to consult with the delegations of EC countries to coordinate on the Community's participation in the new agreement. It will also confer with the delegations of the superpowers.

BRIEFS

EEC AVIATION AID -- The Greek Aviation Industry Administration has announced that the EEC spent 35 million drachmas on its 1982 training program, thus financing 55 percent of the entire program. The Greek Aviation Industry Administration is going to submit an application to the EEC asking it to provide 110 million drachmas for the 1983 training program. TURKMEN, GROMYKO DISCUSS FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

NC060845 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 1 Dec 82 pp 1, 11

[By Bulent Erandac]

[Text] Moscow, (HURRIYET) -- Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko has stated that his country is determined to pursue an impartial policy toward the Turkish-Greek dispute and that it does not want a conflict between them. In the course of his talks with Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen Gromyko also stressed the importance that his country attaches to relations with Turkey.

From Turkey's standpoint, Foreign Minister Turkmen's visit to Moscow was meaningful and successful. The Soviet attitude toward the Cyprus question and the flight of the three East German citizens to Turkey, whose repatriation the Soviet Government is demanding, were the only embarrassing issues discussed during the Moscow Talks.

Turkmen's Moscow visit has created conditions that will facilitate the resumption of high-level contacts, which were disrupted 2 years ago. It has been announced that Foreign Minister Gromyko and his wife will visit Turkey in the coming year.

Foreign Minister Turkmen explained Turkey's official viewpoint on the Turkish-Greek dispute to his Soviet counterpart. Gromyko responded by saying that the Soviet Union hopes to see the settlement of the differences through peaceful methods and stressed his country's determination to remain impartial. High-ranking officials at the Soviet Foreign Ministry also stated that "a conflict between Turkey and Greece is not at all desired." According to the views communicated to Turkmen, the Soviet Union wants a "stable Turkey," because Moscow believes that this is extremely important both for peace in the region and throughout the world.

It is reported that during the talks, Gromyko was meticulously careful not to refer to Turkey's domestic affairs. It was thought before the talks that such issues as "Turkey's transition to democracy" and "the development of the bases and airfields in Turkey" would be included on the agenda, but they weren't.

It was observed that there is no change in the Soviet Union's policy toward Cyprus. As is known, the Soviet Union favors the settlement of the Cyprus issue at an international platform.

The question of the law of the sea agreement, which the Soviet Union will sign, was on the talks agenda. Foreign Minister Turkmen told the Soviet side that Turkey will not sign the agreement on the grounds that it would create an extremely difficult situation in the Aegean. Turkmen also drew attention to the fact that, depending on this agreement, Greece would extend its territorial waters to 12 miles and turn the Aegean Sea into a "Greek lake." Turkmen stressed that such an action would be considered "reason for war." The Soviet side, on the other hand, stated that "the Aegean could become neither a Greek nor a Turkish lake. The present status should continue."

Turkmen Statement on Talks

[Airport statement by Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen upon his return from the Soviet Union -- recorded]

[Text] I have returned from a visit to the Soviet Union as the guest of the Soviet Government. I stayed in Moscow for 2 days and proceeded to the capital of Azerbaijan, Baku. During my stay both in Moscow and Baku, I, as well as the delegation accompanying me, were subject to a warm welcome and interest.

In Moscow, I had talks with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko in a detailed and wide exchange of views on international problems. Naturally, the present state of Turkish-Soviet relations were reviewed and ways and means of promoting them were sought during our talks. We together stressed the necessity of developing the relations between our two countries in accordance with the Helsinki Final Act, which represents the basis for relations between the East and West -- as well as with the principles set forth in the documents signed between Turkey and the Soviet Union in 1972 and 1978.

During my stay in Moscow, I also had the occasion of meeting with Soviet Prime Minister Nikolay Tikhonov and Foreign Trade Minister Nikolay Patolivetch and members of the State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations. Bilateral relations and economic and trade relations in particular were discussed during these talks. Since the 1960's there has been a substantive economic relationship between Turkey and the Soviet Union. It is a result of this cooperation that projects like the Ali Aga refinery, the Iskenderun iron and steel installations, the Seydisehir aluminum works and the Arpacay Dam have been realized. All these have either been commissioned or are in their final phase of construction.

Trade between Turkey and the Soviet Union has decreased in 1982. In the talks we had with the Soviet officials, we especially dealt with determining the economic fields into which trade between the two countries must be directed in the future. To this end, it was decided to provide for the meeting of the Turkish-Soviet joint economic committee in Ankara in April 1983. We have expressed our belief that prospects exist in the field of energy production in particular.

As a modification in our trade relationship, a clearing system will replace the earlier barter method beginning the end of 1982. We hope that as a result of this change, the stagnation existing in trade relations will be eliminated.

In brief, I can say that my visit to Moscow has been beneficial from all points of view. I believe that during my stay we have been able to provide a new impetus to relations between our two countries.

As is well known, Turkey's policies toward the Soviet Union are based on honesty, and realistic and positive principles. Turkey is a member of NATO, which is a defensive alliance, and it is cooperating with the the other members of this organization within the defensive goals of the treaty. Turkey believes in the preservation of a stable military balance in Europe. There is also no doubt that, despite this, we want to conduct our relationship with our northern neighbor based on mutual security and constructive cooperation. We are convinced that the establishment of a climate of understanding between Turkey and the Soviet Union and the exchange of views on a high level will benefit both countries as well as contribute to the stability of the area and the creation of an atmosphere of dialogue between North and South.

Further on Statement

[Excerpt] Ankara, 3 Nov (AA) -- Following his statement on his return from an official visit to the Soviet Union, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said, in reply to questions on other topics:

-- "We explained to Soviet officials the latest developments in Turkish-Greek relations. The expressed hope that these problems would be resolved in a peaceful way.

-- "We had discussed at earlier occasions highway transportation through Kars border checkpoint. We did not discuss it this time.

-- "Gromyko did not ask me to relay to NATO any message. I think he contacts all NATO foreign ministers.

-- "We discussed the recent hijack to Sinop of an Aeroflot plane. We told them legal proceedings have begun against the hijackers and that we give special importance to plane hijacking cases."

HURRIYET on Talks

NC060812 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 30 Nov 82 p 3

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "Cool Stability"]

[Excerpt] Every visit is made for a short-or a long-term reason or purpose. Therefore, the official visit the honorable Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen is making to Moscow for talks with high-level Soviet officials must be based on a purpose or on a serious reason. We have not knocked at the Soviet Union's door nor has it knocked at our's since the summer of 1978.

Yes, there must be a reason, but what is this reason or purpose? This is unknown. Therefore, we can only evaluate honorable Turkmen's visit to Moscow in light of his statement to the Turkish journalists accompanying him and also in light of issues that concern both countries.

Honorable Turkmen told journalists: "We have not made any statement accusing the Soviet Union of responsibility for the domestic events in Turkey, nor do we have any such intention. There has certainly been outside intervention in our domestic affairs, but it is hard to point to just one source. Our relations with the Soviet Union are based on certain principles."

Turkmen then stressed that there is "stability," but not "stagnation," in the relations between the two countries. However, admitting that there has been "a decrease in high-level contacts," he added: "My visit will put an end to this stagnation (apparently the same word slipped from his mouth too).

We can form two separate impressions from Foreign Minister Turkmen's remarks: The first impression is that he wanted to accentuate the fact that no one has officially stated that the Soviet Union has played a role in the anarchy and terror which brought Turkey to 12 September and in the activities which aim at dividing Turkey. But honorable Turkmen did not express the belief that "the Soviet Union has nothing to do with these activities." This point is important.

The second impression is confined to Turkmen's desire to show that this "stagnation" -- or cool stability -- has suddenly come from the blue. The fact is that the stagnation in the Turkish-Soviet relations is not merely a result of the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan or of the events in Poland.

(These concern the Western World more than Turkey.) It is to some extent the result of the indirect activities the Soviet Union is directing against Turkey. For example, there is no doubt that Soviet Armenia has become the moral and spiritual center of activities against the Turkish Republic.

The Voice of the Turkish Communist Party and Our Radio, whose broadcasts intend to foment discontent in Turkey, could not operate without the Soviet Union's permission and even encouragement. Naturally, Turkish-Soviet relations are affected by these broadcasts.

In response, the Soviet Union may turn to us and say. "First get your allies to improve their attitude toward you." This would be reasonable, but this is not reason enough to exonerate the Soviet Union.

Turkmen's visit to Moscow will be considered successful to the extent that it manages to clear away the difficulties between the two countries.

PRESIDENT EVREN TO BEGIN FAR EAST TOUR 13 DEC

TA040559 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0430 GMT 4 Dec 82

[Text] President Kenan Evren will begin a tour of four Far Eastern countries on 13 December. According to an announcement by the Foreign Ministry, Evren will go to Beijing on 13 December as the official guest of the chairman of the PRC National People's Congress, Ye Jianying. His visit to the PRC will last 4 days. Evren will visit Indonesia between 17 and 20 December as the guest of President Suharto, then will proceed to the capital of Korea, Seoul, from Indonesia, staying there for 4 days as the guest of President Chon Tu-hwan. Evren will visit Bangladesh between 23 and 25 December. This visit will take place at the invitation of President Abdul Fazal Mohammad Assanuddin Chowdhury. On his way back to Turkey, Evren will stop over in Pakistan, where he is expected to meet President Ziaul Haq. Evren will return to Ankara on 26 December. Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and representatives from various components will accompany Evren on his Far Eastern tour.

DEFENSE MINISTER BAYULKEN RETURNS FROM BRUSSELS

[Text] National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken has said that in its relations with Greece, Turkey will firmly defend its legitimate rights based on international law until the end. The national defense minister returned to Turkey today after attending the winter meetings of the NATO defense ministers in Brussels. In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Bayulken said that Turkey was in favor of solving its problems with Greece through negotiations, and this view was approved by NATO. He pointed out that the allies were displeased when Greece discussed its own problems at the Brussels meetings, where defense issues were being discussed. He said that the Greek allegations about Turkey were answered at the meetings and proven to be unfounded. He added: We followed our gentleman's agreement until the end. Greece stopped the dialogue at the last minute under the pretext of concocted airspace violations with certain unfounded allegations and without even waiting for our answer. It is obvious that there is a lack of sincerity here. There is no hostile policy against Greece in Turkey's foreign policy.

Bayulken said that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou must allow the Turkish and Greek foreign ministers to hold a meeting as was planned to improve the relations between the two countries. Pointing out that NATO wanted the Turkish-Greek relations to reach a level suitable to two allies, Bayulken said: I hope that they will review their attitude regarding the settlement of the problems through negotiations and give a positive answer to our attitude.

COOPERATION PROTOCOL SIGNED IN BAGHDAD

[Text] A Turkish-Iraqi cooperation protocol has been signed in Baghdad. Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Fahir Ilkel has said that the protocol, signed at the end of the Turkish-Iraqi joint economic committee meetings, comprises beneficial and fruitful decisions for both countries. Ilkel, who headed the Turkish delegation to the talks, has returned to Turkey. In a statement to the Turkish radio and television, Ilkel said that the talks with Iraqi officials, especially with Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Taha Yasin Ramadan, were held in a sincere atmosphere of understanding. Noting that Turkey will export a considerable amount of goods, primarily foodstuffs, to Iraq, Ilkel added that at the talks, important decisions that will enable Turkish contractors to contribute more extensively to Iraq's development activities were made. He further noted that an agreement in principle had been reached on the management and maintenance of industrial installations in Iraq and their engineering and consulting services.

Noting that an agreement was also reached on obtaining a considerable amount of Turkey's oil needs for 1983 from Iraq, Ilkel added that constructive decisions had also been made on the enlargement of the oil pipeline. He said that a decision has been made on constructing a second bridge over the River Habur and that the project, to be undertaken by Turkish contractors, will soon be submitted to a tender.

MINISTER RECEIVES BULGARIAN HEALTH OFFICIAL

[Text] Ankara, 3 Dec (AA) -- Minister of Health Kaya Kilicturgay received Friday the visiting Bulgarian Deputy-Health Minister Professor Shindarov who is also head of Bulgaria's Red Cross organization. Dr Kemal Demir, head of the Turkish Red Crescent Society, was also present at the meeting.

Kilicturgay stressed that cooperation between the two relief organization was very important especially from the point of frequent road accidents on the E-5 highway crossing Bulgaria and Turkey. The issue would be discussed, Shindarov said.

COMMANDER VISITS AFGHAN REFUGEE CAMP IN PAKISTAN

[Text] Ankara, 4 Dec (AA) -- Gendarmerie Commander Gen. Sedat Celasun who is also a member of National Security Council, continued Friday an official visit to Pakistan travelling to Peshawar for a visit to the nearby ("Nasir Bagh") border camp for Afghan refugees and met local military commanders. In a speech at the camp, Gen. Celasun said the Turkish people were sharing the distress of the Afghan refugees and President Evren was personally interested in the Afghan refugees accepted to Turkey. The Afghan people were fighting for a just cause and they would be successful, he added.

The resolution holds host governments responsible for the proper protection of all diplomatic missions and consulates.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE OPTIMISTIC ABOUT DEMOCRACY

TA050900 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 0815 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 5 Dec (AA) -- A report prepared by Council of Europe experts is optimistic about the future of democracy in Turkey. The report was prepared by an FRG professor, who is also a member of UN Human Rights Commission, a member of the Copenhagen Law Institute and an Italian professor from the University of Genoa. The report was presented in Paris to the members of the Judicial and Political Affairs Committee of the Council of Europe.

Commenting on the report, a member of the committee, who has requested anonymity, has said that though there was concern in connection with laws connected with the press and the activity of associations, it was believed as a whole that the Constitution made a positive impression. The committee expressed the hope that the forthcoming legislation in connection with these provisions of the Constitution would eliminate the concern of the committee on these subjects.

In their report, the experts conclude that there was no need for the ousting of Turkey from the Council of Europe on the grounds that it violated human rights. The committee member further stated that the report unanimously expressed the belief that the new Constitution constitutes a cornerstone in efforts in Turkey for the restoration of the democratic system. The same committee member said that another meeting was scheduled for January 1983, in order to draft the resolution to be brought before the Council of Europe assembly meeting.

The draft has been presented to the National Security Council for approval, he added. The council will study the draft Monday or Tuesday before submitting it to the speaker of the Consultative Assembly.

VOTCP SEEKS AMNESTY FOR CONVICTED JOURNALISTS

TA050914 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Station commentary: "We Will Continue To Defend the Independence of the Chained Press"]

[Excerpts] In its 1 December issue, the Istanbul daily HURRIYET carried a news item entitled: Evren and Ulusu Listened to the Problems of the Press. According to this report, a Turkish Journalists Association delegation under its president, Nezih Demirkent, briefed them on the problems facing the press and pointed out that the main issue for them was the expected increase in the price of newsprint.

Just below this item, there was another item in the newspaper which should, so we believe, have been presented in Ankara as the press' main concern. According to it, 18 officials of the Turkish Writers Union would be prosecuted and the public prosecutor was demanding prison sentences ranging from 8 to 15 years. Thus the visit of the journalists delegation to Ankara coincided with unfortunate news reports. We hope that upon their arrival in Ankara, the members of the delegation changed their minds about what the most important issues facing them were. A view expressed by an international journalists association on the situation of the Turkish press, made public almost at the time of the journalists' visit to Ankara, said, after calling for freedom of the press, that the convicted or detained journalists and editors should be released under an amnesty.

Lately, it is being observed that the oppression of the press members has been intensified by the Evren dictatorship, which is concealing its black face under the cover of the Constitution. Legal action has been taken against the writers and editors of both the Istanbul dailies CUMHURIYET AND HURRIYET. In the same way, the Istanbul daily GUNAYDIN has been indefinitely closed because, so it was claimed, it published an item on a secret government resolution. The officials of the Turkish Writers Union all of them writers, poets and journalists of reknown, are also being prosecuted with demands of prison sentences of up to 18 years. Recently, Aydin Senesen, a writer for the newspaper POLITIKA, was sentenced to 18 months in prison. There are more journalists imprisoned in the dungeons of the Evren dictatorship.

It is under these conditions, dear listeners, that new legislation is being prepared in Turkey for the press. In order to have an idea of what the new press law will look like, it is enough to examine the present conditions prevailing in our country and, second, to see what the new Constitution stipulates on the issue of freedom of the press, which in fact completely eliminates these liberties.

Currently, no press organs for the workers exist. All progressive newspapers and publications have been banned for 2 years. Books have been collected by the authorities under the pretext of having leftist tendencies and the printing of such books has been prohibited. What is left in Turkey today is a press chained by the Evren dictatorship.

The Turkish Communist Party [TCP] does not differentiate between its chained organs and the others. The TCP is defending the liberties of bourgeois newspapers like TERCUMAN, HURRIYET, GUNAYDIN AND MILLIYET against the oppression of the Evren dictatorship.

To defend the rights and lbierties of all the writers and journalists being kept in the dungeons of the Evren dictatorship is the main task of all democrats. The struggle for the establishment of a free press is an integral part of the struggle being waged for the sake of democracy. Our people, more than anyone else, are in favor of the elimination of pressures against journalists, writers and their organizations and of an amnesty that will allow the release of all press members imprisoned in dungeons.

BROKER SENTENCED FOR CHEATING THOUSANDS

[Text] An Istanbul court today condemned Abidin Cevher Ozden, the owner of the Kastelli brokerage firm, to 15 months in prison and a fine of 15,000 Turkish lira. Cevher was accused of misuse of trust and cheating. The public prosecutor asked for the punishment for Ozden for issuing bad checks against money he collected from thousands of his customers with promises of high interest rates. The court acquitted him on two other counts.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON WEAPONS DEPLOYMENT IN EUROPE

LD032214 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Text] After the meeting of NATO defense ministers yesterday, Minister of National Defense Freddy Vreven has stated his view on the allocation of credits for new technological weapons, as the idea was expressed at this NATO ministerial meeting. In the minister's opinion it is unthinkable to increase the national defense budget in the current context of economic crisis; moreover, for Mr Vreven the deployment of new conventional weapons in Europe could have a negative influence in the installation of new intercontinental missiles in European countries. Minister Vreven confirmed on this occasion that the first stage in the preparation of the deployment of missiles in Belgium -- in other words the choice of sites -- has been concluded. Four air bases, three of which are in Wallonia, could be used for the storage of these missiles.

WEINBERGER STOPS IN AZORES, MEETS AUTHORITIES

LD051026 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 0815 GMT 5 Dec 82

[Text] The U.S. defense secretary made a stopover at the Lajes Airbase on Terceira Island last Saturday and met the head of the Azores regional Government, Mota Amaral. On his way back from Brussels, Caspar Weinberger arrived in Lajes Airbase at about 1600 on Saturday and was met, in addition to Mota Amaral, by Minister of the Republic General Conceicao e Silva, by speaker of the Azorean Parliament Alvaro Monjardino, and by Regional Secretary for Education and Culture Reis Leite.

Although no statements were made to the press, it was thought in Lajes that the renewal of the agreement on the use of the Lajes Airbase by the United States was informally touched upon during the meeting between Weinberger and the regional authorities. The present agreement expires in February 1983.

DECISION ON TROOPS TO LEBANON SET FOR 9 DEC

[Text] Defense Minister Freitas do Amaral has told ANOP that the Council of Ministers will make a decision on the request to send Portuguese troops to Lebanon at its meeting this coming Thursday. He pointed out that the chief of the Armed Forces' General Staff must be heard by the government on the matter.

Freitas do Amaral left for Paris today to chair the meeting of the Political Bureau of the European Christian Democratic Union of which he is president. In his capacity as leader of the Social Democratic Center Party he will also be attending the second congress of the European People's Party, the Federation of Christian Democratic Parties of the EEC members countries. He said that at this latter meeting he will strongly condemn the selfishness evidenced by the EEC countries at the summit in which they again decided to delay the entry of Portugal and Spain into the EEC.

SHULTZ ARRIVES 7 DEC; TO MEET WITH GENSCHER

[Excerpt] Bonn; 7 Dec (DPA) -- U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz arrived in Bonn early this morning for an official visit to the Federal Republic. He will have his first meeting at midday with his counterpart in Bonn, Hans-Dietrich Genscher. They will discuss the Western alliance's relations with the Warsaw Pact states. The exchange of views will begin with a luncheon at the foreign office.

CHANCELLOR KOHL ON COPENHAGEN EC SUMMIT

DW061307 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2135 GMT 3 Dec 82

[Interview with Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Thomas in Copenhagen; date not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Kohl] We discussed national policies in general [at the EC summit meeting in Copenhagen], in particular, what we should do together and how we should proceed to fight unemployment, particularly unemployment among the young, to get our economies going again.

[Question] Economic problems are perhaps the most urgent problems. The word protectionism has been repeatedly voiced, and France is increasingly isolating its domestic market. Is there discord in the Community?

[Answer] Well, it is quite clear that different recipes are followed by the individual countries, if I may put it so casually. The great majority of countries, however, are handling the problem in a way similar to what we are doing in the Federal Republic -- cutting public budgets, assuming no further debts, readjusting and reshuffling priorities and, in particularly, supporting the investment sector. That was the general, but not common, tenor here as can be gathered from the national policies. Regarding the problem of France, which you just mentioned, I believe we must conduct intensive talks not about each other, but rather with each other. I think we can make quite a bit of headway here in Copenhagen without necessarily agreeing on all points.

[Question] Bonn wants to speed up the integration of Spain and Portugal with the prerequisite, however, that among other things, the agricultural market be restructured. However, haven't you been unable to resolve this problem for some time?

[Answer] Well ok, but Europe will be incomplete if Spain and Portugal aren't integrated. In addition to the economic field, we also have the general political duty to strengthen the newly created democracies in Spain and Portugal. For the democratic countries, the opening up toward Europe is an important act of stabilization in the field of domestic policies for the democratic forces in those countries.

[Question] This was the first time you participated in this kind of talks, and, as you said, it was a summit to get acquainted with each other. Are you still optimistic now after the summit is over that progress can be achieved in Europe?

[Answer] You know, I belong to the generation which right after the war, at the end of the forties and the beginning of the fifties, went as pupils or students to the border, sang European songs, pulled out border markers and believed that Europe would come into existence the next day. Of course that was an illusion -- a beautiful illusion, but an illusion. We know now that it will be a laborious process.

PAPER ON POSSIBLE USSR MISSILE PROPAGANDA PLOY

[Text] Bonn -- The CDU/CSU faction expects that prior to the Bundestag elections Moscow will announce the reduction of SS-20 missiles deployed in Europe in a great propaganda extravaganza. According to BILD AM SONNTAG, CDU Bundestag Deputy Juergen Todenhoefer said that he fears that this "Andropov plan" is intended to provide support to the adversaries of counterarmament. The Kremlin will probably announce a reduction "from the current number of about 240 missiles to some 160 or even 150 SS-20 missiles."

According to Todenhoefer, the whole thing is "almost identical to SPD politician Egon Bahr's plan, which is mortally dangerous to West European security." Bahr does not mention, however, that every SS-20 launching device has an additional missile with three nuclear warheads, Todenhoefer said.

GDR ARMY PAPER SAYS WOERNER 'DISTORTS FACTS'

LD071112 Hamburg DPA in German 0851 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Text] Berlin, 7 Dec (DPA) -- The East Berlin paper DIE VOLKSARMEE (PEOPLE'S ARMY) accuses Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU) of "distorting the facts" and "slandering the soldiers of the National People's Army" of the GDR. This strong criticism in a commentary by the paper resulted from Woerner's remark in a radio interview that the Warsaw Pact had a "two-to three-fold conventional superiority" over NATO in central Europe. This assessment could only be arrived at if "each of our tanks is counted two or three times." On the other hand, the Soviet Union and the other countries of the Warsaw treaty include reservists and others as well.

BARZEL, SPD's BAHR VIEW INNER-GERMAN POLICY

[Text] Bonn, 5 Dec (DPA) -- Rainer Barzel (CDU), federal minister for inner-German relations, and SPD Presidium member Egon Bahr agree on the goals of inner-German policy. On Second German Television [ZDF] today, Barzel spoke out in favor of greater cooperation between Bonn and East Berlin because this will create a better situation in Germany and therefore for peace in Europe. Bahr, also on ZDF, said that the most important concern in the coming months is the consultations between the two German states on questions of security in central Europe.

Both politicians stressed the principle of concession and reciprocal concession in agreements with the GDR. Barzel stated that only in this way will there be a balance of interests. Furthermore, in politics it is awkward to be the only one at the receiving end. Bahr said that the social-liberal coalition has not made concessions without reciprocal concessions either.

The SPD politician expressly welcomed the recent statement by Philipp Jenninger (CDU), minister of state of the Federal Chancellery, that the withdrawal of the increase in the compulsory exchange levy for visitors to the GDR is not a precondition for talks with East Berlin; this sounds very reasonable" even if it is the opposite of what the CDU earlier stated in opposition, Bahr said.

Barzel confirmed the readiness of those responsible in the GDR to also cooperate with the new Federal Government. "We are not being given the cold shoulder."

The Union does not want to use economic problems as a lever for political demands. With regard to the impending visit to the GDR by SPD chancellor candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel, the minister expressed the hope that there will also be competition in policy on Germany between the Union and the SPD.

The text of the politician's remarks was prereleased to DPA.

FDP'S RONNEBURGER URGES CONSULTATIONS WITH GDR

LD061358 Hamburg DPA in German 1129 GMT 6 Dec 82

[Text] Saabruecken, 6 Dec (DPA) -- Uwe Ronneburger (FDP), chairman of the intra-German Bundestag Committee, supports the Federal Government's intention to continue talks with the GDR without preconditions. Ronneburger, in a interview with Saarlaendischer Rundfunk on Monday, said that the conclusion of a cultural agreement between the two states is particularly urgent. Over the weekend, Rainer Barzel (CDU), federal minister of inner-German relations, and the SPD disarmament expert Egon Bahr also called for increased cooperation between the Federal Republic and the GDR.

Concerning Bahr's call for consultations between the two German states on questions of security in central Europe, Ronneburger said that the Federal Republic and the GDR ought to work, within their respective alliances, for disarmament and the safeguarding of peace. Both sides should also exercise influence on the Geneva negotiations between the United States and Soviet Union. However, these efforts should not be allowed to jeopardize the position of the Federal Republic in NATO and the European Community.

An edited version of the interview was made available to DPA by the radio station.

GENSCHER, VENEZUELA'S ZAMBRANO REACH AGREEMENTS

[Excerpts] Bonn, 6 Dec (DPA) -- The FRG Government and the government of the South American oil state of Venezuela want to strengthen relations and coordinate their political actions more closely in the future. This agreement was reached today in Bonn between Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher (FDP) and his Venezuelan counterpart, Jose Alberto Zambrano Velasco. A foreign spokesman said that to this end consultations on a high official level would regularly take place.

In the exchange of views with Genscher, it was reported that there is widespread agreement on the international situation and also on the crisis in Central America. Genscher stressed that the Federal Government notes with great concern the tension between Nicaragua and Honduras. The Federal Government rejects every outside political interference, and in particular, a carrying over of the East-West conflict into that region.

At a dinner in honor of the Venezuelan foreign minister, Genscher emphasized the good economic relations between the two countries. Venezuela is among the FRG's most important Latin American trading partners. However, there are still many opportunities to strengthen economic cooperation that have not been taken advantage of. He welcomed the fact that a large delegation of representatives from German industry are to visit Venezuela early next year. Genscher praised Venezuela's active efforts to pave the way for peaceful solutions in Central America and the Caribbean.

DEVELOPMENT AID TO NICARAGUA TO BE CONTINUED

[Excerpt] Bonn, 6 Dec (DPA) -- Bonn development aid for Nicaragua, the Latin American country which is governed by a leftwing junta, will continue under the Christian-liberal Federal Government, a spokesman for the Federal Ministry for Economic Cooperation said today in response to public speculation. The spokesman also corrected the former announcement by the ministry, which stated that Economic Cooperation Minister Juergen Warnke (CSU) had already ordered the release of DM27.6 million in development aid for El Salvador, funds which had been frozen by the former SPD/FDP Federal Government.

In the case of Nicaragua, minister Warnke has decided during the past few days that a project in the plant-protection sector will continue. It will receive DM6.3 million in the framework of technical cooperation.

COMMENTATOR ON NATO SUMMIT CONFERENCE PROBLEMS

DW070839 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 4-5 Dec 82 p 4

[Dieter Schroeder editorial: "NATO in a Blind Alley"]

[Excerpts] The NATO Council of Ministers' ritual of meeting prior to Christmas in Brussels is also following the old and tested pattern this year -- nobody is happy about the state of the alliance, but in the end, the rifts will be patched up with wonderful communique paper.

However, the slick communique can't hide the fact that tensions are growing in the alliance. It would be too simplistic to view these tensions as existing only between the Americans and the Europeans. Much rather, the dividing runs between the two really independent NATO nuclear powers -- the United States and France -- and the others. The French theme at this year's defense ministers' meeting was particularly revealing because it destroyed all hopes that a solution could be found for a medium-range missile balance in Europe by counting some Soviet SS-20 missiles against French and British nuclear weapons. French Defense Minister Hernu coldly rejected ideas which are being nourished in this country, particularly by Egon Bahr. France is not prepared to bring its missiles into the Geneva negotiations. It won't even quietly allow them to be included by the two superpowers without being consulted.

Nuclear weapons can only be national weapons because their use includes the danger of self-destruction. This remark by Charles de Gaulle has been adopted in the meantime by the Americans. Therefore, they want to develop increased and credible deterrence in Europe through Pershing and cruise missiles. This in no way contradicts their additional demand to raise the nuclear threshold through increased conventional weapons. The Americans aren't joking in this respect, as can easily be determined in Washington of late and as Weinberger indicated to his European colleagues in Brussels when they were pressing for a compromise at the Geneva negotiations. They take the zero solution, which like counterarmament is actually a German invention, so seriously that they will insist on counterarmament if a zero solution is not achieved.

Strategic problems, which are hardly being discussed anyway, as well as American credibility, about which Washington permits no official doubts, are no longer involved. U.S. national interests require that Europe assume a higher risk and a higher share in defending the old continent.

If the Europeans block counterarmament in the event of a failure at the Geneva negotiations, sources close to Weinberger threaten that the alliance will face its gravest test. The demand of Senator Ted Stevens for a reduction of American troops in Europe would then find a majority in Congress, and we would even have to reckon with America turning its back on its European allies.

Although a compromise at the Geneva negotiations was mentioned for the first time in Brussels, there is probably no way out of the dilemma. If counterarmament fails, the negotiations will also fail because of a Soviet lack of interest. If counterarmament commences by the end of 1983 as planned, negotiations will probably also fail because the Soviet Union is threatening to take countermeasures. The Russians have indicated, however, that they want to continue negotiating even during deployment, and this explains the defense ministers' hope for a more flexible approach by Moscow. The Americans also want to continue negotiating. However, this would make sense only if in this way they wanted to signal to the Soviets that "we want to start out slowly," and this would not particularly strengthen the negotiating position. So with the dual decision, the West has maneuvered itself into a blind alley. No matter what it does, it can only lead to further and even more grave discord in NATO.

CHEYSSON BLAMES U.S. FOR LACK OF COMMUNICATION

[Text] Paris, Dec 6 (AFP) -- French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson today blamed the United States for a lack of communication within the Atlantic alliance, saying there had been no consultation between Paris and Washington "for months and months."

"It is not possible, in so basic an alliance, that we should not talk to one another," he told the Anglo-American Press Club, attributing the silence to the recent U.S.-West European tension over the Soviet gas pipeline.

Mr Cheysson said the coming year would be "formidable" with respect to mounting protectionism within the European Community, and the uncertainty weighing on Soviet-American strategic arms talks in Geneva.

Failure of the two superpowers to reach a clear conclusion in the negotiations would result in a "very serious situation," and would call the credibility of Western defense into question, he said.

Sees 1983 as 'Alarming'

LD081838 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 6 Dec 82

[Text] 1983 will be particularly alarming at the strategic level. This was said by Claude Cheysson who was a guest of the Anglo-American press. The Minister of External Relations thinks economic stagnation will worsen the current crisis even more. If the Geneva disarmament negotiations are unsuccessful, a treaty dating from 1979 provides for the deployment of Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe as a response to Soviet missiles. Claude Cheysson considers that this treaty will have to be implemented; otherwise, he says, the Western powers will lose some of their credibility.

Views South African Apartheid

AB061253 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1127 GMT 6 Dec 82

[Statement by French Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson in response to a question on apartheid in South Africa at the National Assembly in Paris on 1 December 1982.

[Text] Honorable members of Parliament: The government has never stopped affirming its respect for human rights and its desire to defend them all over the world, whether in Eastern Europe, Central America and the Caribbean, western Asia, Southeast Asia or naturally, in South Africa.

In this regard, we denounce all racial, religious or sexual discrimination and we condemn racism in all its forms, especially apartheid, which the president of the republic, with the authority invested in him, has declared intolerable and unacceptable. Also, when political prisoners are threatened with the most serious penalties, the government and the head of state himself intervene through very efficient means. This is sometimes discreet and at other times public; only the result shows.

In the case of South Africa, we have always thought it wise to remind the South Africans of their moral responsibilities, to place these men who govern the country and who claim to be Christians and democrats before their consciences.

We have done it as Frenchmen and we will do it again. We have also acted with the EEC because we noticed that the voice of the 10, which includes countries which are close to South Africa -- the Netherlands for example -- had a better chance of being heard. In this manner, we have sometimes obtained a reduction of sentences for prisoners. In other cases, unfortunately, the people died anyhow, like Steve Biko.

Presently, at the initiative of France, efforts are being made in the case of Pastor Naude, a great figure among South Africa's white population who spoke against apartheid and who has been served with a banning notice. A few days ago, we learned that the right of appeal of the three ANC members who were condemned to death last August had been rejected. They are now about to be executed.

The 10, through the voice of its current chairman, will tomorrow, as they have never failed to do up to the present -- often, I repeat, at the initiative of France -- attempt to remind the South Africans of their responsibilities and leave them to face their consciences.

MAUROY CRITICIZES PUBLICATION OF DEFENSE LETTER

[Text] Paris, Dec 6 (AFP) -- The press leak of a confidential letter on the dangers of proposed cuts in the French Army drew a quick and angry response from Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy today.

He called the publication, by the Socialist daily, LE MATIN, "a serious error," "unacceptable," and said "sanctions are called for and will be taken."

The letter, dated October 9, 1982 and stamped "Defense: Confidential," was written by General Jean Delaunay, commander-in-chief of France's 356,000-strong Army, to his superior, Chief of Staff General Jeannou Lacaze.

It warned that cuts of 30,000 troops and 11 billion francs (1.5 billion dollars) planned for 1984-88 would result in "a smaller, weaker army with aging weapons and poor morale."

Mr Mauroy said contents of the letter represented only "studies in hypotheses."

"To put the accent on such or such hypothesis would by consequence play into the hands of certain special interests," he said. "The government will not allow such maneuvers to develop."

More Documents Published

[Text] Paris, Dec 7 (AFP) -- A major row was building up here as further top secret defence documents were published today although Prime Minister Pierre Mauroy warned yesterday that sanctions would be taken over the leaks.

The Socialist daily newspaper LE MATIN DE PARIS yesterday published a confidential letter sent by Army Commander General Jean Delaunay to the head of the joint Armed Forces General Staff General Jeannou Lacaze complaining bitterly at defence budget cuts which would seriously weaken France's 356,000-strong Army.

General Delaunay was concerned at a cutback of 30,000 men over the period 1984-88 and a slash in expenditure leading to out-dated weapons.

Today the newspaper published similar critical and confidential letters to General Lacaze written by General Bernard Capillon, head of the 100,000-strong Air Force and Admiral Yves Leenhardt, head of the 76,000-strong Navy.

General Capillon in a letter dated October 6, 1982 complained that the budget cuts would reduce the French air fleet to 300 jet-fighter combat planes instead of 450, limit the annual flying time to 400,000 hours, reduced manpower by 7,000, a weakening of radar air defence systems, the closing of two air bases.

General Capillon said that the Air Force needed an extra 6,000 million francs (about $900 million).

Admiral Leenhardt, in a confidential letter dated October 7, 1982 said that planned budget cuts would lead to "a radical change in the whole nature of the Navy and, consequently, one of the main instruments of our foreign policy."

He said budget cuts would mean the loss of 5,000 seamen: Giving up either the naval patrol plane "Atlantic" or abandoning new nuclear-powered aircraft carriers, the air-sea defence flotilla would be reduced from nine to five or six ships, anti-submarine boats from 14 to 11, mine laying and clearing operations would be drastically reduced, amphibious assault craft and supply ships would be cut by one-third.

The government has reacted quickly to the "leaks".

The Defence Ministry has opened an inquiry into them and warned that "sanctions will be taken against those involved".

The ministry also pointed out that the armed forces heads were reacting to a "theoretical working paper" which in no way committed the government to make the cuts that (?are) set out.

Pierre Messmer, former premier and De Gaulle's defence minister for 10 years, today publicly criticised the "leaks" as being harmful to France.

He said that they could only demoralise French soldiers, sailors and airmen.

The complaints seem caused by the fact that the government had decided that the annual defence budget must not exceed 3.895 percent of France's gross domestic product.

Recent defence decisions have also given priority to France's costly nuclear strike force, sometimes at the expense of traditional arms like tanks and artillery.

Marchais on Leaks

LD062316 Paris Domestic Service in French 1820 GMT 6 Dec 82

["Facing the Public" program presented by Gilbert Denoyan with PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais being interviewed by Bernard Vallette of France Inter, Noel-Jean Bergeroux of L'EXPRESS, (Paul Guilbert) of LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS, (France Olivier Gisbert) of LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR, and (Jean-Claude Narcie) of TF1 --live]

[Excerpts] [Denoyan] Georges Marchais, today's political news is concerned with the confidential report of the armed forces chiefs of staff addressed to the minister of defense and published this morning by our colleague, LE MATIN DE PARIS. Well, the report is seen as a warning against the spending cuts envisaged for personnel and equipment. In the opinion of the chiefs of staff, the risk is one of seeing the credibility of our defense, and in time its capacity, harmed.

Well, I would like to ask you if you are also concerned and if you believe that the risk is as great as the military fears.

[Answer] Absolutely not, because since it came to power, the left has demonstrated its desire to continue with a defense policy both at the level of a deterrent force and also at the level of conventional weapons. What is true is that in the discussion on the 1983 budget, some measures were planned in order to effect a reduction. I have the figures here: They basically correspond to postponing for 1 year the manufacture of 26 combat planes, 47 tanks and 26 artillery pieces. Consequently, to speak of a weakening of national defense is really not being serious. Well, in the document you mention the question which clearly arises is the following: What does General Delaunay mean? What is true is that the debate is going to take place in Parliament next year on the military planning law for 1984 to 1988. The fact that General Delaunay should send a letter to the minister of defense [as heard] making known his hopes and his aspirations, his wish to see our conventional forces maintained -- in the Army as far as he is concerned, and in the Air Force and Navy as far as the others are concerned -- it seems to me quite legitimate for him to ask for the means to be maintained. I do not have any observations to make on that issue. I would say straight away, on the other hand, that if this was a political move with the aim of lending support to the move launched by the right at the time of the budget debate on the issue of national defense, well clearly, that would raise an extremely serious question because it would be a matter of calling into question the left's ability to ensure France's national defense. It would also be extremely serious for a second reason, for the Army has always shown great republican public-spiritedness and has naturally accepted the authority of the political party in power elected by universal suffrage. But I do not wish to believe that this is the case. What I regret a great deal is that LE MATIN DE PARIS believed it had to engage in this spectacular activity.

[Vallette] Let us press on, Mr Marchais. The other day, in a lecture the contents of which were published almost in full on three pages of L'HUMANITE, you leveled some criticism at the bourgeosie and the employers. This is not at all surprising on your part. But these criticisms, if one reads them carefully, seem particularly aimed at the whole of the current management of the economy. Well, to sum up for us, do you think that any other policy is possible now, apart from that of Mr Mauroy, any other way, shall we say, of maintaining the major balances by putting less of a burden on the wage-earners, which is something that worries you?

[Answer] I do not think you have read my document very well.

You say: Naturally you engage in criticism of the employers and the bourgeoisie. I would like to be able to do otherwise but I do not see how I can avoid criticizing both the right and the CNPF [employers' organisation] which have plunged our country into a crisis in which there are 2 million unemployed and where there is a very high rate of inflation. Consequently, I do not see how I can avoid criticizing this policy that has been followed for 23 years.

[Vallette] And you have been associated with the country's leadership for the past 18 months.

[Answer] For 18 months, and I consider that during 18 months things have been done: First, inflation is receding; for this year we shall have 10 percent at the most, perhaps a little less. Second, we have succeeded in considerably slowing down unemployment.

of course, there are 2 million unemployed. This is almost the situation we had when we took over. Unemployment has considerably slowed down and is now, in fact, much below that in the FRG which, for a long time, served as a model for you. In consequence, I believe that the policy that has been initiated is beginning to bear certain fruits.

Now then, in the doucment, in the lecture you are talking about, I draw your attention to the fact that at no time -- and I believe you that you have misread -- have I engaged in criticism of the government's policy. The conclusion I am drawing is that the crisis has its source in the capitalist system itself. But the only way out of the crisis in this system, so we say in the Communist Party, is socialism in the French manner. Time is one part of my argument; and the second part goes on to say that it is with this view that we Communists are working in the government. We are working in the government with four objectives: The first is to reconquer the domestic market; the second is to increase the purchasing power of the workers and reduce the mess capitalism has caused; the third is to provide better vocational training for workers and more rights for them in enterprises; and the fourth is to establish new criteria for management. And you must see that these objectives fully concord with what the French people wanted in May and June by electing the president of the republic and giving the majority of votes to the left.

[Guilbert] How do you view the relation of power between Socialist and communists before the municipal election? What do you yourself think? Polling has not taken place yet. Have you gained or regressed in the past 18 months.

[Answer] I think that in order to reply to your question we will have to wait for the elections.

[Guilbert] Yes, but you must have some idea. Maybe you do not believe in opinion poll figures.

[Answer] Which one?

[Guilbert] Maybe the one favorable to you.

[Answer] When, in the same week, a weekly says Georges Marchais is dropping 4 percent and then says he is gaining 6 percent, something must be wrong. No doubt the two pollsters concerned do not work on the same basis, unless, of course, polls are also sometimes manipulated. I am certain of this because I have proof. I am not going to say more. I have irrefutable proof in the matter. Believe me, that if necessary they can sue me over the matter. I tell you, I have an example of a manipulated poll, and consequently, I have my reservations when reference is made to polls.

[Answer] I shall say no more.

[Unidentified questioner] Mr Marchais, from the beginning of this broadcast you have been defending the policy of the government, with courage, as Pierre Mauroy would say. But if we read the papers, we see certain specialists say that the PCF is playing a double game, is in fact playing for failure. There is one way one can answer this question. Tell us whether or not you are optimistic regarding the economy. Do you think that it will work?

[Answer] I do not play for failure. My party is not playing for failure.

We are playing for total success. In other words, the first stage is the implementation of the policy of May and June which should allow us to attain our objectives in the fields of inflation, unemployment, the rebuilding of productive capacity, a better balance in our foreign trade, a great peace policy, and so forth. We want to attain these objectives because we think that if at the end of the 7-year term we, Communists and Socialists together, have caused France to progress in the direction I have just mentioned, then new prospects for the left will open up to the French people. We desire it all the more passionately because we have lived through other experiences. From the point of view of the future, from the point of view of the prospect of socialism in the French manner, we are doing and we shall do all we can, as decided by universal suffrage, in order to win the battle we are engaged in together with the Socialists.

[Guilbert] Mr Marchais, I would like to have some news from you. It has been suggested in connection with the talks between the president of the republic and Mrs Gandhi in New Delhi that the USSR may adopt a more flexible position on Afghanistan. It was said that there are small signs of this. Now you are among those French people who have met Mr Andropov. Much is placed on the change of leadership in the Kremlin. So could you inform us, did you honestly see in your conversation with Mr Andropov that the USSR is likely to slightly change its policy on Afghanistan?

[Answer] Yes, in fact I have met not only Mr Andropov; besides, I am not qualified to speak in the name of the Soviet Government. I am the secretary general of the French Communist Party. But, in effect, I have met him. And I have not only met him. I have met the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party and its secretary general, Hu Yaobang, with whom we discussed at length every aspect of the international situation, including that which you have just mentioned. On the occasion of Leonid Brezhnev's funeral, I met other statesmen, not only party secretaries but statesmen with whom I had conversations. Now then, briefly, because we are nearing the end of this program, what can I tell you? From all the talks I have had, I am certain that within a relatively short time, even very short, in my opinion, we shall be heading toward the solution of major questions which have recently preoccupied the French people. Among these major questions there is Afghanistan, where, in my opinion, a political settlement is possible. From the moment the independence of the Afghan people is respected and there is no more external intervention, I am certain that the Soviet Army will withdraw. Now, Zia's presence, that of the Pakistani leader in Moscow, was significant. Without any doubt, Pakistan is seeking a solution in this direction.

In the second place, I gained from these talks the certainty that at the international level we will also move toward the solution of the Kampuchean problem, we will progress toward a rapprochement with efforts from both sides, a rapprochement between the Soviet Union and China, and the latest information in my possession shows that in Poland martial law will undoubtedly be suspended on 13 December, and most of those held in prison will be freed. And so you see all this makes me believe that the international situation is evolving in a direction that is favorable to the cause of peace, of friendship among peoples and of international cooperation. And I think that it is exactly this evolution of the international situation that makes some people furious, and hence the antisocialist and anticommunist campaigns in the name of human rights. But naturally, I am not a complacent optimist. I say that the settlement of these questions also requires the intervention of peoples. This means that it is necessary for men and women who want peace, disarmament, security and states, international cooperation and friendship to make their voices heard and say what they want.

LE MONDE ON NONPROLIFERATION, URANIUM FOR INDIA

[Editorial: "France and Nonproliferation"]

[Text] The president of the republic returned to Paris Wednesday morning after spending 1 week in India and Egypt, which are two of the leading Third World countries. It was a trip which, to cite Mr Mitterrand, opens up "considerable prospects."

The agreement for France to supply slightly enriched uranium for the Tarapur power station near Bombay is, however, likely to somewhat undermine that assessment. Because, to find a way out of a difficult negotiation, the Elysee had to somewhat trim the principles which had hitherto governed French nuclear exports.

It is true that the situation was impossible. The Americans conceded the role of supplier to France because their nonproliferation regulations -- which change with Congress' whim -- were strengthened in March 1978. New Delhi, which is not a signatory of the proliferation treaty and has frequently condemned the "cartel" of suppliers which issues the London directives, and whose fierce nuclear nationalism is well known and understandable, could not accept Washington's new rules. Why should India have accepted the application by Paris of directives which restrict the freedom of movement of nuclear technology and equipment and which are the result of a consensus among the northern countries?

France, which did not owe the United States any favors, should probably have refused to take over that burdensome role. Following its acceptance last July, the desire that the meeting between Mrs Gandhi and Mr Mitterrand take place in the best possible atmosphere did the rest. The French, whose nonproliferation principles have been clearly defined since 1976 and were reaffirmed by the president of the republic on 22 December 1981, have agreed, according to the text of the contract, to refer possible controls on the enriched uranium or its irradiated derivatives to "later talks" after the Indian-U.S. contract expires, in other words, in 1993.

It was more dangerous not to sign, Paris stresses, since India, which already has large quantities of irradiated fuel (the Tarapur power station has been operating since 1969) could have reprocessed it immediately -- and thus extracted plutonium from it -- if the contract had been rejected. Hence, according to France, the importance of gaining 10 years in this manner during which checks will be made. In addition, it is added, this agreement's deliberate ambiguity cannot be repeated. It can only be explained by the need for Paris to take over for Washington in a contract signed by in 1963 at a time when the principles governing civilian nuclear exchanges were not very clear and when what was at stake was not very clearly understood. Nonetheless, by placing efficacy before principles in this manner, France has taken the risk of increasing the confusion which presently reigns in that sphere. Making possible the legitimate development of nuclear energy without exposing yourself to the dangers of nuclear arms proliferation requires very great stringency. The 1968 nonproliferation treaty -- a contractual approach which brought together the potential suppliers and importers of equipment -- gave way under pressure from countries which, through nationalism or opportunism, intended to safeguard the future.

The 1978 London directives were merely a consensus solely among the possessors of nuclear technology. Negotiating the principles in a bilateral way would look like a major step backward at a time when Pakistan, Brazil, Argentina, South Korea, Libya and many other countries are now candidates.

'RELAXED ATMOSPHERE' IN FANFANI COALITION

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 6 -- The new Italian Government led by Amintore Fanfani will be completed today with the appointment of the undersecretaries. Meanwhile the premier is busy drafting his platform address to be delivered before the Senate Saturday. The atmosphere surrounding the partners in the new coalition is a relaxed one.

The new finance minister, Francesco Forte, speaking to a conference Sunday renewed his esteem and confidence in his colleague at the Treasury Ministry, Giovanni Goria. Given the fact that it was wrangling between the finance and treasury ministers in the previous Cabinet that brought the Spadolini government down, the good relations between their successors boded well for the new Fanfani-led team.

Social Democratic Party leader Luigi Preti said that Fanfani must be allowed to work in tranquillity and that he must not be subjected to the harassments dealt to his predecessor. He said that the four coalition parties (the Christian Democrats, the Socialists, the Social Democrats and the Liberals) had a "patriotic duty" to cooperate seriously, without hankering after early elections which would only weaken the government from the start.

Liberal Secretary Valerio Zanone claimed that the new government was not a step backward for the laic parties on condition that each of them played an active role in essential government activity. He also urged the maximum cooperation among the four partners.

As to the Republican Party, which declined to be a part of the present government, Zanone said that the Liberals shared many goals such as the moralization of public life. He renewed his appeal to the PRI to provide that contribution expected of all the democratic parties.

Under Secretaries Named

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, December 6 -- The Italian Government has completed its structure today by naming 51 undersecretaries. There were 6 fewer undersecretaries than in the previous government. The posts were divided among the four coalition partners as follows: 28 Christian Democrats, 15 Socialists, 5 Social Democrats and 3 Liberals.

FURTHER ON ANTONOV, OTHER BULGARIAN SUSPECTS

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 6 -- The Bulgarian state airlines manager arrested in Rome November 25 and charged as an accomplice in the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II will be kept in confinement, according to a ruling handed down today by the three judges of Rome's "Court of Freedom" in denying the motion for the release of Sergey Ivanov Antonov filed by his defense attorneys. The special court was instituted across the land in the summer to hear motions for the release of detainees which must be filed within five days of the arrest.

Antonov's defense lawyers, who filed their motion on November 30, maintained that the testimony of the airline manager's colleagues would demonstrate that their client did not leave his office on the day the pope was shot in Saint Peter's Square, May 13 last year. The three judges, empowered to annul the arrest warrant, found that the grounds for his release were insufficient, however.

Mehmet Ali Agca, the self-styled Turkish terrorist captured at the scene of the shooting and now serving a life sentence here following conviction for the attempt, was said by sources close to the investigation to have named the Bulgarian as an accomplice.

In a related development, an Italian prosecutor asked the Foreign Ministry at the weekend to revoke the diplomatic status of Bulgarian official (Teodorov Ayvazov), who reportedly worked as a cashier in the Bulgarian Embassy here. No warrant has been issued for the arrest of (Ayvazov) who has, in the meantime, returned to Bulgaria. On Friday, a warrant was signed for the arrest of the Bulgarian secretary of the military attache at the Rome embassy. Vassiliev Juelio Kolov is said to have returned to Bulgaria 6 months ago.

Last night, the Bulgarian general consul in Rome, (Stefan Ghenev), again denied Antonov's involvement in the shooting and, speaking to a press conference, cited a telephone call from Bulgaria the day of the attempt. (Ghenev) said that the mother of a Bulgarian employee of the state airlines office was unable to reach her daughter so she spoke of Antonov [as received] who, according to the general consul, ran to turn on the radio to get news of the event. [Ghenev] also said that the two Italian nationals held in Bulgaria on spy charges "are subjected to normal juridical treatment. Our laws are the same for everyone", he said.

According to the relatives of the pair, Paolo Frasetti and Gabriella Trevisin, the charge is based on their having snapped a photograph of an old tank. The Italian press has speculated that the two may have been picked up in August because Bulgarian authorities could foresee charges filed against Bulgarian nationals in Rome in connection with the assassination attempt. There have also been reports of Bulgarian hints of an exchange between the state airlines employee and the two Italians.

Italian investigators have also named six Turkish nationals as involved in a plot on the pope's life. One, (Omar Bacci), has been extradited from Switzerland.

L'UNITA ON FORMULATION OF CONGRESS DOCUMENT

PM061621 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 27 Nov 92 pp 1, 22

[Giorgio Frasca Polara report: "How Our Congress Document Was Debated for 3 Days"]

[Text] Rome -- Tomorrow L'UNITA will publish the full text of the policy document approved Thursday evening by the Central Committee and Central Control Commission as a basis for the preparatory discussion for the 16th congress due to take place in Milan on 2-6 March.

How did this document originate? What progress led to the definition of assessments and stances on the principal topics of domestic and foreign policy filling some 100 pages? A month and a half of work by the "Commission of 48" (composed of Central Committee and Central Control Commission members and other comrades who contributed in their particular specialist fields) led to the formulation of draft document, which was partly also the result of exchanges of views with individuals and experts, particularly jurists and economists, from outside the PCI. This document, subdivided into seven sections (the democratic alternative, the economic crisis, culture as a national issue, institutional reform, Italian foreign policy, the future of socialism and the regeneration and development of the party) passed examination by the testing Central Committee and Central Control Commission session after 2 and 1/2 days' work, 30 hours of debate, including some night sessions and a large number of votes on a total of about 400 amendments.

It was a very tense and intensive debate, which in many ways constitutes a substantial innovation in precongress procedures in the way respective stances and divergences were compared -- when they emerged -- even on fundamental issues. This method will provide the party with all the necessary information for forming an assessment, by means of the publication in L'UNITA (next Tuesday) of all the amendments for which, though rejected by a large majority, their initiators requested publication.

The final vote gives an idea of the fundamental agreement with which the Central Committee and Central Control Commission session closed: The document was approved with one vote against (Armando Cossutta) and two abstentions (Guido Cappelloni and Domenico Donchia), though, as was seen in the votes on several amendments, within the context of this substantial agreement there were differences of approach and emphasis on politically significant issues.

The fact is that a substantial number of amendments suggested corrections and modifications, amplifications and additions, and were adopted or in some way contributed to the definition of the approved text. (However, it should be noted that the innovation that transformed the Central Committee intoa kind of editorial committee made the proceedings very complex.)

However, it is also true that the liveliest and most testing debate took place on political problems, starting with issues concerning the future of socialism. In this instance, the amendments concerned not so much our concept of a democratic road to building a new kind of society, as our verdict on the historical experience of socialism marked by the model realized in the USSR and a number of Soviet foreign policy acts from Afghanistan to Poland. Several amendments were submitted to the vote and rejected -- the only ones whose publications was requested by their initiators.

On the subject of the democratic alternative too, there was a lengthy discussion with different assessments emerging in several speeches concerning the forces to be relied on in achieving it and concerning the DC's role. A substantial reservation on the approach to this part of the document was expressed by Marisa Rodano, who voted in favor of the final agenda, however.

The debate on institutional matters was also intensive. In particular, differing stances emerged on the issue of bicameralism -- between the hypothesis of differentiating the functions of the lower and upper houses and that of a single-house system. The latter prevailed, thus confirming an option already outlined by the PCI.

A third area in which there was a lively debate because of the pressing nature of the problems concerned was that of economic policy, particularly regarding social expenditure, compatibilities, the impart of the anti-inflation struggle and the relationship between it and development.

Last, the discussion on the section on the regeneration and development of the party led to a broad critical deliberation in the wake of the conclusions reached by the Central Committee at the session specifically devoted to these topics almost 2 years ago. A series of amendments (some embodied in the drafting of this document and others submitted for examination by the Commission of Organizational Problems, whose proceedings continue and which will report to the congress) presented various angles on the issues of a complete functioning of internal democracy, the ways in which dissent is guaranteed, relations among the different levels of the organization and political leadership and a more precise demarcation of roles between the party Central Committee and Directorate.

These are the essential points of the discussion from which the document emerged. The congress campaign now begins on this basis.

ELLEMANN-JENSEN'S TALKS WITH ISRAELI LEADERS

PM071029 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 29 Nov 82 p 4

[Ritzaus Bureau Kristian Mouritzen dispatch: "Ellemann-Jensen Achieved Little in Israel"]

[Text] Jerusalem -- On Sunday [28 November] Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen told Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin and Foreign Minister Yitzhak Shamir that it will "damage Israel's chances of surviving as a democratic state" if the Israeli Government continues with its settlement policy on the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, diplomatic sources said in Jerusalem Sunday.

According to these sources, the Danish foreign minister made no attempt to conceal the fact that if Israel attempts, officially or unofficially, to annex the Israeli-occupied areas or to change the composition of the areas' population through settlements, it would lose the support of its old friends. The foreign minister, who is on a 2-day visit to Israel, gave an account in what in diplomatic language is called "plain terms" of the EEC nations' view of Israeli policy. He expressed his concern at this and said: "Peace cannot be achieved with armed force, only through negotiations." After his meetings, the foreign minister said that he will not be returning to Copenhagen feeling more optimistic about a swift solution to the conflicts in the Middle East, and he did not hide the fact that the results of his talks did not come up to his expectations.

Uffe Ellemann-Jensen also said that the persecution of Palestinian university teachers must cease, and pointed out that such persecution is against all democratic principles. But the foreign minister promised the Israeli Government that the EEC will not use economic sanctions against it to try to get it to change its policy.

The foreign minister told the Israeli foreign minister that he would look into the economic repercussions for Israel of Spanish admission to the EEC -- an area which has been worrying the Israeli Government greatly because Israel's agricultural exports to the EEC, which total an estimated $800 million, would be put at risk if Spain becomes a member of the EEC.

The U.S. peace plan for the Middle East was also discussed and here the Danish foreign minister criticized Israel for not reacting positively to President Reagan's proposal calling for the creation of Palestinian self-rule in the Israeli-occupied areas in a federation with Jordan.

Israel dismissed the criticism by saying that Israel will rely on the Camp David agreement between Egypt, the United States and Israel, which speaks of the creation of self-rule in the occupied areas but, in the Israeli view, under Israeli control. A source in the Israeli Foreign Ministry said that Israel will never allow an independent Palestinian state in the occupied areas, nor does it want Judea and Samaria, which Israel calls the West Bank, to form part of a federation with Jordan.

Much was said about the traditionally close ties between Israel and Denmark, but among the elegant phrases, both sides more than hinted that relations between Israel and the West European nations -- including Denmark -- are extremely strained. Uffe Ellemann-Jensen also stressed that it is necessary for all parties involved in the conflict, including the Palestinians, to participate in the peace process. The Danish foreign minister said that he would now be returning to Copenhagen to report the Israeli views to the EEC nations' ministers at an EEC summit there 3 and 4 December.

The foreign minister also promised to raise Israel's worries about Spanish membership of the EEC at the meeting. On Sunday Uffe Ellemann-Jensen also had talks with Israeli President Yitzhak Navon, and the foreign minister laid a wreath at Yad Vassem -- the Israeli monument to the six million Jews who died in Nazi Germany.

Urges Israeli Flexibility

PM071031 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 30 Nov 82 p 4

[Mogens Kofod-Hansen report: "Ellemann-Jensen's Words Ill-Received in Israel"]

[Text] "Both Israel and the Palestinians must show some flexibility if the peace process is to have a chance," Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen said yesterday on his return from his EEC mission to Jerusalem. Asked about the PLO's rejection of President Reagan's peace plan, he said: "Obviously none of the parties is showing much flexibility at the moment." Nevertheless, he considered Israel to be the one which should do so.

Ellemann-Jensen said that in accordance with the instructions he had received in Brussels, he had spoken "most plainly" to the Israeli leaders, Prime Minister Begin and Foreign Minister Shamir, about the "deep European concern about Israeli policy."

"They did not care to listen. But it was important for them that I was able to convey their replies. And I noticed that they were pleased that it was the Danish foreign minister who was representing the Ten. The talks were frank and friendly. When I reproached Israel, I did so as a good friend, I said."

The meeting dealt with three main topics. First, the Reagan plan, which Ellemann-Jensen called on the Israelis to support. The EEC takes the view, he said, that the PLO must be brought into the negotiations. The PLO, however, rejects this and Israel is unwilling to go beyond the Camp David agreement.

Second, the settlement policy on the West Bank, which the Danish foreign minister described as dangerous to the Israelis, but Shamir replied that Israel will not retreat to its 1967 borders. And, according to Ellemann-Jensen, Begin said: "We were born there. We have a right to it." The Danish guest replied: "That is not correct. You are the only country in the world which supports such a claim, for it conflicts with UN resolutions and is contrary to Israeli democracy."

Third, Lebanon, where Ellemann-Jensen has stressed the need for the withdrawal of foreign forces and advised against pressuring the Lebanese too much because of their need for a good relationship with the Arab world. The Israelis replied "the sooner, the better," but insisted that withdrawal should be simultaneous, and they did not think that Syria would agree to this.

The foreign minister said that he was neither more nor less optimistic than before his visit.

Israelis Angered by Remarks

PM071033 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 30 Nov 82 p 1

[Mogens Kofod-Hansen report: "Ellemann-Jensen's Words Create Storm in Israel"]

[Text] Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen's words have caused a furor in Israel. Yesterday the country's press quoted him as saying that the Begin government's settlements policy could lead to "apartheid-like" conditions if it is allowed to continue. Danes living in Jerusalem and Denmark's radio listeners heard similar reports.

On his return yesterday from his visit as EEC representative, Ellemann-Jensen denied that he had used words like "apartheid" or "bantustan." He assured BERLINGSKE TIDENDE: "I did not." "However, I did tell the Israeli leaders that if they continue the policy they are drawing up for the West Bank -- a policy threatening annexation and the disturbance of the population balance (between Arabs and Jews) -- they must understand that they will lose some of their good friends." The statement is said to have led to a tough exchange of views. There are claims and denials of the use of the word "apartheid."

Israeli representatives are shaken by the very harsh criticism the foreign minister directed at Israeli policy on behalf of the EEC. Experienced diplomats pointed out that nothing like it has been heard from previous EEC chairmen visiting Israel -- not even from former British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, who is no friend of Israel.

Reagan Plan Viable Alternative

PM071035 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 30 Nov 82 p 10

[Editorial: "Who Will Move?"]

[Text] Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen did not get much out of his EEC mission to Israel, but this was to be expected. Prime Minister Begin is not in the habit of bowing humbly to a none-too-welcome guest who has come to criticize his settlement policy on the West Bank and warn him against continuing with it. Nevertheless, the EEC chairman was right to outline European views and hear the Israeli Government's reaction to them before the European summit meets here at the end of this week. Developments in the Middle East and the European chances of influencing them will be one of the topics at the discussions between heads of government in the European Council and they will have fresh impressions from both sides of the Jordan River on which to base them.

Hopefully, the summit will not lose itself in unproductive one-sided criticism of Israel, although Begin's inflexibility invites this, because this would mean that European influence would be unable to achieve anything. If Israel's attitude is to become more flexible, it will need positive promptings. After his visit to Amman, Ellemann-Jensen said that the Arabs had shifted position a little and that now it was Israel's turn to move. But truthfully, neither side has moved at all. Three months have passed since President Reagan put forward the peace plan which gave the PLO the opportunity to salvage a political role from its military defeat in Lebanon. Two months have passed since Ellemann-Jensen offered the PLO EEC recognition in New York in return for PLO recognition of Israel's right to exist in peace and security. But the PLO has done neither. Last week the PLO Central Council rejected the Reagan plan and reaffirmed its demand for the establishment of an independent [selvstaendig og uafhaengig] Palestinian state. This does not have to be taken as the final word on the matter, for it would seem that there is a constant struggle between the more moderate and the militant forces in the PLO. But at present it is the militant forces, controlled from Syria, who have the upper hand, even though Yasir 'Arafat as the PLO's chairman has other ideas.

As long as King Husayn in Amman has no mandate from the PLO to negotiate on behalf of the Palestinians, he will not and cannot move into negotiations on future Palestinian self-rule on the West Bank under Jordanian sovereignty, as outlined in the Reagan plan. And at present it is difficult to blame the Israeli Government for pushing its model for Palestinian self-rule under Israeli sovereignty. It is the moderate Arab states which must force their will on Syria and the PLO if a viable alternative for the West Bank is to be created through the Reagan plan. There must be something to negotiate about and someone to negotiate with before we can expect Israel to move away from its present course. So if Europe has any influence to exert, it should be used to promote what is most important -- acceptance of the Reagan plan by those it would benefit.

SINDERMANN-LED DELEGATION BEGINS TALKS IN UK

[Text] London, 6 Dec (ADN) -- On Monday a delegation from the GDR People's Chamber led by its president, Horst Sindermann, member of the SED Central Committee Politburo, arrived in Great Britain for a 1-week official visit. The delegation was invited by the speaker of the House of Commons, George Thomas, and the lord chancellor and Cabinet member, Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone.

On arrival at London's Heathrow Airport, the delegation, which is comprised of deputies from the SED, the Christian Democratic Union, the Liberal Democratic Party of Germany and the National Democratic Party of Germany, was given a cordial welcome by Peter Temple-Morris, the chairman of the British representation to the International Parliamentary Union [IPU]. Horst Sindermann met with Minister of State for Trade Peter Rees and is to hold talks with politicians and representatives of the government and British industry. During his talks with Rees, both sides stressed their interest in the further development of relations between the GDR and Great Britain, specifically in economic, industrial and scientific-technical cooperation.

The People's Chamber president stressed that the GDR regards continuity in and the expansion and deepening of economic relations as a stabilizing factor for detente and the policy of peaceful coexistence. The GDR supports the expansion of cooperation on the basis of equality, sovereignty and mutual advantage.

In the evening the chairman of the British representation in the IPU gave a dinner in honor of the guests from the GDR. Immediately after his arrival, the president of the People's Chamber laid flowers at the grave of Karl Marx in Highgate Cemetry in north London. The deputies thus honored the founder of scientific socialism who lived and worked for almost 34 years in London until his death almost 100 years ago.

DAILY TELEGRAPH HAILS NATO'S 'NEW DETERMINATION'

PM031051 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 2 Dec 82 p 18

[Editorial: "NATO's New Will"]

[Text] The so-called NATO "twin-track" policy of deploying a new generation of intermediate-range nuclear missiles by the end of 1983 unless the Soviet Union has begun to dismantle its corresponding SS-20's is looking in reasonable shape. A year ago, the same could not have been said. Ill-advised and insensitive remarks by American officials, including President Reagan himself, about the possibility of being able to limit a nuclear engagement to the European theatre had given the Soviet Union and the self-styled peace movement a heaven-sent propaganda advantage. At the same time, Chancellor Schmidt was facing increasing criticism from his own party over his personal commitment to take the cruise and Pershing II missiles on West German soil, while the coalition government in Holland was divided and fearful of defeat over the issue.

Since then, President Reagan has succeed in allaying some, but by no means all, European fears with his zero option initiative (which would mean the withdrawal of all intermediate range nuclear forces by both sides) and an apparently sincere promise of a constructive approach to negotiations with the Russians in Geneva. The political scene in Europe has also changed with governments of the centre-right, both firmly committed to the twin-track policy, taking over in Holland and Germany. The robust reaction from NATO's nuclear planning group to a particularly crude piece of Soviet bullying this week was a satisfying confirmation of the new mood.

It is to be fervently hoped that NATO's new determination will be maintained. It would be a disaster for the alliance if deployment were to be abandoned or in any way postponed unless the Soviet Union succumbs to a most improbable change of heart. That said, the question of deployment of our medium range missiles has been handled with almost as much ineptitude as the neutron bomb fiasco which preceded it. There are times when it seems that NATO's greatest talent is for shooting itself in the foot. One gesture which might at this stage win over more of the doubters would be for the Americans to offer each country which is to take the new missiles control over one of the safety catches. Up to now, this has been conditional on the host nation purchasing the missile (though not the warhead). As Dr David Owen has argued, national self respect means that people must feel that it is their government which can stop their territory being used to trigger nuclear war.

UN ENVOY LINKS RESOLUTIONS ON LEBANON, CYPRUS

NC061242 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 1200 GMT 6 Dec 82

[Text] Cyprus has repeated its call for immediate and unconditional withdrawal of Israeli troops from occupied Arab lands. It has also reiterated its support for the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. Addressing the [UN] General Assembly session on the question of Palestine, the Cyprus permanent representative at the United Nations, Mr Mousiouttas, criticized the world community for failing to act when the Israelis were committing naked military aggression against Lebanon and laying a ruthless siege to West Beirut. The Cypriot said: It is our feeling that this failure of the international community to act in such cases of crisis quickly and decisively through the United Nations, and especially through the Security Council, is a major weakness we must overcome for the sake of humanity. We cannot remain mere spectators when the principles of the charter of this organization are trampled on. He went on: We in Cyprus are confronted with the military invasion of 1974 and the occupation of almost 40 percent of our territory, and yet we at the United Nations seem to lack the political will to press for a solution on the basis of our own resolutions. Mr. Mousiouttas added: To this extent, we are partly responsible for the flareups and the perpetuation of the unresolved problems.

KLIRIDHIS THANKS PAPANDREOU FOR EEC STATEMENT

[Text] Mr Kliridhis, chairman of the Democratic Rally and candidate for the presidential elections, expressed gratitude and thanks for Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's statement at the last EEC summit conference. He also welcomed the intensive efforts Mr Papandreou is exerting for the repositioning and the international promotion of the Cyprus issue.

In his statement, Mr Kliridhis stated that all that was stressed by Mr Papandreou, both for the continuation of the dialogue under the presence of the Turkish occupation troops as well as on the way in which this dialogue is being held, reaffirm that differences exist between the Greek Government and the Kiprianou government.

KLIRIDHIS REFUTES ALLEGATIONS ON 'DOUBLE ENOSIS'

NC070810 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 7 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] Glavkos Kliridhis, candidate for the office of president of the republic, referring to a report by KHARAVYI TIS DHEVTERAS alleging that he privately favors double enosis, has made the following statement:

I am against double enosis, which I consider disastrous for Cyprus. It is the AKEL and consortium policy, which perpetuates the Cyprus problem and consolidates faits accomplis, that will precisely lead to partition and double enosis. I recall on this occasion that it is customary for KHARAVYI to laud on one occasion and to embark on mudslinging on another. It has followed such a policy not only in my case but also in the case of others, such as Ethnarch Makarios, whom it accused in 1959 of being a dictator, a fascist, a perjurer, a party leader and a herald of hatred and discord, as well as of reinstating the Turkish occupation of Cyprus.

'ARAFAT THANKS LISSARIDHIS FOR SUPPORT

NC070827 Nicosia TA NEA in Greek 7 Dec 82 p 1

["Text" of message from PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat to EDEK Chairman Vasos Lissaridhis -- date not given]

[Text] Dear Brother Vasos Lissaridhis: With militant greetings:

It was with gratitude that I received your message on the occasion of the day of international solidarity with the Palestinian people. The firm support given our people's just struggle by the Cypriot socialist forces confirms the relationship that unites our two people in joint struggle, a struggle for the securing of freedom, sovereignty and implementation of human values for all struggling peoples.

The support of the Cypriot socialist forces for our people's struggle increases our confidence in our revolutionary course in order to regain our inalienable national rights, including the rights of repatriation, self-determination and establishing our own independent state in our own national Palestinian territories.

We wish you health and happiness, and to your militant party success in the service of the Cypriot people.

Struggle until victory.

TURKISH CYPRIOT RESTATES POSITION ON TITLE DEEDS

NC070907 Nicosia BIRLIK in Turkish 3 Dec 82 p 1

[Excerpt] Lefkosa [Nicosia] (TAK) -- Minister of the Interior and Rehabilitation Esber Serakinci has again stated that the delivery of title deeds could actually begin in a month. Title deeds will be issued in the form of ownership certificates for equal property [left in the south]. Serakinci stressed that through this process, we shall retrieve "our rights, which the Greek Cypriots have been usurping for years."

At a dinner attended by the representatives of the press and broadcasting establishments last night, Esber Serakinci said: "The Greek Cypriots are trying to tell the world that what we are doing is an attempt to usurp their rights. In fact, we are struggling to retrieve our rights, which have been usurped over the years." Serakinci further stated that he preferred to reply to the Greek Cypriot side through acts and not statements.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES MISSING PERSONS REPORT

[Text] President Denktas has said that the report prepared on the missing persons in Cyprus by Lady (Ellis) is not compatible with the facts and would obstruct the work of the independent Missing Persons Committee in Cyprus. Commenting on a news report that Lady (Ellis) was approved by the European Parliament Political Committee, Mr Denktas said that Lady (Ellis) is of Greek origin and is a person who has been expressing pro-Greek views. He stressed that it was a mistake to appoint her as the committee's rapporteur and since then it was clear what the outcome would be. President Denktas recalled that Lady (Ellis) had visited Cyprus as the guest of the Greek Cypriots and her statements had made it clear that she had inflexible and fixed views on the issue. Therefore, such a lady could not be expected to present an impartial report.

Referring to the propaganda campaign in various European countries by the Greek Cypriots on the issue, Mr Denktas said that by this action they had proved that their only aim was propaganda and not to solve their problems. He stressed that the committee should not have approved the report before inquiring about the fate of babies and old people massacred in Turkish villages by the Greek Cypriots.

TURKISH CYPRIOT PAPER PROMOTES ARMS BUILDUP

[Text] Something is brewing in the Aegean. As we entered 1974, ships and planes confronted each other [in the Aegean] in a rush for petroleum. Claiming that the entire Aegean belonged to it, Greece did not even bother to look around. Turkey, on the other hand, was emphasizing its determined position in the Aegean. The incident did not break out in the Aegean but in Cyprus, where the Greek junta chose to act. The decision they took on 15 July 1974 and the events that followed caused a confrontation between Turkey and Greece. The Cyprus incident pushed both sides into arming, and the Aegean army was born. Both countries developed an aircraft industry, and arms production and arms purchases abroad were expedited. Now we are back at the same point and the arms race has also spread to Cyprus.

As Kiprianou talks about the Turkish Army and the Turkish occupation, the Greek Army marches past and salutes him. As was done before 1974, Greek troops are being massed and arms are being stockpiled in southern Cyprus. Limassol is again their landing port, and an airfield has been constructed in Paphos. The arms race has gone beyond the arrival of the Milan missiles. Naturally, the Turkish Cypriot security forces cannot be expected to stand idly by. They will arm, they will increase training and they will be ready to counter a probable attack.

The reason Nagasaki and Hiroshima were utterly devastated with atom bombs is that Japan failed to do the same thing to U.S. cities. Had Japan possesed such a bomb, the United States could not have taken such a step, or it could have but would have had to suffer the consequences.

Peace will not come by sitting and thinking like doves. Peace has to be secured, and then protected. Who in history gained anything by sitting unarmed and waiting for the other side to be reasonable? Cutting a long story short, as tension is mounting in the Aegean and arms are piling up in Cyprus, northern Cyprus cannot be expected to exercise "Gandhi's patience and attitude." Equilibrium is always a deterrent. We cannot avoid spending on arms and expect to build peace. No one has accomplished peace and freedom through such a mentality. Look at the East, look at the West.

RIZOSPASTIS CRITICIZES PAPANDREOU STAND ON NATO

3 Dec Edition

[Editorial: "The Only Wise Course"]

[Text] Yesterday's reaffirmation of NATO resolve to install the U.S. "Euromissiles" is a step toward the cold war and an exacerbation of the military confrontation toward the continued stockpiling of armaments. Without hesitation, the imperialists are pushing Europe and the entire world to "the brink of the abyss," bringing the horrible specter of nuclear calamity ever closer.

Within the framework of this more general situation, the reservations the Greek prime minister expressed on certain points of the joint communique of the Atlantic gathering are truly positive, particularly on what touches upon installation of the "cruise" and "Pershing-II" missiles.

These reservations, however, contradict the feelings of satisfaction expressed by the prime minister on the future of our national affairs within the framework of NATO. This contradiction, in the final analysis, does not serve the national interests.

What was proved — for the nth time -- in the Belgian capital? It was proved that it is NATO which is encouraging and supporting Turkish provocations in the Aegean; that it is NATO which either directly or indirectly is questioning our sovereign rights as well as peace in the area; that its very arsonist mission, its very nature and its goals do not leave the slightest room for our country to defend its own interests.

Despite all this, the prime minister spoke of "understanding" from the Atlantic partners and about a certain "positive climate" in support of Greek positions. Such views are, to say the least, totally unfounded and a pure delusion. The mere experiences of the past year ought to have led to different conclusions. The continual deterioration and complication of our national problems within the framework of NATO increasingly stress the only wise and realistic course for our country: withdrawal from the military wing of the coalition and toward the process for a total and final disengagement from its apparatus.

4 Dec Editorial

[From the "Radical" column: "The Mortal Enemy"]

[Text] Our country's public opinion in no way shares the "feeling of security" and the optimism expressed by Prime Minister Papandreou at the conclusion of the cold war NATO gathering in Brussels and his conclusion that "the situation within NATO is perceptibly improving for Greece." Not only is there no tangible and specific proof that NATO has revised its anti-Greek position, but on the contrary the cold war and aggressive spirit which prevailed at the gathering leaves absolutely no doubt that the wolf pack alliance will expand its naked pressures against our country in order to achieve its full alignment with NATO's adventurist policy. It is absolutely certain that in order to achieve this purpose it will use, in the same way that it has to date, the aggressiveness and provocations of Evren's fascist junta as a lever at the expense of our country's national sovereignty. It is an open secret that NATO incites and encourages Ankara's provocativeness and particularly its base questioning of Greek sovereign rights on the Aegean islands. The recent incendiary Luns-Rogers statements excusing the Turkish provocations and the "legal support" which NATO offered to the claims of Evren's junta in order to keep Limnos out of the "allied" maneuvers are voluble proof that the Atlantic wolf pack alliance is the main enemy and underminer of the territorial integrity and national sovereignty of our country. It is an obvious delusion if the present government believes that there can be a "feeling of security" and a "positive climate of understanding" of Greek positions within NATO. Our country cannot have a position within such an alliance because experience and all developments prove that it is a mortal enemy of the country's vital interests.

SOVIETS CANNOT SUPPORT GREECE ON AEGEAN DISPUTE

NC070950 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 4 Dec 82 pp 1, 14

[By Nur Batur]

[Text] Moscow (TERCUMAN) -- Despite the fact that at the NATO defense ministers conference in Strasbourg Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, in his capacity as national defense minister, created a negative atmosphere against Turkey and behaved as if Greece were a member of the Warsaw Pact, the Soviet Union supports Turkey in the Aegean.

According to diplomatic observers, although the Soviet Union was highly pleased that a socialist party came to power in Greece, today it is keeping Greece at a considerable distance because of Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's unstable policies. Soviet authorities, who made disclosures both in Moscow and Baku, expressed the view that the disruption of the dialogue between Turkey and Greece will not do anyone any good. They added that "disputes between Turkey and Greece over the Aegean Sea should be resolved through negotiations." The Soviet authorities, who openly criticized Greek Prime Minister Papandreou, said: "Papandreou simply talks."

Diplomatic observers have drawn attention to the fact that Greece may extend its territorial waters to 12 miles after the law of the sea agreement, and made this assessment regarding the Soviet Union's policy in this respect: "It is very difficult for the Soviet Union to support Greece's inclination to extend its territorial waters to 12 miles. Although a socialist party's being in power in Greece pleases the Soviet Union, this has not created a positive effect, a tangible result in relations between Greece and the Soviet Union. No high-level contacts have been made between the two countries since PASOK assumed power. The reason for this is that the Soviet Union does not think PASOK, and indirectly Papandreou, will last long. The Soviet Union believes that Papandreou is following unstable policies, and consequently it is refraining from a rapprochement with Greece.

"The Soviet Union cannot support Greece's tendency to extend its territorial waters to 12 miles in the Aegean after the law of the sea agreement has been signed by all nations. The reason for this is that although it currently seems to be in cooperation with PASOK, it does not know how things will develop in the future. Papandreou may give the Soviet Union the right of passage, but as there will no longer be territorial waters, another administration in Greece, on a later date, may deprive the Soviet Union of this right, or it may restrict this right. This will obstruct the Soviet Union's free passage to the Mediterranean. The Soviet authorities will never take this risk."

The Soviet authorities, who refrained from commenting at length on Greece's militarization of the Aegean Island, said: "This matter should be resolved through peaceful methods between the two countries. The noise which Papandreou raised in NATO is NATO's problem."

HURRIYET BONN CORRESPONDENT QUOTES KARAMANLIS

NC070918 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 2 Dec 82 p 12

[Report by Ibrahim Gul]

[Text] Bonn, (HURRIYET) -- HURRIYET is the first Turkish newspaper to which President Karamanlis of Greece, when in Bonn for official contacts, has talked since his election as president.

After conferring with German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, President Karamanlis spoke to this HURRIYET correspondent at the Chancellor's premises about his impressions of his contacts with President Carstens, Chancellor Kohl and Foreign Minister Genscher.

Stressing the need for concerted efforts on both sides to maintain peaceful and neighborly relations for the furtherance of Turkish-Greek friendship, President Karamanlis implicity declared that the crisis policy recently implemented by Prime Minister Papandreou was wrong. He added: "I have come to explain to our German friends that the situation is not as tense as they think it is. We dwelt on this matter in my talks with President Carstens, Chancellor Kohl and Foreign Minister Genscher."

President Karamanlis noted that in the course of his contacts in Germany, the Cyprus question and the Aegean islands were also discussed. He added that efforts were being exerted to stop these two issues from becoming sore points. He also said that these issues should be resolved at the conference table.

Meanwhile, it has been learned that German Foreign Minister Genscher told President Karamanlis in the course of their talks: "Relations between Turkey and Greece are being seriously watched both by NATO and the West. It is in the interests of the entire West that there should be peace and tranquillity in this region."

NEW ZAIRE LEADER KENGO WA DONDO DELIVERS WARNING

PM071451 Brussels LE SOIR in French 19 Nov 82 p 3

[Etienne Ugeux report: "Stern Warning to Belgium From New Zairian Prime Minister"]

[Text] "This is not a threat -- you do not deserve that -- but rather, a warning. Belgium is faced with a choice. We want to cooperate with it. Let it therefore accept the hand we are holding out to it. But if, unfortunately, it rejects this, it should not be surprised by the fact that it is replaced by others who are holding out their hands to us." That statement was not made by Jungers, governor general of the Belgian Congo, who, in his farewell speech in 1951, advised the Belgians not to reject "the hand held out by the Congolese," but by Zairian First State Commissioner [and outgoing Zairian Ambassador to Belgium] Kengo wa Dondo who delivered a forceful speech Wednesday evening [17 November] to the Belgian-African Chamber of Commerce which is chaired by Michel Relecom. It was not the kind of speech usually made by a departing ambassador, but instead, an important speech by a prime minister taking office and revealing his intentions to us. Mr Kengo continued: "I will not go into detail about the failures which you encountered each time you diversified your cooperation, turning your back on Zaire to elsewhere seek a fortune which proved to be an illusion." The prime minister then made a few observations about Belgian-Zairian relations: There are 20,000 Belgians in Zaire, there are between 80,000 and 100,000 jobs in Belgium which depend on relations with Zaire, and every franc which we devote to Zaire brings us 3 francs in return. He also said that most of the 4.7 billion francs of Belgian cooperation did not leave Belgium and benefited our economy.

Finally, he said that Belgium needs Zaire as much as Zaire needs Belgium. And Mr Kengo concluded: "If Belgium was to continue to show some hesitation, to sink into a degree of ambiguity toward us, would it be any surprise if others aspire to take its place? Confidence is only given conditionally. Friendship is allergic to bargaining. Cooperation rules out mental reservations; and we want to cooperate with Belgium."

Before that, Mr Kengo made a point of recalling what he termed his country's advantages, namely the stability of the regime for the past 17 years which has put an end to fratricidal struggles and brought peace to 27 million inhabitants. But our regime, he specified, has the right to be different, and the political formulas which are valid in Europe are not necessarily valid in Africa. Zaire has also successfully carried out its cultural revolution. We also have vast natural resources "which you exploited and are still exploiting." What we need, the prime minister continued, is a stringent economy, and he forcefully announced the policy he will adopt in all spheres. The word "stringency" was used several times with emphasis throughout his speech. Finally, the outgoing ambassador discussed his country's international influence.

Communications Minister de Croo, who had previously consulted Vice Prime Minister and Interior Minister Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb, had made a "few jokes," citing the Belgian governor. His toast was rather inconsistent compared to the new Zairian prime minister's statements.

In short, the new Zairian prime minister did not conceal his intentions from us: to make vigorous efforts to improve the economic situation in Zaire and very markedly clarify relations between our two countries. Zaire would like nothing better than to cooperate with Belgium, but the latter must realize that it must stop playing cat and mouse. That is a serious warning, to say the least!

SHULTZ BEGINS VISIT, MEETS WITH GENSCHER

[Excerpts] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- At the start of his talks in Bonn at noon today, U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz had an exchange of views with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. The discussion is expected to center on the Western alliance's relations with the Warsaw Pact states following the change of leadership in Moscow.

Before his meeting with Shultz, Genscher, in a Deutschlandfunk interview, described European-American relations, particularly German-American relations, as good and positive. Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl's visit to Washington had shown that there is trust on both sides, a will to cooperate and also the awareness that Europeans and Americans are dependent on each other.

Genscher stressed that the lifting of the U.S. embargo measures against the European-Soviet gas pipeline deal played an important role in this respect. This had not merely been a gesture toward the European allies by the United States, but "naturally toward the Soviet Union as well."

Meets With Carstens

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- Following his talk with Federal Foreign Minister Genscher today, Secretary of State Shultz was received by Federal President Karl Carstens and also met with Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl for an exchange of political views. Carstens exchanged impressions with the U.S. secretary of state of the new Soviet leadership whom they had met at the Brezhnev funeral ceremonies.

Carstens stressed his satisfaction with Chancellor Kohl's successful visit to America and emphasized the strengthening of relations between the two states. The federal president linked his gratitude for the contribution to defense being made by the U.S. troops stationed in the Federal Republic to regret at the criminal terrorist attacks on American intelligence and gave his assurance that the investigations would be vigorously continued.

Shultz, Kohl Reaffirm Cooperation

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- After a 90-minute talk between Chancellor Helmut Kohl and U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz, a government spokesman said in Bonn this evening that the meeting had reaffirmed the will of both sides for cooperation on the basis of partnership and equal rights. The meeting was part of the close and trusting German-American cooperation and the intensive personal contacts between the Federal Government and Washington.

In the exchange of views on the future of East-West relations, the two men stressed their interest in constructive East-West relations and their desire for "strengthened mutual understanding in the solution of the difficult world economic problems." Kohl and Shultz agreed that in this critical phase of the world economy, the cohesiveness of the Atlantic alliance was particularly important. Chancellor Kohl expressed his support for the American peace initiatives in the Middle East.

Genscher on Foreign Policy

LD071614 Hamburg DPA in German 1446 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher once again emphasized today the "extended hand" policy toward the East which he has formulated. At a dinner in honor of U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz at the Godesberg redoubt, Genscher stated: "We want to consistently and realistically continue the policy of dialogue and cooperation with our Eastern neighbors. Our hand is, and will remain extended."

In his dinner speech, Genscher praised the cordial friendship with the United States and regarded Shultz' visit as "fresh endorsement of your will to contribute... toward constant dialogue."

There can be no doubts regarding the consistency of German alliance policy. The large majority of Germans regard U.S. troops in the Federal Republic as "reliable guarantees of our security," the federal foreign minister said, at the same time condemning the terrorist attacks on U.S. installations.

Genscher welcomed the U.S. Administration's clear attitude to oppose all attempts to reduce U.S. troops in Europe. A reduction in U.S. troops would not only shake stability, but would undermine the efforts for negotiated troop reductions.

The Federal Republic stands by both parts of the NATO dual decision, Genscher confirmed. The key to success at the negotiations lies with Moscow. In all arms control efforts, a military balance at the lowest possible level is sought. In addition, new ways must also be sought to strengthen arms control between East and West in the conventional sphere and to extend it to all of Europe.

With regard to economic relations with the East, Genscher stressed the desire to start "as soon as possible with work on the planned overall analysis of our economic relations with the East." Genscher also mentioned the need to promote the exchange of young people between the Federal Republic and the United States. Genscher said he is pleased, turning to "Dear George," to be able to work with Shultz at this difficult time.

Shultz Meets SPD Leaders

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA) -- On Wednesday morning, American Secretary of State George Shultz received the leading SPD representatives for a 1-hour political exchange of views. SPD Chairman Willy Brandt said that the Geneva medium-range missile negotiations were also a topic of discussion.

In addition, chancellor-candidate Hans-Jochen Vogel, Deputy SPD Chairman Johannes Rau and former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who stayed behind for a private talk at the request of the U.S. secretary of state, also took part in the talk over breakfast at the residence of American Ambassador Arthur Burns.

An important subject of the meeting was the worrying world economic situation. According to SPD Executive Spokesman Wolfgang Clement, Vogel explained his proposal to the secretary of state for an "international employment pact," designed to persuade the major industrial states to adopt an expansive economic policy to more effectively fight unemployment.

In the talk with Shultz, the SPD politicians supported the proposals of former U.S. chief negotiator Paul Warnke, which were taken up on Monday by the SPD Presidium, on the possibility of partial medium-range disarmament.

According to political observers, the SPD leadership emphasized their concern to the American Government that a compromise should be reached at the Geneva negotiations that would make the stationing of new nuclear missiles in the FRG unnecessary.

After these talks, the U.S. secretary of state ended his visit to Bonn and flew on to Brussels.

EAST GERMAN CITIZEN ESCAPES ACROSS BORDER

LD071218 Hamburg DPA in German 1122 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Text] Kassel, 7 Dec (DPA) -- A 29-year old man escaped across the GDR border in the Fulda district last night. The central border protection command in Kassel today announced that at about 2200 GMT, he managed to cross a double metal fence at a point which was not equipped with automatic firing devices or mines. The man gave the reason for his flight as difficulties at his place of work. He left a wife and three children in the GDR.

CHEYSSON ON ALLIANCE PROBLEMS, EAST-WEST ISSUES

PM081035 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 7 Dec 82 p 9

[Francis Patteyn report: "Cheysson: 'We Are on the West's Side'"]

[Text] To mark its 75th anniversary Monday, the Anglo-American Press Association in Paris had decided to invite a minister who once boasted of "speaking a language different from that of conventional diplomacy and of getting straight to the point:" [French External Relations Minister] Claude Cheysson.

Indeed, the present external relations minister's plain speech suits our English-speaking colleagues rather well since they do not generally appreciate the delights of sophistry. On Monday, Mr Cheysson did not break with tradition: He called a spade a spade and his audience left satisfied.

First, there was no question of the external relations minister painting a rosy picture of the future: "The year 1983 will be daunting, the most difficult we have experienced for a long time. All sources of growth have dried up. After the 1973 oil blow we were saved by the expansion of the Third World market, but it is now in recession. There is no prospect of overcoming the stagnation, and we are heading for increased unemployment."

How can the worst be avoided? "By carrying out a new distribution at the world level, by strengthening consultation among allies." "In face of the Eastern bloc's totalitarianism," Claude Cheysson stressed, "we are an integral part of the Atlantic alliance. Where there is tension between East and West, we are resolutely on the West's side. Nonetheless, there are always quarrels in a family. Moreover, the best quarrels take place in families."

Pershing in the Garden

"It is only natural," the minister continued, "that we should quarrel on some subjects. But it is unacceptable that decisions on which we have not been consulted should suddenly descend from Washington. We are part of an alliance among free countries, not part of a bloc, and any leadership is unacceptable. It is necessary to meet and talk to achieve better understanding and, particularly, to avoid the dangers of protectionism." As in Versailles in June? Certainly not: "A summit like the Versailles summit only entails spectacle. It consists of issuing unreadable texts prepared by experts a long time in advance. The Rambouillet meeting, however, was satisfactory. The leaders were able to discuss things with each other without asking permission from a press attache each time." It should be remembered that the Rambouillet meeting took place in 1975 during Valery Giscard d'Estaing's mandate and that the Versailles show was conceived under a government to which Mr Cheysson belongs....

The French external relations minister also stressed the need to be "credible" in the defense sphere. "If the Geneva discussions (between Americans and Soviets) do not produce results in 1983, the December 1979 decisions on the deployment of medium-range missiles must be implemented. All those who have to put a Pershing in their garden — or in their neighbor's garden — must shoulder their responsibilities."

Will there be a Franco-Soviet meeting at the highest level soon? Claude Cheysson quickly shrouded the subject in the smoke from his Gitanes, but said: "In our climb up the mountain we have not yet caught sight of that particular summit."

On Commitment to Nuclear Deterrent

[Unattributed report: "Premier Condemns 'Deliberate Operation' To Cast Doubt on Government's Will"]

[Excerpt] [Passage omitted citing French Premier Pierre Mauroy's response, during 6 December visit to National Gendarmerie Training Center in Fontainebleau, to reports in Paris LE MATIN on letters sent by Army Chief of Staff Jean Delaunay on government plans to reorganize Army]

Addressing the English-speaking press in Paris, Monday, 6 December, External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson stated that "this affair, dug out of some wastepaper bin, is no credit to that newspaper." "We are irrevocably committed to our nuclear deterrence capability," Mr Cheysson added. "In this sphere, three or four fundamental and very costly decisions have been taken over the past 18 months -- decisions which had been postponed for years by the previous administration. We will maintain and strive to increase the percentage of defense spending in relation to the gross domestic product, but, taking account of the nuclear sphere, that may involve some delays for the conventional army."

KOHL, MITTERRAND DISCUSS FRENCH TRADE DEFICIT

[Text] West German Chancellor Hulmut Kohl is in Paris. He is taking part in the congress of the European People's Party, which encompasses Christian Democratic movements in Europe. Mr Kohl took advantage of the opportunity of his stay in Paris to meet President Mitterrand this morning during breakfast at the Elysee Palace. The two men spoke of France's trade deficit with the FRG, which could reach 30 billion francs this year and which constitutes a difficult problem, as the chancellor agreed. Another subject discussed was the plan of merging the French group of nationalised Thomson-Brandt industries with Grundig, the leading German electronics company. Helmut Kohl refused to make any comment on this subject when leaving the Elysee Palace.

Kohl Comments on Talks

[Excerpt] Paris, 7 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl today called for further, understanding talks with France on trade problems between the two countries. Following a breakfast with President Francois Mitterrand in the Elysee Palace, Kohl said that a trade war would "certainly not come about" because of mutual accusations of protectionism.

Before his speech at the congress of European Christian Democratic Parties in Paris, the chancellor discussed with Mitterrand at the Elysee Palace, problems which had been broached at the EC summit in Copenhagen. However, he only mentioned the expansion of the EC, and denied they had discussed the takeover of Grundig AG by the French Thomson-Brandt state concern. The Federal Government has so far not looked into this.

Asked about Mitterrand's desire to increase Franch exports to the Federal Republic so as to reduce the trade imbalance, Kohl answered reservedly. He drew attention to the differing economic policies of the two countries and underlined the success of the German free market economy.

Through discussions, an attempt would have to be made to try to recognize and remove mutual problems. "That is not all that simple," Kohl added. "I am not sure that this will be successful."

Kohl Addresses EPU

LD071738 Hamburg DPA in German 1515 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Paris, 7 Dec (DPA) -- In Paris today, Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl called for more understanding among the European partners in order to reduce the trend toward protectionism. The chancellor and CDU chairman repeated to the Congress of the European People's Party (EPU) the demand he earlier made following a breakfast with French President Francois Mitterrand that there should be more talk with, rather than against each other, in order to overcome differences of opinion.

The present economic structural crisis in the European Community can only be solved "with the opportunities of free world trade." After this discussion with Mitterrand, he expressed the view that despite the accusations of mutual trade restrictions between the Federal Republic and France, things will "certainly not come to a trade war."

The plan of the French state electronics firm Thomson-Brandt to take over Grundig AG, conceived as a protective measure against the Japanese import offensive, was not discussed during his meeting with Mitterrand, he said. Bonn has not dealt with this yet.

Welcomed by special applause by the delegates of the 10 Christian Democratic Parties of the EC, Kohl later called at the EPU Congress for Europe's political unification to be speeded up. If it is not achieved this year the chance will have been "missed." One should not first wait for better times.

The chancellor regards a solution of the budget conflict within the EC as unavoidable The EC budget must be able to serve political goals in addition to its redistribution function. Likewise, the consensus principle, which always resulted in the "lowest common denominator" in the Community, must make way for a system of decision-making for effective policy, and the European Parliament must be given more say.

Kohl said that during its presidency of the EC, the CDU, as the ruling party in West Germany, will work energetically for the admission of Spain and Portugal. He said, however, that problems related to this will first have to be solved.

In order to overcome unemployment, the EC partners will have "to do their homework at home" first, instead of concentrating on Europe-wide concepts. An exception to this is youth unemployment where something has to be done on a European level. Above all, Kohl called for the European idea to be urged upon the younger generation in response to the motto "youth without future."

Europe should no longer submit to the illusion that detente is synonymous with freedom. The NATO dual decision is a viable "disarmament plan" only as long as the USSR sees no chance of any NATO member state "going back" on the second part of the dual-decision.

MINISTER COT REPORTEDLY SUBMITS RESIGNATION

[Text] Paris, Dec 7 (AFP) -- French Cooperation Minister Jean-Pierre Cot has submitted his resignation to President Francois Mitterrand, according to reliable sources here today.

Mr Cot refused to comment on the report, which said that he would be replaced by Georges Beauchamp, a personal friend of Mr Mitterrand.

Last June Mr Cot threatened to resign over delays in implementing proposed reforms for his Ministry of Cooperation and Development, which comes under the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

CLASHES BETWEEN KHOMEYNI SUPPORTERS, OPPONENTS

LD071620 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Text] There were incidents between supporters and opponents of Ayatollah Khomeyni in the very heart of Paris this afternoon. A dozen young Iranians were busy distributing anti-Kyomeyni leaflets on the Champs Elysees when a gang of another dozen Iranians, supporters of Kyomeyni, intervened with clubs. Two shots were even fired, probably with a starting pistol because no traces of bullet impressions were subsequently located in the area. An anti-Khomeyni militant was injured and taken to the hospital.

L'HUMANITE REPORTS PCF, LEBANESE CP MEETINGS

PM061049 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 22 Nov 82 p 8

[Unattributed report: "Israeli Withdrawal Is Condition for Restoring State's Sovereignty in Lebanon"]

[Text] A Lebanese Communist Party [LCP] delegation headed by Secretary General Georges Hawi has spent several days in France at the PCF's invitation. It had many meetings during its visit.

Georges Hawi gave several interviews, including one to French Television Channel 1 and to L'HUMANITE DIMANCHE.

A meeting took place at PCF headquarters with a delegation headed by [PCF Secretary General] Georges Marchais; a joint communique and a cooperation program were adopted. At the end of that visit, a friendly and fraternal dinner was given for Comrade Georges Hawi and was attended by, in addition to the two parties' delegations, Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Gaston Plissonnier, Politburo member Claude Poperen and foreign policy section member Alaine Gresh. The following is the text of the joint PCF-LCP communique:

A fraternal and warm meeting took place at PCF headquarters Friday, 19 November, between an LCP delegation headed by Secretary General Georges Hawi and a PCF delegation headed by Secretary General Georges Marchais.

The LCP delegation also comprised Politburo member Karim Muruwah and Central Committee member Albert Farhat. The PCF delegation comprised Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz and Politburo member Guy Hermier.

During the talks, Georges Hawi thanked the PCF for the active solidarity it has demonstrated and the determination with which it has stood by the Palestinian and Lebanese peoples. The broad movement which the PCF greatly helped to develop created the important conditions for an initiative by the French Government in view of Lebanon's serious situation.

For his part, Georges Marchais expressed the admiration felt by all French Communists for the Lebanese Communists' courage and determination. The LCP succeeded in fully playing its role as a vanguard and national party in difficult conditions.

The two delegations discussed the situation created in the Near East by the Israeli aggression and the total support which the United States continues to give it.

They noted that although the aggressors have not attained all their objectives, a blow has nonetheless been dealt to the liberation forces in the region. Furthermore, the political situation has become complex and the advance toward a comprehensive settlement more complicated. Lebanon is now seeing its independence and unity threathened; the Israeli Government is trying to revive the religious war to justify continuing the occupation.

The two delegations advocated the withdrawal of the Israeli troops from Lebanon in keeping with UN Resolution 508 and 509. That withdrawal is the precondition for restoring the state's sovereignty over the whole of Lebanese territory and, on the basis of an agreement, for the departure of all armed elements from the country; George Marchais and Georges Hawi stressed their attachment to Lebanon's independence, unity and integrity and to the maintenance of a democratic life in that country.

They advocated extensive participation by the international community, including the formation of an international force under UN auspices to help attain these objectives.

In that connection, France can and should show initiatives in keeping with the interests of the Lebanese people and of peace in the region.

The PCF and LCP reaffirmed their solidarity with the Palestinian people and the PLO, their sole legitimate representative. They stressed that there can be no just and lasting peace in that region without Israel's withdrawal from all the Arab territories occupied since 1967 and recognition of the Palestinian people's inalienable national rights, including the right to build their own independent state. It is on those conditions that the peoples of the region can live in peace and security.

The two delegations stressed that the aggressiveness shown by imperialism in the Near East characterizes the policy it is pursuing in other regions of the world: Central America, southern Africa, Southeast Asia.... The U.S. Administration is stepping up the arms race and the policy of confrontation; that is not a sign of strength, but nonetheless requires a more determined, energetic response from the peoples and the progressive forces.

All the available forces must unite in action for peace and disarmament at the international level and in each country to show respect for diversity; to impose peaceful solutions to conflicts; to show more active solidarity with the national, social and human liberation movement; and to establish a new international economic order.

The communist parties have an essential contribution to make in that effort to unite and rally forces in favor of justice, peace and democracy. Special attention must be paid to the United Nations in view of the attempts to paralyze that institution and deprive it of any efficacy, as was the case during the Lebanese crisis, despite the flagrant violations of international law.

In conclusion, the two delegations welcomed the quality of relations between the PCF and LCP. They agreed to pursue this cooperation in the action undertaken for a just and lasting peace in the Near East. They confirmed their mutual solidarity in keeping with the French and Lebanese peoples' interests and reaffirmed their solidarity with all the forces throughout the world which are struggling for a world of justice, freedom and democracy and for socialism.

Georges Hawi conveyed an official invitation on the LCP's behalf for a PCF delegation to visit Lebanon. That invitation was accepted with pleasure.

LE MONDE VIEWS REAGAN LATIN AMERICA TOUR

[Editorial: "Mr Reagan's American 'Dream'"]

[Text] At first glance, the results of Mr Reagan's first Latin American tour seem very modest. He kept a rather low profile during that trip, trying to seduce rather than convince people. He vaunted the virtues of free enterprise and refused to view the serious economic crisis hitting the region "like a tropical storm" in terms of a North-South crisis.

He condemned the "false revolutionaries" supported by "foreign powers" which are, according to him, seeking to undermine Latin America's democratic and economic development. He extolled the "dream of an America united from North to South" and capable of being "the hope of the world."

This all too brief visit which enabled him to meet six heads of state in 5 days failed to produce any diplomatic breakthrough, with the exception of Brazil, which is pursuing its march toward democracy in a very positive and peaceful way and which is to enjoy substantial U.S. aid to tackle the problems posed by a record foreign debt. But that was the easiest stage.

The only substance has been the promise made by Mr Reagan of an official resumption of military aid to General Rios Montt's Guatemala. That aid was suspended by Mr Carter owing to the flagrant human rights violations committed in that Central American country, which in the past 25 years, has virtually never emerged from violence.

According to the international humanitarian organizations and many reliable reports, particularly those from religious groups, violence has barely abated at all in Guatemala. It has even increased since General Rios Montt came to power following the coup d'etat in March. Some easing of tension is noticeable in the capital, and efforts have been made by the new government to limit political score-settling. But on the other hand, the situation is critical in the rual districts, where tens of thousands of Indian peasants are caught between two fires -- those of the guerrillas and of an army which is combing the country, massacring people and setting up Vietnamese-style "fortified" villages.

Mr Reagan, who was won over by General Rios Montt's personality, thinks differently. He therefore intends to encourage the Guatemalan Government's "democratic progress" by giving official approval to military aid which according to U.S. sources, has already been resumed through clandestine channels.

In El Salvador, Mr Reagan also said that he is convinced that real progress has been made in improving human rights, and he intends to defend that idea in Congress in January. Mgr Rivero y Damas, archbishop of San Salvador, however, thinks that that is not the case and that Mr Reagan's brief Central American tour tends to "aggravate" and "regionalize" the conflicts in the area.

The details given by the NEW YORK TIMES on the scope of the CIA's clandestine operations in Central America, particularly in Honduras, show that the possibility of an indirect U.S. intervention against Sandinist Nicaragua has not been ruled out. Washington still has several irons in the fire. Mr Reagan's visit has apparently not tipped the scales in favor of the negotiations which are desired by many Latin American leaders.

UNDER SECRETARY PALLESCHI ON RELATIONS WITH PRC

PM071529 Rome AVANTI in Italian 28-29 Nov 82 Current Affairs and Culture Supplement p 1

[Italian Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs Roberto Palleschi article: "This Time China Really Is Near"]

[Text] I bring back from China a positive response by the Chinese Government to the offers of friendship and cooperation made several times by the Italian side, often consisting of specific acts, that have hitherto met with an unconvincing response from the Chinese side.

The importance of the Chinese response lies in the fact that it has transcended declarations of good will, however important these may be, and the establishment of minor accords, which have hitherto been the only possible form of cooperation between the countries, and has instead broached Italy's involvement, on the financial, technological and entrepreneurial plane, in the working, processing and international marketing of China's huge coal deposits in the southwest and the north.

These are not very major plans, but they are significant even for a country such as China, which has been described as a planet, and they are suited to our own dimensions.

Now a decision must be taken by the Italian Government, which has all the necessary information. It is to be hoped that our political and nonpolitical feuding will not prevail over such decisions, and that it will be realized that if we are to adopt the broad view, as we must, two projects worth $1 billion proposed by China are not equivalent to a thousand projects worth $1 million proposed to the Chinese.

Furthermore, it is necessary to comprehensively integrate Italy's contribution and participation into the West's strategy with respect to China -- strategy that cannot futilely continue to blow hot and cold depending on day-to-day events, which are not always correctly reported by the agencies, whereby an unrestrained and unjustified optimism prompted by a speech by Deng is followed by a depressing and equally unjustified pessimism prompted by a Chinese representative's visit to Moscow or by an obvious and expected protest against a U.S. supply of military materiel to Taiwan.

One of the causes of all this is the superficiality and cliches with which we view Chinese affairs and the inedaquacy of our study of and critical research into a society as complex and contradictory as China's, in which a great and ancient civilization has, during the past century, come into contact with Western civilization, represented in China by colonialism, communism and consumerism, which are actual components of our society, but thankfully not of our entire civilization.

It is often said in the West that the "Cultural Revolution" was Chinese communism's grandiose attempt to establish its own hegemony over both Soviet communism and the West. Some propose the alternative view that the entire affair was a brutal struggle for power among the various opposing groups.

This portrayal of Mao as a modern Genghis Khan is nonsensical and leads to an erroneous historical assessment not only of the significance of the Cultural Revolution, but of its political consequences and of the reactions that it prompted as well to the extent of the criminalization of the "Gang of Four" and the major swing with Deng's new course. Mao and his group were well acquainted not only with the limited scope open to them, but also with the Soviet and communist world -- that is, not only Marx and Lenin, but also Rosa Luxemburg, anarchism and social democracy. With the Cultural Revolution, Mao tried to save China from the fate suffered by the Soviet Government in Russia, that of a bureaucratic degeneration of a revolutionary government with the consequent formation of a new class of exploiters and the degradation, through subjection, of the workers, peasants and intellectuals, deprived as a class of the very power exercised in their name. I believe that it is still instructive to read Mao's articles on the Cominform. Indeed, those articles were striking because they differed from those of the other international communist leaders, all of which conformed to the CPSU stance and reproduced the theories of Stalin and Zhdanov, while Mao's were articles that displayed dissatisfaction with the prevailing system of dogmas and an attempt to research other areas, often coinciding with Lenin's "State and Revolution," which even before October discussed the dissolution of the revolutionary state as the ultimate and triumphal socialist victory.

The "Red Guards'" main target were not communist and noncommunist Chinese intellectuals, who were nevertheless shamefully persecuted, but for whom a feverish mobilization of so many millions of activists lasting over 10 years would have been unnecessary, but the nomenklatura of the communist authorities within the party, the state and the army, which was combated in the name of a revolutionary workers' and peasants' government which, despite the little red books, nevertheless remained undefined and completely without any proposals for really new instruments of self-government and institutional participation in government for the broad people's masses.

The Cultural Revolution failed because, despite the must objective of preventing the bureaucratic degeneration of the revolution, it failed to give the Chinese people the prospect of a new and democratic state. A nomenklatura cannot be defeated solely by mobilizing tens of millions of militants because, once destroyed, it immediately reconstitutes itself: it is a necessity for the communist state, but only when it proposes to an entire people the building of a democratic state based on freedom and without social discriminations.

The Cultural Revolution failed because it tried to destroy a state organization without knowing what needed to be built in its place, and it achieved the sole result of profoundly weakening the whole of China. Deng recognized this clearly and eliminated the Red Guards movement, but to be able to do so he had to use the forces available, namely, the forces harmed by the Cultural Revolution, which were not only the intellectuals but also the very powerful nomenklatura.

In his speeches, Deng expresses many things. His words are close to our ideals and feelings, but in practice, the burdensome influence of the revived nomenklatura is very apparent. The basic problem for the West is to establish a strategy capable of offering economic and cultural cooperation that will aid the Chinese people's development within a framework of peace and democratic progress.

China has resumed its dialogue with the USSR and cooled its relations with the United States on the grounds of the U.S. military aid to Taiwan.

China has set the USSR some difficult conditions, including the end of the aggression in Afghanistan and Kampuchea, but it has added that, at least initially, it could be satisfied with a signal. It accompanies its protest against the United States over Taiwan by spreading reports that it is drafting a new constitution for the Chinese state with such broad special forms of autonomy for Hong Kong and Taiwan that, within the framework of restoring Chinese sovereignty over those territories, it nevertheless aims to leave things as they are. In other words, it would leave standing the free enterprise that has made them prosper. Having escaped Soviet hegemony, China is now concerned with not allowing itself to conform to the U.S. line and is thus building its own stance of genuine nonalignment. China wants relations of cooperation with the West, as it does with the USSR, but it realizes that while the former is difficult, the latter is virtually impossible to achieve, or at least unfruitful, and this constitutes a difficulty for its political plan in linking development to nonalignment.

It is in this difficulty, too, that we must seek the cause of the attitudes that sometimes seems incomprehensible to our Western logic. It is fairly clear, however, that it is in the West's interests to understand, to back and to support the new Chinese policy and to offer China economic cooperation that will enable it to pursue that policy.

We have no political conditions to lay down -- conditions that would in any case be rightly considered illicit interference; we have only our aspiration that Western cooperation should not remain limited to intergovernmental relations but should extend to the various levels of society and succeed in establishing increasingly broad and fruitful contacts between the peoples and a rich exchange between the two cultures.

Just as China knows that it needs the West, so the West, too, must realize that it is difficult to do without China.

VATICAN BULLETIN NOT BEING RECEIVED IN POLAND

LD072138 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1915 GMT 7 Dec 82

[Excerpt] In connection with the unending receipt of letters to our section from listeners blaming us for stopping the dispatch of the monthly bulletin of the Vatican radio and requesting that it be resumed on the level it was last year before martial law, we would like to explain yet again that our bulletins are being sent regularly every month and have never been suspended.

Our listeners write that they have not been receiving our bulletins since last January. We assume that the disruptions in delivery are connected with the martial law in effect in that country. We had hopes that after a few months of strict censorship of the mail, the situation would improve, as was the case with periodicals sent to us from Poland, which are once again arriving regularly.

It seems, however, that there has been no improvement in the delivery of our bulletins to recipients in Poland. We do not know whether this is due to a decision of the central military authorities in the country or of individual officials. Neither do we know how long it will remain in force. We hope, however, that the relevant authorities will take interest in this issue and that the normal functioning of the postal service in this respect will be assured.

POPE CONFIRMS VISIT TO AUSTRIA 10-13 SEP 83

[Text] (ANSA) Vatican City, December 6 -- Pope John Paul II will make a pastoral visit to Austria from September 10-13 of next year. The pope himself confirmed the visit today when he addressed a group of Austrian parliamentarians in the Vatican today in German.

The archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Franz Koenig, said over Vatican radio back on July 7 that the previous day the pontiff had verbally and in writing confirmed plans to pay a visit to Austria.

The trip will coincide with the yearly celebrations in Austria of "Katholikentag" which next year falls on the third centennial of the battle of Vienna September 10, 1683, when the Polish King Jan Etbieski led the Christian armies to victory over the Ottoman Turks.

LEFTISTS DENOUNCE PREMIER'S ADDRESS TO NATION

[Unattributed report: "Opposition Criticizes Balsemao's Address"]

[Excerpt] The Socialist Party [PSP], the PCP and the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers/National Intersindical were unanimous in criticizing the tone and contents of the address to the nation given by Pinto Balsemao Friday. The Socialists describe it as a "mediocre and banal address," while the Communists believe that the prime minister "spoke but essentially said nothing." However, the prime minister is defended by Social Democrat Nascimento Rodrigues, who described the address as "a message of truth, calm and confidence in Portugal and the Portuguese people."

In a "clear election campaign tone," the prime minister "continued to conceal from the Portuguese people the truth about the country's situation and about his government's disastrous policy," the PSP believes. This party demands the right of reply for the opposition on radio and television, because it attributes vote-catching intentions to the address and "in order to reestablish the truth in view of the irresponsible address which the prime minister delivered."

"The Democratic Alliance, the PSP Standing Committee note says, "with Pinto Balsemao as prime minister, has failed in everything that it proposed." And it cites: "It has failed in controlling inflation when it forecast a rate of 17 percent and the rate is actually about 25 percent; it has failed in containing unemployement, being responsible for the dramatic total of 400,000 unemployed; it has failed to reduce the current account deficit, raising it to the unprecedented figure of 300 million contos; it has failed to contain the foreign debt, which increased from $6,584 million in 1979 to $12 billion this year, exceeding the value of the gold reserves; it has failed to promote new investments, reducing the growth of GDP in 1981 to 1.8 percent, when the government forecast 4.8 percent, and stifling private enterprise with increased interest rates; it has failed to reduce imports and increase exports, reducing the rate at which imports cover exports to about 40 percent and achieving an alarming balance of trade deficit of 293-5 million contos; it has failed resoundingly in the attempt to contain the accentuated devaluation of the escudo and to defend national interests in the process of joining the EEC."

The PSP communique also states that Portugal "has a government which does not govern and from which there is nothing to be expected, a deeply divided and decreasing parliamentary majority and a prime minister who, out of mere attachment to the post in which he finds himself, accepts all slights, including those from his own supporters, and persists in leading the country down a blind alley out of absurd arrogance and stubborn presumption."

PCP: "Total Mediocrity"

In a "television performance in which total mediocrity was obvious," the prime minister spoke "with deliberate levity of the overall state budget, which he should have presented back on 15 September," a PCP information and propaganda section note states.

The communique analyzes the "catastrophic results" of the Democratic Alliance's conduct and states that public opinion "can already see that this is an overall state budget designed to deepen the economic and financial disaster and to radically worsen the Portuguese people's living standard when the official indicators already reveal a zero-percent rate both for investment and for the growth of the GDP and when the inflation rate exceeds 23 percent."

The note examines the tax measures envisaged in the overall state budget and stresses that the latter "enshrines a 32.4-percent increase in indirect taxes, which mainly affect the working population, an increase in the price of stamped paper, tobacco and beer, and stipulates that the workers will pay 11.3 million contos more in the professional tax [imposto profissional] and 23.5 million contos more in sales tax, while the government intends to reduce the taxes on big capital and lower the tax rate for distributed profits and for interest and loans."

At the level of budget appropriations, the PCP considers that the most substantial sums relate to transportation and communications, agriculture and fisheries. The note also emphasizes that "the government is seeking not to implement the local finances law," aiming at "defrauding the local authorities of 61.65 million contos."

PRIME MINISTER GONZALEZ ON NATO, GIBRALTAR

[Press conference by Felipe Gonzalez, Spanish prime minister, held following the first Cabinet meeting of the new Spanish Government; place not given -- live]

[Excerpt] [Unidentified journalist] Mr Prime Minister, what instructions or criteria will the minister of foreign affairs be taking with him to Brussels tomorrow on such subjects as Gibraltar, the treaty with the United States, or Spanish membership in NATO?

[Gonzalez] Well, on the subject of Gibraltar, there will be an informal conversation with the British foreign secretary. On the subject of NATO, the final outcome will be that we shall abstain with respect to the communique. This will be an abstention with explanation. To put it at its simplest, it will be explained in the terms I set out in the investiture debate. Spain has to reexamine the whole dossier that led to membership. It [Spain] will halt proceedings so as to reexamine it [the dossier] seriously, thereby holding to our commitment to the Spanish people, and it will do so from two basic viewpoints; first, national interests, which in our view -- we have said this numerous times and we are not going to change now -- were not taken sufficiently into account in the previous decision taken by the Spanish Government; and also from the viewpoint of maintaining the best climate of dialogue and cooperation with the member countries. To do this, we could have decided to practice a kind of empty-chair diplomacy, but we do not see that as fitting for Spain. The thing is to be there and explain one's position. I do not believe that the subject of bilateral relations with the United States will be raised at that meeting. We shall have an opportunity to raise that subject and others during the secretary of state's visit to Spain in a few days' time.

So, these two subjects which I have dealt with -- one obviously so, and the other which I am announcing now on the question of relations with Great Britain -- are the two subjects which will be broached, one informally and the other through our formal presence, which will lead to an abstention. I believe that is a final summing-up.

PAPERS VIEW GONZALEZ' INVESTITURE SPEECH

PM071407 [Editorial Report] Spanish newspapers published 1 December 1982 carry editorials commenting on Spanish Prime Minister-elect Felipe Gonzalez' speech in the investiture debate in the Congress of Deputies, generally regarding it as excessively vague. Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA points out on page 9 the "ambition for moral change" apparent in the speech, but notes that "there were other aspects in Mr Gonzalez' speech which were too vague, either because it was not specified what would be done or because it was not spelled out how the stated aim would be achieved." It continues: "In countries with mature democratic politics and demanding popular participation, the practice is to spell out more. When, for instance, the candidate for investiture spoke of a policy which would take into account the interests of the inhabitants of the Rock and of the population of the Campo de Gibraltar, we believed that he was referring to the decision to open the gate, but he did not undertake to do so or even announce it clearly.

"Or when, speaking of participation in the Atlantic alliance, he referred to his pledges to the people, we assumed that he was referring to the announced referendum, but since he also spoke of national and international dialogue, we inferred that the decisions will take time and fall within the framework of extensive negotiation. It was a reading between lines, an interpretation, since there were no clearer clues or more sharply delineated outline."

"In the economic field, there was one significant specific: that of reducing the inflation rate by 3 percent in relation to 1982. The government's aim, Mr Gonzalez announced, will be to maintain economic growth of 2.5 percent per year, with an inflation rate remaining around 12 percent this year.

"We approve of that specific point, but we would also like to see the means of achieving those aims more clearly stated. It is true that there was talk of punishing tax fraud -- as well as the flight of capital -- and of curbing a headlong expansion of consumption and the public sector deficit, but also of automatically reassessing pensions and, even more extensively, of maintaining the purchasing power of incomes. Can everything be achieved at the same time?"

Madrid EL PAIS suggests on page 10 that the nature of the speech could be due to an attempt by Gonzalez to address both the Chamber of Deputies and the wider audience reached by radio and television, and asserts that it seems safe to say "that the candidate did not succeed in his aim of reconciling the needs of the two different audiences and delivered a speech which was disappointing for a good many citizens and inadequate as a starting point for a genuine parliamentary debate."

It concludes: "There is no reason why the imminent head of government should not explain clearly and forthrightly the timetable and priorities of his government program, specify the proposal of a new autonomy pact (vaguely outlined yesterday) with the Basque and Catalonian minorities or express his viewpoints on the referendum on Spain's joining NATO or the ratification of the military agreements with the United States. The image of open windows used so much by the Socialists in their election campaign was replaced yesterday by the opposite image of closed shutters and locked rooms. Let us hope that today's debate will let light and air flood into the floor of the Congress and that Felipe Gonzalez will find again, before the millions of citizens who will be listening to him through radio and television, the characteristic way, which was lost yesterday, of viewing politics and of conveying his ideas and feelings to the Spanish people."

Madrid YA describes Gonzalez' speech on page 5 as a "restrained and moderate" speech "which was not that of an ideologist but a politician on the threshold of his greatest responsibility as a statesman." It comments: "The change which Mr Gonzalez has proposed is not exclusively but principally economic and social change; and this, of course, is the change for which the country is hoping. Does Mr Gonzalez have competent colleagues? Let us suppose that he does. Does he also have the appropriate solutions? For the moment we do not know, because the truth is that in his speech he stated what must be changed but not how. He even referred to the future debate on the budgets as the time for explaining his ideas in depth. We find it hard to accept that he believes it possible to keep going until then with the mere declaration of intentions which his speech yesterday was , and prefer to assume that he has kept the necessary details in order to reply to the opposition's strong dialectical attack. In the meantime, we will postpone our judgement, although let us once more make so bold as to doubt that Mr Gonzalez will triumph where Mr Mitterrand is failing, although he set out from an incomparable more prosperous and better prepared basis than ours."

GOVERNMENT TO STAY DESPITE PARLIAMENTARY DEFEAT

When the Folketing voted on the allocations, four government parties abstained and thus the Social Democratic motion was carried.

SOVIET REACTION TO REAGAN'S MX MISSILE DECISION

PM071535 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 28 Nov 82 p 12

[Editorial: "Strength and Negotiation"]

[Text] The Soviet Union has reacted sharply to President Reagan's decision to make the MX missile the backbone of U.S. strategic forces. This is understandable. Nor is it a surprise that later in the eighties, MX missiles will begin replacing the 20-year-old Minuteman intercontinental missiles, for technical work on modernization has been going on under the last three U.S. Presidents and the decision was made in principle and included in Reagan's rearmament program announced last year. But the deployment system which Reagan has chosen from 35 possibilities will -- if it lives up to expectations -- be able to neutralize a larger part of a possible opponent's attack potential than the missiles in themselves would be able to do. The bold packing of 100 hardened MX silos on a 15-km-long base means that anyone trying to destroy this strategic base in one concentrated attack must expect to lose a large part of his own attacking missiles. This "fratricide" effect, which like a jujitsu hold, uses your opponent's own strength to neutralize him, may perhaps be eliminated in a later phase of developments in military technology. At present, however, it is an insurmountable problem. For the rest of the century it will be able to add a new element of doubt to the already doubtful notion that an attack on U.S. strategic arms could rule out annihilating retaliation. This doubt is the best guarantee that no one will see political potential in a nuclear war. It prevents war, which is what it is supposed to do. But for the Soviet Union every unsolved problem in military technology is seen as needing a solution if the balance of power is to be kept in order, and this could mean that an expensive new arms program is necessary.

The alternative of course is redoubled efforts to reach agreement between the superpowers to bring the balance of strength down to a lower, economically more tolerable level. It is well worth noting that at the same time as criticizing Reagan's MX decision the Soviet Government gave a positive reception to his demarche for broadening the Geneva negotiations. His proposals for greater reciprocal openness with information on the composition of their respective nuclear forces and his offer of advance warning of all military missile tests were taken as businesslike and useful steps and not sent on to the propaganda department. On the whole the Soviet Union, in this first week of General Secretary Andropov's reign, has shown itself to be reasonably susceptible to possible improvements in its relations with the United States and the West in general, and the possibilities which could be contained in this have been treated in a matter-of-fact and careful fashion by the U.S. and European governments.

FINLAND

PRESIDENT ON FOREIGN POLICY, NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

PM071249 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 27 Nov 82 p 4

[Unattributed report: "Koivisto on Foreign Policy: Purposeful Leadership Benefits Finland"]

[Excerpts] There can be no doubt that the purposeful exploitation of the head of state's powers in the foreign policy field have benefited Finland in the last few decades. It is because of this that we have been able to create and establish our present foreign policy line, President Mauno Koivisto said in a speech yesterday evening to the Paasikivi Society in a contribution to the debate on foreign policy decision making and foreign policy powers.

Koivisto's analysis clearly stressed the president's role as leader of foreign policy. As far as the foreign policy debate which has taken place this fall is concerned, the president said that those responsible for foreign policy cannot take part in the debate in the same way as individual citizens. The state's representatives must "put the question differently" from people who, because they are only responsible for themselves, are able to express thoughts, feelings and moral judgements. Koivisto pointed out that judgment and consistency are necessary if foreign policy goals are to be pursued in a credible way.

When Paasikivi and Kekkonen began their work, the climate of opinion in Finland was completely different from today's situation. Recently there has been no need for pleas to the general public and the mass media to recognize facts and act with self-control, and Koivisto hoped that he would not need to have recourse to this in the future. "This does not mean that I want to say that all views expressed in public about foreign powers which are well disposed toward Finland have always fallen within the limits of what is permissible," he said.

According to Koivisto our position must continue to be subjected to "constant analysis, so that we do not forget our points of departure under the appearance of great fundamental agreement and lose our ability to follow developments in the international situation attentively."

In the sizable section of the speech dealing with international questions, President Koivisto touched on the tense international situation and noted that, despite everything, tension is still at a lower level than it was in the sixties and European conditions are not the reason for international differences this time. Koivisto said that he felt that he had noticed a new phase of demarcations of principle beginning in relations between the superpowers and that he hoped that earlier declarations from the period of detente -- such as those in the SALT I agreement -- would win "renewed currency and usefulness." Koivisto said that he did not think that the restoration of the superpowers' ability to cooperate was not enough in itself to renew the international climate. The authority of the United Nations should also be restored.

Despite the tense international situation, Finland's position remains stable and our relations with all states have developed positively, Koivisto said. He considered it important that fluctuations in international tension have not been allowed to disturb the positive development of cooperation among our neighbors. "In the future we should continue to make sure that this situation, which is favorable to security in the whole of northern Europe, is not jeopardized through measures adopted or not adopted by Finland," President Koivisto said.

Koivisto also referred to his short meeting with new Soviet party leader Yuriy Andropov at President Leonid Brezhnev's funeral. He said that he had been able to ascertain personally that there are no cracks in the intimate relations between Finland and the Soviet Union. Koivisto also said that Andropov's knowledge of international questions and his understanding of relations between Finland and the Soviet Union is considerable.

Koivisto also touched on the situation in the Nordic area and said that from the point of view of the Nordic nations it is important that no nuclear arms have been deployed in the area. "This has been an important reason why the tension between the military pact blocs has not once disturbed the stable situation in northern Europe since World War II," he said. However, the positive situation has also included "a certain uncertainty factor" in the form of the NATO nations' stipulation that their nuclear-free status only applies in peacetime. According to Koivisto this is something "which is not viewed as promoting security, at least by Finland." The fact that in the past 20 years none of the Nordic nations has wanted to change the prevailing situation by no means invalidates President Kekkonen's old plan for a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic area. On the contrary, it would be in the Nordic people's interests to enshrine the current positive situation in an agreement, Koivisto said.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES AGREEING TO PLO OFFICE

PM071659 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 2 Dec 82 p 6

[Unattributed report: "PLO To Have an Office in Helsinki?"]

[Excerpts] The PLO wants to open a political bureau in Helsinki, prominent PLO representative Fu'ad Bitar said in Helsinki yesterday. Bitar said that he would be discussing the question with Foreign Minister Par Stenback today and he hopes to reach agreement on when a bureau can be opened.

Bitar is the PLO's ambassador to Tanzania but is acting temporarily as the head of the PLO bureau in Cyprus. Yesterday he took part in a seminar arranged by the Arab Peoples' Friendship League, among others. The seminar's theme was "the fate of the Palestinian Arabs -- a stain on UN history." Bitar was a member of the PLO delegation which visited Finland between 31 May and 5 June this year.

"In our talks with the Finnish foreign minister and other Foreign Ministry officials, agreement was reached in principle for the opening of a PLO bureau in Helsinki," Bitar said. He said that the matter had been delayed because of the outbreak of war in Lebanon. "However, we now intend to settle the matter, and the PLO hopes to be able to open its bureau as soon as possible," Bitar said. The PLO has bureaus in a total of 86 countries, 25 of these at ambassador level. Many of the PLO bureaus are information offices which only allow the Palestinians to spread information. The Finland bureau will be a political one, which means that the PLO will be able to maintain direct contacts with the ministries. Such bureaus are generally set up in countries whose governments have not recognized the PLO. Finland only recognizes states, not organizations.

The Foreign Ministry said yesterday that there have been no real talks about a bureau for the PLO in Helsinki. The Foreign Ministry added that no agreement on such a bureau had been reached. The claims that there is agreement in principle for the establishment of a PLO bureau are obviously based on a misunderstanding, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said.

PEACE-KEEPING FORCE LEAVES FOR BEIRUT 8 DEC

[Text] About 250 Finnish peace-keeping troops left Helsinki Vantaa Airport for Beirut early this morning. The unit is part of the main force of the Finnish UN battalion, whose last group of about 140 men will fly to Lebanon on Friday.

An advance group of 78 men has been in Lebanon for a month preparing for the arrival of the main force. The peace-keeping troops now going to Beirut can be deployed immediately in the tasks assigned to them. The Finnish battalion will be responsible for the area in which the French UN battalion was stationed in September.

SWEDEN

BODSTROM SAYS SWEDEN WOULD TALK WITH PLO

PM071551 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 4 Dec 82 p 6

[Unattributed Report: "Bodstrom: Would Be Pleased To Meet the PLO"]

[Text] "The Swedish Government has noted with interest and satisfaction the PLO's increasingly constructive approach to a solution of the Middle East conflict." 'Talks with representatives should therefore be welcomed," Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom said in the Riksdag yesterday. He also said that the staff of the PLO's Information Bureau in Stockholm also have regular contacts with Swedish authorities, including the Foreign Ministry.

Bodstrom repeated Sweden's criticism of Israel's invasion of Lebanon and the demand for an immediate Israeli withdrawal. He also said that a solution to the Palestinian problem cannot be achieved unless the parties affected meet in direct negotiations.

"We consider that the PLO must take part in these negotiations as an equal partner. It is a flight from reality not to realize today that the PLO represents the overwhelming majority of the Palestinian people," he said. Hans-Goran Franck (Social Democrat), who had raised the situation in Lebanon in a question to the foreign minister, was most satisfied with his reply. "I hope that a PLO delegation will soon be able to visit Sweden," he said.

After the Riksdag session, Bodstrom told TIDINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA that the government has no plans to invite a PLO delegation. However, a Swedish organization could very well do so, and then it would also be possible for PLO representatives to be received at the Foreign Ministry.

COMMENTS ON KOIVISTO FOREIGN POLICY SPEECH

PM071533 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Sweden 28 Nov 82 p 2

[Editorial: "Koivisto's Speech"]

[Text] It is an event when Finland's new president, Mauno Koivisto, makes his first detailed speech on foreign affairs. It is no coincidence that Koivisto chose the Paasikivi Society as the forum for his exegesis. During his presidency, Urho Kekkonen used the Paasikivi society as a platform for important speeches, and the so-called Paasikivi-Kekkonen line is of course fundamental to Finnish foreign and security policy.

What we should note in Koivisto's speech is the force with which continuity is emphasized. This in turn means that those expecting sensational novelty will be disappointed. However, this disappointment should be easy to take since the absence of sensational elements really underlines the stability which Finnish foreign policy has acquired. This benefits everyone in our part of the world.

Finland's friendship, cooperation and mutual assistance treaty and its neighborly relationship with, as it is generally put, the big neighbor to the East, its principle of keeping out of superpower conflicts and its Nordic orientation are fundamental elements in Finnish foreign policy. New Soviet leader Andropov has told Koivisto personally that the trust between the Soviet Union and Finland is not marred by any cracks. In the present situation it is probably of some comfort to the Soviet leaders that in the midst of all their problems they do not need to worry about hitches in relations between Moscow and Helsinki.

It is inevitable that a speech becomes something of a foreign policy liturgy when questions like the United Nations, detente, disarmament and security conferences are dealt with. Nevertheless, there is good reason to note, not least in the Swedish Foreign Ministry, the skill with which Koivisto linked together the Soviet Union and the United States, at a time when after many difficult years the superpowers are beginning to reassess their relations with each other. There is every reason for the two of them to recall earlier proclamations that in the age of nuclear arms they must build on peaceful coexistence.

In an appealingly low-key approach Koivisto mentioned the area of Nordic relations covering the discussion of a nuclear-free zone. In peacetime the Nordic area is nuclear-free. This has worked well for two decades. On the basis of its security policy approach, Finland would view a zone enshrined in a treaty as a further guarantee. On the basis of their security policy solutions Denmark and Norway take a different view. Finally the zone is part of the European complex. After the new Swedish Government's movements this way, and that on the zone issue the situation would probably be much clarified if it was stated that a Sweden-Finland minizone is without interest.

With the third republic [the situation in Finland after the end of the Kekkonen era] certain attempts have been made to open the foreign policy debate in Finland and give the government and the Eduskunta increased responsibility in matters which under the Constitution are ultimately the province of the president. Both Social Democratic Prime Minister Sorsa and Eduskunta Speaker Virolainen of the Central Party have complicated matters through blunders. Against this background, Koivisto ended his speech with a reminder that situations could arise in which he would have to use the independent powers belonging to the area of his authority.

GDR'S SINDERMANN MEETS WITH PYM, OTHERS

[Text] London, 7 Dec (ADN) -- The president of the GDR People's Chamber, Horst Sindermann, member of the SED Central Committee Politburo, who is heading a GDR parliamentary delegation on a visit to Great Britain, met the British foreign secretary, Francis Pym, on Tuesday in London. On the same day, the members of the delegation, deputies from the SED, CDU, Liberal Democratic Party of Germany and the National Democratic Party of Germany, had talks in Parliament with members of the Commons and the Lords.

During the exchange of views in the Foreign Office, Horst Sindermann underlined that precisely in the present distressing situation, political meetings and an open high-level dialogue were important. Everything had to be done realistically and calmly to create an international climate of trust and thus to contribute to a stable peace.

Both sides assessed the development of relations betwen the GDR and Great Britain in a positive light. Their further expansion on the basis of equality, the People's Chamber president emphasized, would serve to help improve the political climate as a whole in Europe. Horst Sindermann said that the GDR accorded great significance to concrete steps for arms limitation and disarmament and was against all actions which might lead to additional threats to peace. The GDR supported the Helsinki process and was doing everything in its power to ensure that a substantial and balanced final document came about at the present Madrid conference.

During the visit to the British Parliament, Horst Sindermann visited the lord chancellor and Cabinet member Lord Hailsham of St. Marlyebone, the speaker of the House of Lords.

In the evening, the GDR parliamentarians were guests at a dinner given by the speaker of the House of Commons, George Thomas. In their exchange of views, the GDR and British deputies pointed to the special responsibility of parliaments and parliamentarians toward their people and the international public to make a contribution to peaceful coexistence. In this sense, the People's Chamber deputies emphasized, the expansion of contacts between the parliaments was desirable.

OPPOSITION CHARGES AGAINST PAPANDREOU REJECTED

[Text] In a statement tonight, the government rejected the interpretation given by the opposition and its press organs to Papandreou's statement at the EEC summit conference. The government statement pointed out that President Kiprianou was the first to welcome Mr Papandreou's statement, who had accused Turkey of continuing its occupation of Cyprus and of maintaining an absolutely unacceptable and negative stand on the Cyprus issue. The government statement said the opposition sacrilegiously exploits the national issue for clearly pre-election aims. The government statement rejected charges of permissiveness by the president of the republic and the government as well as efforts by part of the press to make Prime Minister Papandreou appear that he has accused the Cyprus Government of agreeing to discuss the territorial issue in the talks under the aspect of property compensation. The statement stressed that the territorial issue was discussed only under the concept of determining the territory that will be under the administration of each side within the framework of a federal system, and categorically rejected any idea of discussing the territorial issue under the concept of compensation.

The government statement also rejected the opposition's view that the government has abandoned the issue of the return of the refugees, and stresses that one of the most fundamental prerequisites for a solution to the Cyprus issue for the president of the republic and the government is the safeguarding of the refugees' right to return to their homes and property. The government statement further rejected the hints that the Cyprus Government does not consider the Cyprus issue as one of invasion and occupation, and added that the demand for the withdrawal of the foreign occupation troops has never been abandoned neither under President Makarios nor under President Kiprianou, irrespective of whether the intercommunal talks were being held or not.

With regard to the internationalization issue, the statement said internationalization was always the policy of the Cyprus Government and this is indicated by the events and the intensive efforts that were exerted in the past.

With regard to the dialogue, the statement stressed that never has the president of the republic hidden its negative aspects, and added that despite its disadvantages and the fact that actions are being taken and should continuously be taken in the international arena, both by the Greek and the Cypriot Governments, this does not mean that it must be denounced. At this point, the government statement pointed out that Prime Minister Papandreou made it very clear at the EEC summit conference that he does not support the suspension of the dialogue. The statement added: The criticism of the dialogue is correct and must take place because the aim is not the continuation of a fruitless dialogue, but making the dialoge substantive and constructive.

The government statement stressed that both President Kiprianou and the government know better than anyone else their responsibilities and obligations before the country, and that they neither intend to surrender nor sell out the rights of Cyrpus and the Cypriot people, not to lead the country to fresh adventures and destruction. The government statement finally stressed that it is time to put an end to the exploitation of the national issue for pre-election aims and to the efforts to undermine the relations and cooperation between the Governments of Greece and Cyprus.

NATIONAL ECONOMY MINISTER ON INCOMES POLICY

[Statement by Minister for National Economy Yerasimos Arsenis on 1983 incomes policy on 7 December -- recorded]

[Text] In 1978 inflation was running at an annual rate of 12.5 percent. In 1981 this rate had doubled and inflation was running at an annual rate of 24.5 percent. The public sector deficit was about 7.5 percent in 1978. In 1981 it was double -- 14.5 percent. The balance of current payments, which is our country's debt abroad, was less than $1 billion in 1978, but in 1981 it had amounted to $2.4 billion.

The size of foreign exchange reserves was $3.1 billion in 1978, whereas in 1981 it was only $1.2 billion. This increasing shrinkage [in our foreign exchange reserves] and the increasing rate of inflation was typical of the Greek economy in early 1982. Under these circumstances, the government could not but follow a careful incomes policy, a policy whose basic objective was to halt the decline of the Greek economy. Today I am in the truly pleasant position of announcing to you that the basic objective of the government's economic policy for 1982 has been achieved. Thus inflation, which as we had said was 24.5 percent in 1981 has dropped in 1982 to 21.5 percent. The public sector deficit has dropped from 14.5 percent to 12.9 percent. The deficit in the balance of current payments has dropped to $2.1 billion in 1982 from $2.4 billion in 1981, whereas the size of the foreign exchange reserves in 1982 has remained at the 1981 levels.

At the same time the GNP which showed a true drop of 0.2 percent in 1981 has shown a small increase of 0.4 or 0.7 percent in 1982. I think these figures are typical because they show that not only the sagging of the economy stopped in 1982 but that inflation rates are continuing to shrink and the balance of payments deficit is also becoming smaller. That which is of special significance and must be stressed, is that these achievements in 1982 were followed by an incomes policy that was strongly redistributive. Thus in 1982 the true income of salaried people in the urban sector increased by 5.5 percent in real prices. Specifically, for people receiving minimum wage there was a 21 percent real increase. As a result, the contribution of salaries and wages to the non-agricultural [word indistinct] world increased from 52 percent in 1981 to 55 percent in 1982.

The incomes policy for 1982 naturally could not solve all economic problems, especially problems of a different nature which will be dealt with within the framework of the 1983-87 5-year plan. One of these structural problems is currently of an exceptionally serious significance. I refer to the problem of unemployment. In 1979 we had only 38,000 unemployed. However, every year unemployment doubled itself. This phenomenon of unemployment kept pace with a reduction in industrial production. Industrial production declined by 3 percent in 1981 and showed almost the same drop in 1982. I do not now want to analyze in detail the problem of unemployment and its reasons. However, I would like to refer to a basic point, that currently our industry has ceased being competitive. Thus Greek products are being displaced not only from their markets abroad but also from our own market.

Thus, in order to solve the problem of production and to solve the problem of unemployment, we must seriously deal with the problem of the Greek economy's competitiveness and this basically is the problem of 1982. We reckon that in 1983 additions to the work force will amount to 150,000 people. These people will contribute to the already unemployed. Only 70,000 will be absorbed by the economy in the form of replacements. Consequently, we shall have as our objective finding new positions for at least 80,000 working people if we want to let unemployment remain at the 1982 level, which already is a rather high level.

The government program for 1983 aims at absorbing the 80,000 workers and salaried people and at reducing the number of unemployed in 1982. A basic lever for the reduction of unemployment is the program of public investments that has already been announced. We foresee the program for public investments in 1983 will absorb directly or indirectly at least 45,000 workers and employees. We believe that the program of private investments for 1983 will be rather significant. In the National Economy Ministry there are already 1,080 outstanding applications from private investors amounting to 102 billion drachmas. Our services have calculated that these investments will result in the employment of an additional 28,000 workers and employees. Naturally, these positions will not be created in 1983, but even if we estimate that half of these people will find work in 1983 then we ascertain that we approach the government's basic goal of absorbing the increase in new additions to the work force.

With this investment program, with the program for increasing exports which we have already announced, and with the general increase in production which we expect as a result of the investment program, we believe that in 1983 additions in the work force will be absorbed and the level of unemployment will most likely be reduced. Naturally, the production of goods is one aspect of the problem -- the goods must also be sold. In order to sell goods they must be competitive and be offered at competitive prices both domestically and abroad. Our calculations show that for Greek industry specifically and more generally for the Greek economy to become competitive there are no significant margins for redistribution of incomes in 1983. If our objective is -- as I believe that it should be -- the reduction of unemployment, then the government's incomes policy should deal with this problem as its main target. For this reason the government has decided to follow an incomes policy which aims not only at reducing unemployment but also at protecting the working people's real income.

With regard to the public sector, the government will disburse to salaried people and pensioners the following increases: First, on 1 January, 1983 half the amount of the automatic cost of living increase which covers price increases from September to December 1982; second, payment on 1 May 1983 of the remainder of the above automatic cost of living increase covering price increases from January to August 1983. The calculations for determining the automatic cost of living increase will be made with the same method and on the same basis as the automatic cost of living increase for 1982.

In connection with public businesses and organizations, their administrations are asked to follow without deviation the government's incomes policy. In order to achieve in general, the economic goals and more specifically to combat unemployment, the government believes that it is necessary to implement this income policy in the private sector too and it appeals to [the private sector] to help in the implementation of the incomes policy without deviations, The implementation of this incomes policy which will reduce unemployment will at the same time lead to an increase in the national product. Thus at the end of 1983, the conditions should exist for supporting an incomes policy for 1984 which will produce for the working people [words indistinct] in 1983 and a significant part of the increase in productivity which arises from the 1983 production process.

The issue of the competitiveness of Greek products does not concern only the [word indistinct] of work, it also concerns prices of final products. We believe that with the government's incomes policy, the cost of production will be such that the Greek economy will be able to successfully compete in the international arena. However, for this to happen we expect the private sector and specifically industry to follow a price policy that will not be profiteering. Naturally, there should be reasonable profits for the private sector, but there are no margins for superprofits. The government is determined to follow closely the development of prices and with the specific measures which the minister of commerce will announce, we shall follow the development of prices. We hope that through the cooperation we shall have with the private sector, prices will develop in a satisfactory manner so that the government's basic objective can be achieved: regaining the Greek economy's competitiveness.

RIZOSPASTIS ON PAPANDREOU'S CYPRUS POLICY

[From the "Radical" column: 'EEC and Cyprus"]

[Text] Mr A. Papandreou again made a statement on the Cyprus issue at the EEC summit conference. Naturally, it was a futile effort. None of the leaders of this organization's member countries even cared to give him an answer. Besides, what would they tell him? Would they explain to him why they send EEC parliamentarians from their countries to the occupied parts of Cyprus? Why they systematically promote, through various firms, economic relations with the so-called "Turkish Cypriot state?" Why they are, step by step, promoting from a thousand angles the "de facto" recognition of the..." "Federated Turkish Cypriot State" of fascist Denktas? Besides, Mr Papandreou himself had earlied denounced the EEC together with NATO and the United States for being responsible for the Cypriot tragedy, the juntist coup d'etat and the Turkish invasion. How, then, could the perpetrators be moved today by statements and appeals for help to their victim? The road to the Cyprus solution passes, above all, through reliance on the true friends of the independence, territorial integrity and demilitarization of Cyprus. Such friends are, exclusively and alone, the socialist and nonaligned countries, as life has tragically proved. An international conference under UN auspices for the solution of the Cyprus problem, which has been proposed by the Soviet Union, is the realistic and absolutely feasible way of immediately promoting a correct course. At the same time, this way is also acceptable to the Cyprus Government. The government of Mr Papandreou must follow this, and only this road, if it desires the correct Cyprus solution, and not search for a Cyprus solution through the...support of EEC, NATO, the Americans or various personalities such as Brandt and others.

SOVIET JUSTICE MINISTER MEETS OFFICIALS

NSC CLARIFIES CONDITIONS FOR DISMISSING WORKERS

[National Security Council Resolution No 72 -- read by announcer]

[Text] 1. It is understood that certain officials have misinterpreted the National Security Council's Resolution No 3 and Communique 15 which specifies under what conditions workers can be dismissed now that strikes and lockouts have been postponed. These officials seem to suppose that the resolution and communique in question apply only to those workplaces which had a strike or lockout at the time the resolution and communique were issued.

2. Resolution No 3 and Communique 15 apply to all workplaces that have existed since 12 September 1980, or that opened after the publication of this resolution regardless of whether strikes or lockouts were postponed there or not. Resolution No 3 and Communique 15 stipulate that:

A. A worker cannot be dismissed unless he himself wants to leave, or if he does not abide by the rules of morality and good will, if he has health problems, if he is to retire, if the labor contract expires, if his work is undesirable for general security and public order reasons, if his services are not useful or if there are similar reasons.

B. Workers can be dismissed by a workplace which is to close down or reduce personnel for economic reasons only after the government studies the situation and the concerned authorities grant permission.

3. Directives issued by the government clarify the ways to implement the principles cited in Article 2.

KOHL REPORTEDLY SETS VOTE OF CONFIDENCE DATE

DW090937 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2100 GMT 8 Dec 82

[From the "Tagesthemen" program]

[Text] The road to early Bundestag elections on 6 March now seems to have been paved. According to information gathered by our Bonn studio, Chancellor Kohl will submit a request for a vote of confidence next Tuesday. This will reportedly not be linked with any concrete subject.

The vote will then be held a week from Friday following the adoption of the 1983 budget. After final consultations with President Carstens, Kohl will inform the CDU/CSU Bundestag group about his decision. According to DDP, Carstens has already given the green light. The FDP Bundestag group has been summoned for a special meeting tomorrow.

FDP Approves Early Elections

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- At a special session this morning the FDP Bundestag group approved the procedure by which Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl intends to bring about early elections. Group spokesman Eberhard Hofmann reported that the group endorsed its désire to hold fresh elections on 6 March 1983 by an "overwhelming majority."

There has been speculation during the past few days that the question of fresh elections continues to be disputed among the Free Democrats. Hofmann reported, however, that there were only a few objections. A vote was not taken because the overall opinion was unequivocal. None of the FDP deputies even hinted that they would try and oppose fresh elections by taking the matter to the Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe.

FORTHCOMING VISIT BY EGYPT'S MUBARAK VIEWED

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- Helmut Kohl's government expects the visit by Egyptian President Husni Mubarak at the beginning of next week to provide important information on the state of Arab efforts for a settlement of the Middle East conflict. According to official government information, Bonn places great store on Mubarak's views. As the president of a "very friendly country," he can expect great attention.

Christian-Democratic Minister of State in the Foreign Ministry Alois Mertes told DPA on Wednesday that Mubarak is coming to Bonn "in an important phase of the development of our Middle East policy." He stressed that Bonn and Cairo hold common positions in many areas; this includes the positive reaction to the U.S. Middle East initiative and the view that the West European states should closely coordinate their Middle East policy with the United States. At the same time, the CDU politician welcomed the present "very important efforts" by the president to bring the viewpoints in the Arab camp closer together.

Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff told DPA that Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl regards Egypt as an "essential stabilizing element in the Middle East peace process." Foreign policy spokesman of the Christian-Democratic parliamentary group Hans Klein said in an interview with DPA that the Egyptian president is consistently continuing "under undoubtedly more difficult circumstances" the peace policy of his predecessor, As-Sadat. "Egypt is one of those countries which have made peace a priority," Klein said.

CABINET DISCUSSES LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

DW291105 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 9 Dec 82 p 2

[Text] Bonn, 8 December -- On Wednesday the Federal Cabinet agreed not to make a decision yet on the question of signing the law of the sea convention. The cabinet plans to deal with the matter again in a few months. A 2-year period has been set for signing the convention. Government Spokesman Stolze reported after the cabinet meeting that objections to the planned management of the sea floor had been voiced in the discussion, as had reasons favoring signing the law of the sea convention. In its final decision the Federal Government intends to take into consideration the attitudes of the partner states which to date have not been determined.

BERLIN OFFICIALS URGE MORE CONTACTS WITH GDR

LD082208 Hamburg DPA in German 1817 8 Dec 82

[Text] Berlin, 8 Dec (DPA) -- The mayor of berlin, Richard von Weizsaecker (CDU) and the SPD candidate for chancellor and parliamentary group chairman in the House of Representatives, Hans-Jochen Vogel, have spoken in favor of further talks with the GDR. During the budget debate in the House on Wednesday, Vogel also proposed direct talks between the mayor and the leadership of the GDR. In the event that Weizsaecker, after careful consideration, deems such talks to be in Berlin's interests, the SPD will take up a constructive stance.

Weizsaecker said that the Senate is seeking contacts with the other side. In East Berlin, however, the dominant view is that the two cites should maintain a distance from each other. The Senate, on the other hand, sees its task in "openness for all of Berlin" and has drawn up its plans for the city accordingly. In the general discussion on the economic and political situation of Berlin, the "national task" of the city was stressed. Weizsaecker said that the existence of Berlin gives everything which affects people in divided Germany its decisive importance. In the federal territory there should be a greater awareness than hitherto that the national task does not simply mean more financial aid for Berlin. Vogel emphasized the identity of views with the CDU on Berlin, and on inner-German policy. But now, fresh impulses from the Senate are needed, for example, on talks about the urban railway and on the electrification of the railways.

AID TO TURKEY RESTORED -- Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA) -- On Wednesday, through a Christian-Liberal coalition majority, the Bundestag committees for foreign affairs and economic cooperation lifted the ban on aid to Turkey which was introduced in the middle of this year. The agreement of the parliamentary budget committee, which is to deal with this question on Thursday, is as good as certain. The Lower House does not need to formally concern itself with the matter anymore. With this, Turkey will received economic aid in 1982 from the FRG worth DM413.5 million, of which DM264.5 million is the German contribution to the most recent Western support action. In addition, the Foreign Affairs Committee agreed to defense aid by Bonn worth DM130 million. [Excerpt] [Hamburg DPA in German 1456 GMT 8 Dec 82 LD]

LE MONDE VIEWS ARMY REORGANIZATION PLANS

[Jacques Isnard report: "General Delaunay Reveals Broad Outlines of New Army Model Proposed by Mr Hernu"]

[Text] Army Chief of Staff Gen Jean Delaunay has just informed his subordinate commanders of the government's intention to radically change the present organization of the French ground forces by creating a new model of battle corps centered on the Hades tactical nucelar weapon and comprising rapid action and assistance forces, an eight-division armored and mechanized force and mobilized forces.

It is the 1984-1988 military programming law, due to be submitted to Parliament next spring, which should define the size and means of these forces. But General Delaunay is already stating that the main programs for the Army in that legislative document will be a new combat tank and a new helicopter gunship. Nonetheless, the chief of staff admits that at present he is unable to say how many men the new model of the Army will have, and, recalling his instruction to the officers to remain calm, he says that the Army "will not be the Cinderella of defense."

The foundations of this new organization of the French Army were laid in Paris last week at the meeting of the Higher Council of the Army, which comprises the main chiefs of that branch of the armed forces under Defense Minister Charles Hernu's chairmanship.

On that occasion the defense minister revealed that he had sent a letter to Armed Forces Chief of Staff Gen Jeannou Lacaze stating the objectives to be attained in the next 10 years to ensure that the Army can make a greater contribution than in the past to the "overall deterrent," as defined by the president of the republic during his visit to the Canjuers (Var) army camp on 15 October.

Indeed, Mr Hernu's intention seems to be to try to increase the Army's mobility, multipurpose role, rapidity of action and firepower by modifying its present organization and deployment. Thus, the defense minister thinks, the aim is to increase a possible aggressor's uncertainty and confusion in its attempts to ascertain in advance what exactly is covered by the necessarily broad notion of France's so-called "vital" interests.

At present, in addition to its five Pluton nuclear artillery regiments, the French Army mainly comprises one army general staff, three army corps general staffs, eight armored divisions, five infantry divisions, one parachute division, one alpine division and one overseas action brigade. With around (apparent word drop) men, this force can field 3,400 armored vehicles of various kinds (track laying and wheeled) and 270 combat and utility helicopters.

It is this organization which the government has decided to reexamine. In his memorandum, apparently distributed even to the division general staffs, General Delaunay explains that the current studies essentially relate to four major lines for reforming the structures.

1 -- The tactical nuclear weapons' range and speed of reaction will be increased by placing those means of destruction not at the Army corps level, as the Pluton missile launch pads now are, but at the level of the armed forces chief of staff, who is under direct orders from the president of the republic. By this new system the government intends to show that the use of these means can be envisaged, if necessary, well outside the army corps' area of operation and without any necessary link with its own action in the field.

That seems to be a fairly clear change in the doctrine governing the use of tactical nuclear weapons since it was previously specified that the Pluton missile launch pads were completely integrated into the army corps' maneuvers and, moreover, travelled with them.

There is no doubt that the technical possibilities of the future Hades missle will give that tactical nuclear weapon system performance capabilities which are broader in time and space, as is also the case with the medium-range air-to-surface missile transported by plane.

The Hades surface-to-surface missiles, mounted in pairs on wheeled vehicles, should have a 350 km range. They are intended for use from the national territory to project nuclear fire beyond the FRG's eastern borders, even if Bonn has already presented the argument that the target populations in the GDR are Germans too.... While awaiting the Hades system, which will be ready commencing in 1991, General Delaunay is envisaging regrouping at the functional level the five regiments of Pluton missiles, whose range is 120km.

The Third Dimension

2 -- A large rapid action and assistance forces [FAAR] command, directly under the armed forces chief of staff might be created. It would comprise so-called "third dimension" forces. Those forces, transported by plane or helicopter or able to be dropped by air, are capable of being put into action in a few hours with powerful anti-tank means and are capable of overcoming the constraints of the terrain or obstacles created by the ferocity of the fighting.

If the plan is finally accepted, these forces will comprise several regiments of antitank helicopters with infantry elements which could be operational as early as 1983, infantry divisions suited to the third dimension and equipped for antitank combat in an urban environment and, if necessary, a so-called light armored cavalry division which would be equipped with the existing AMX-10 RC reconnaissance devices for the needs of an adapted command post. The Alpine division could be included in this network on the same basis as other infantry divisions.

The government's view is that this FAAR will be formed, even in peacetime, in such a way that it could send an expeditionary corps on a rapid overseas assistance mission, as is already the case now, but could also act as reinforcements to the traditional armored and mechanized battle corps for any action and any zone in Europe where the need was felt for its mobilization.

3 -- The armored and mechanized battle corps will in fact be maintained with the same missions but with a different organization and a different division of its staff between active officers and reserve soldiers. It was to this large unit, also called the First Army, that Secretary of State for Defense Georges Lemoine was referring in Paris on 28 October when he said that it was necessary to reexamine its deployment in peacetime, "perhaps at the expense of a manning levels policy."

According to General Delaunay, that battle corps will keep its main function of providing a second echelon (the reserve) of forces for the Atlantic alliance in Europe or for halting an attack outside the national borders with or without liaison with the allies. Two army corps in this large command, comprising six armored divisions and two infantry divisions, will field around 1,000 tanks and will be trained to fight, with the infantry and artillery, on European operational terrains which are primarily urbanized and wooded.

A Third Army Corps will be set up in this same unit to act as a reserve for the first two and will be formed from staff from the military schools or from divisions which do not come under the FAAR and the two other army corps. This third army corps, which will group so-called "nondivisional" units, will have a smaller general staff.

4 -- The gendarmerie and reorganized mobilization forces will be called upon to cooperate in all matters concerning the protection of sensitive points and the defeat of enemy elements that succeed in landing, are dropped by parachute or infiltrate. This organization will be carried out at three levels.

The battle corps divisions will initially be brought up to strength by the systematic recall of reservists who have carried out their military service in those divisions less than 1 year previously and to give value to conscription, will thus constitute, what Mr Hernu and Mr Lemoine recently termed "the army of the early stages." Other mobilized reservists will be sent to regional intervention units to fight in the battle corps' rear, in each of the five big defense zones in France against any indirect action of dimensions equal to or greater than the company. Finally, the gendarmerie, which has its own reserves and volunteers, will, on the authority of the local territorial commands, be given the job of protecting some sensitive points, opposing the action of infiltrated light commando groups and organizing the survival of the populations affected by the fighting.

By revealing this information following the recent meeting of the Higher Council of the Army, General Delaunay is clearly trying to reassure his officers, who had been worried by Premier Pierre Mauroy's announcement that the government was planning a new army model.

The chief of staff is stressing the idea that the aim of the current studies is to integrate the Army more into the general deterrent, but that no decision has yet been taken.

The defense minister, for his part, thought that calculations of manning levels and garrisons to be set up or abandoned were no longer appropriate. Instead, Mr Hernu called on the military chiefs to make every effort to ensure that the Army, as regards its future equipment, keeps up with the technology on which in the future, the mobility and firepower of its units will depend.

TALKS UNDERWAY FOR 2-BILLION DOLLAR SAUDI LOAN

[By Jean-Jacques Mevel]

[Text] Paris, Dec 8 (AFP) -- The backing of at least 2,000 million dollars (14,000 million French francs) which Saudi Arabia is reportedly prepared to make to France would strengthen France's defenses against any renewed pressure on the franc.

But some sources here are worried that it indicates preparations for a new battle over the currency.

An element of mystery surrounds the talks, and reports of the loan have been neither denied nor confirmed officially. This contrasts with publicity in mid-September over the launch of a 4,000 million dollar loan by France raised through some 130 French and foreign banks.

That publicity was intended to demonstrate the French Government's determination to defend the franc "by every means".

However, six weeks were required to complete talks between the French Treasury and the banks, and these negotiations were marked by leaks.

The latest reports indicate that Saudi Arabia would make a 2,000 million dollar deposit, and some sources say that this could be accompanied by a large credit. But the talks are likely to be even more delicate than those with the 130 banks, and this could explain official discretion here.

French Economy Minister Jacques Delors is due to visit Riyadh from December 20 to 22 for talks on bilateral, economic and financial matters.

Saudi Arabia's reported support is believed to be merely part of broader bilateral negotiations, both political and economic. Since the beginning of last month, French Trade Minister Michel Jobert and Planning Minister Michel Rocard, and Treasury Director Michel Camdessus have been to Riyadh.

These talks, which have not yet reached a successful conclusion, concern mainly renewal of the oil agreement between the two countries. This state-to-state contract expires on December 31 at a time when French oil companies require less Saudi oil in view of the world oil surplus.

Saudi Arabia provides more than a third of France's oil needs. In the first nine months of the year, France's trade deficit with Saudi Arabia was nearly 30,000 million francs (some 4,000 million dollars), or nearly half France's overall deficit.

The trade deficit has been a constant drain on France's reserves. In addition, the recent decline of the dollar has had the effect of pushing up the mark, requiring the treasury to intervene frequently within the European Monetary System (EMS) to support the franc.

In the second half of November the Bank of France experienced an outflow of 3,000 million francs in foreign currency, and on November 25 its foreign currency reserves totalled only 13,300 million francs (about 2,000 million dollars).

According to banking sources, the Bank of France is prepared to include in its accounts that part of the 4,000 million dollar international loan drawn but not yet used, as a way of increasing the size of its reserves.

Officials here have not detailed how the loan has been used, but at the outset they have it clear they intended to draw a substantial sum -- believed to be half -- for use on the money markets without giving advance warning to financial circles.

Such loans are only a small part of resources available to the authorities in defending the franc, as the EMS offers several major short-term financing facilities.

While reports of the Saudi Arabian deposit are seen as good news, official silence about anything touching on defense of the franc has strengthened financiers' fears about a reduction in reserves held by the Bank of France.

Saudis Reportedly Grant Loan

LD090356 Paris Domestic Service in French 1014 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Text] Saudi Arabia has confirmed having granted a $2 billion loan to France, thus enabling it to back the franc. The Franco-Saudi agreement also stipulates credit facilities worth $2 billion. In Paris, the Ministry of Finance has refused to confirm the news. The attitude taken by Riyadh is a new one. One ought to remember that after the 1981 presidential elections, Saudi Arabia as well as several other Arab countries withdrew their money from French banks.

FRENCH BANKS RESCHEDULE ROMANIAN DEBT PAYMENTS

[Text] Paris, Dec 8 (AFP) Some 30 French banks signed an accord with Romania here today to reschedule part of the non-guaranteed Romanian debt to 312 private Western banks, French banking sources said.

A similar deal was signed yesterday by the representatives of 14 banks in London. The Romanian delegation is still scheduled to visit Frankfurt and Zurich to get the signatures of the rest of the 312 banks.

The accords provide for a three-year grace period in the payment of 80 percent of 1,700 million dollars -- the principal due for payment by Romania this year plus last year's arrear payments.

The debts will then have to be paid off in six-monthly installments, with the entire deal extending over six and a half years.

The French banks hold about 20 percent of Romania's Western banking debts. The French sources said that Bucharest could be forced to seek the rescheduling of its 1983 debt payments as well because of its growing financial problems.

L'HUMANITE: 2D NUCLEAR PLANT FOR RSA CONSIDERED

[Unattributed report: "A Second French Nuclear Power Station?"]

[Text] In a communique issued in Paris, the representatives of the African National Congress and SWAPO state that they have "learned with anxiety that the French Government is busy studying the possibility of selling a second nuclear power station to South Africa." They add in particular: "This is not a question of honoring a contract signed before 10 May 1981 under the previous government, but of concluding a new contract, and that runs counter to the statements made by the French Government at the beginning of Mr Mitterrand's 7-year term.

"We are, therefore, asking the government to publicly confirm or deny those reports; but we hope that such a project will not be considered because it would dash the hopes and aspirations aroused by the left's accession to government. Indeed, the conclusion of such a contract would damage it in the eyes of the African peoples in general, and the Namibian and South African peoples in particular, who are struggling for their independence and liberation from the South African racist yoke."

PCF, MOROCCAN LEFTIST PARTY ISSUE COMMUNIQUE

PM081517 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 26 Nov 82 p 9

[Apparent text of joint communique issued after meeting in Paris between the PCF and the Moroccan Party of Progress and Socialism]

[Text] At the end of the talks which took place in Paris between the PCF and the Moroccan Party of Progress and Socialism [PPS], the following communique was issued:

At the PCF's invitation, a Moroccan PPS delegation visited France from 20 through 25 November. The PPS delegation had warm and fraternal talks with a PCF delegation; during the talks information and opinions were exchanged on the political situations in France and Morocco and on various current international questions.

The PCF and the PPS stressed that the resurgence of tension in the world was due to the Reagan administration's aggressive, warmongering policy. That policy, which is a serious threat to international peace and detente, is characterized by increasing aggressiveness in the various regions of the world, by the development of a network of military bases and by all kinds of pressure on the struggle by states and peoples for their national and social liberation.

That confrontation policy waged by U.S. imperialism is a sign of the increased difficulties the latter is encountering in view of the crisis in its system and the rise of people's struggles. It is nonetheless dangerous and requires united action and a more determined and broader response by the forces which advocate peace and social progress.

In that framework the two parties stressed the importance which they attached to the struggle for peace and disarmament in general and more especially in the Mediterranean.

The PCF and the PPS strongly reaffirmed their condemnation of the Israeli aggression, wholeheartedly backed by the United States, against the Lebanese and Palestinian peoples.

They reaffirmed their solidarity with the PLO, the Palestinian people's sole representative, for the creation of a Palestinian state and for the establishment a just and lasting peace in the Near East.

The two sides reaffirmed their commitment to the comprehensive political settlement for which the Fes summit resolutions paved the way. They advocated immediate withdrawal by the Israeli troops from all the occupied Arab territories.

The two delegations also reaffirmed their solidarity with the Lebanese people and the progressive forces in that country, especially the Lebanese Communist Party.

The PPS and the PCF condemned the aggressiveness of the racist Pretoria regime and asserted their solidarity with the Namibian and South African peoples, with the African National Congress and SWAPO and with the frontline countries, particularly Angola and Mozambique.

The PPS and PCF condemned the aggressive U.S. machinations in Central America and recalled their support for Cuba and Nicaragua and for the peoples of the region, particularly those of El Salvador and Guatemala, who are struggling for their liberation.

The PPS and PCF advocated the establishment of a new kind of relations between France and Morocco within the framework of the establishment of a new international economic order.

The two parties examined the problems faced by immigrant Moroccan workers in France. They noted the rapid increase in their number (420,000 people). The PCF recalled its positions on immigration questions.

The two parties reaffirmed their condemnation of the racial discrimination and intolerable racist persecution to which the immigrant workers are subjected by the employers and reactionary circles. They stressed that the improvement in the immigrant workers' situation and full respect for their economic, social and human rights requires constant vigilance.

The two parties appreciate the initial positive measures taken by the French Government to help the immigrants, who welcomed the left's victory with great hope. They expressed satisfaction at the growing role which the Moroccan workers are playing in the struggles, in which French and immigrant workers are united, to overcome the obstacles which the right and the employers are erecting on the road to the satisfaction of their demands.

The two parties hope that in the framework of a new cooperation policy between France and Morocco, new bilateral agreements on immigration might help to improve conditions for Moroccan immigrants in France.

In conclusion, the two delegations expressed satisfaction at this meeting, which enabled a frank and friendly exchange to take place; they noted beyond some differences of opinion, a broad sphere of joint action is opening up for the two parties. The two delegations decided to further develop their cooperation on the basis of independence, mutual respect and equal rights.

DO AMARAL INTERVIEW ON INTERNAL POLITICS

PM061707 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 20 Nov 82 pp 35-39 (Review Section)

[Interview with Social Democratic Center Party (CDS) Chairman and Portuguese Deputy Premier Diogo Freitas Do Amaral 15-16 November in Cascais and Lisbon by Jose Antonio Saraiva and Miguel Almeida Fernandes]

[Excerpts] Miguel Almedia Fernandes: In your opinion, is Eanes an ally of the PCP?

Freitas do Amaral: President Eanes has behaved strangely toward the PCP. Obviously, I do not regard General Eanes as a Communist -- far from it. I do, however, regard his conduct toward the Communist Party as strange.

Any democrat, especially if he is leftwing, has a natural concern, which is to distance himself publicly from the PCP's stances, unless there is an antifascist unitary dynamic on the occasion of a danger of imminent dictatorship. Then all democrats are in the same boat. However, in a normal democratic situation, any democrat, especially if he is leftwing, is naturally to distance himself from the Communist Party. This applies to the Socialist Party [PSP] people, the other independent leftwing democrats and the parties to the right and even to left of the PCP. Now what is strange, is that the president of the republic does not have that concern to distance himself from the Communist Party.

I wish to cite the instance of Poland -- on which he made statements identical to those of the Portuguese Democratic Movement and even those of the PCP (it was "an internal event" which was followed "with concern," but which merited no condemnation) -- and the speech which he delivered in Oporto on the news media: His viewpoints were the same as the Communist viewpoints. The same thing has now happened in the criticisms of the revision of the Constitution.

Thus it happens that in most situations General Eanes has no qualms about adopting on a certain issue a stance coinciding wholly or partly with that of the PCP, and which does not coincide wholly with that of any Portuguese democratic party. I do not say that this serves to classify somebody as a communist, but there is a strange relationship with the Communist Party which naturally arouses criticisms on the part of the democratic parties.

Jose Antonio Saraiva: You said recently that the revision of the Constitution, as regards the president of the republic's powers, would have been different if Eanes had behaved differently. So it is to be inferred that the revision of the Constitution was effected in terms of the current president of the republic....

Do Amaral: No, it is a good thing that you ask me this question, because I thus have the opportunity to clarify an important point. That is not what I sought to say, nor is it what I believe. The revision of the Constitution was not effected in terms of the current president of the republic, and, much less, against him.

The revision of the Constitution was effected taking into account the dangers to the democratic system which the current president of the republic's conduct, with the powers which he possessed, revealed. It is dangerous to the Portuguese democratic system for the president of the republic, whoever he is, to have without limits the power to dismiss the government and to dissolve the assembly. This is one of the reasons why all the democratic parties were in agreement on reducing those powers. It was not in order to thwart the current president. It is his conduct which revealed that there was a danger there which must be forestalled, regardless of the current holder of the post and whoever might come to hold it in the future.

Saraiva: Alvaro Cunhal, in last week's interview with EXPRESSO, said that the revision of the Constitution was bad but could have been worse. This seems to mean that the Democratic Alliance did not effect the revision of the Constitution which it wanted. Was not the PSP the main winner of the revision battle?

Do Amaral: I agree when it is said that the revision of the Constitution was not 100 percent what the Democratic Alliance was seeking. It is sufficient to compare the final text with that proposed by the Democratic Alliance....

Fernandes: ...just an interjection. You said last weekend that the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] was the main winner of the revision battle...

Do Amaral: I did not say that. It is the press which attributed that assertion to me. What I asserted is that there was a number of ideas for which we fought and which we succeeded in enshrining in this revision. However, as I was saying, the revision does not correspond 100 percent to what we wanted. It corresponds almost totally at the political and institutional level, not at the economic level. Here it fell far short of what is necessary. At the economic level the revision was sufficient to liberalize, decollectivize and dedogmatize the Portuguese economic system. We did not succeed in going further because the PSP disagreed. However, this does not mean that the PSP was the main winner of the revision. Why? Because all the amendments approved were in the direction of bringing the Constitution closer to the model proposed by the Democratic Alliance: To eliminate the revolutionary references, remove concepts of a Marxist thrust and introduce elements of liberalization of the system. There was less socialism, less collectivism and greater freedom.

Saraiva: There are Social Democratic leaders who accuse the CDS of growing at the expense of the Social Democratic Party [PSD], and even advocate the immediate dissolution of the government coalition to end that growth. Has or has not the Democratic Alliance's existence benefited the CDS?

Do Amaral: The Democratic Alliance's existence has especially benefited the country. In party terms, all the parties belonging to it have gained. The CDS has benefited from the fact of being in power. Not so much in posts, since it has been underrepresented, but especially because it has been able to demonstrate its leaders' quality and competence -- specifically, ministers and secretaries of state whom it has designated for the government.

PSD's Complexes

Moreover, I will point out that we came to power for the first time through the agency of the PSP and not of the PSD. The CDS was already in power with the PSP, and only later with the PSD. I do not wish to stir up controversies, but I believe that it is unfair to make assertions of that kind.

Everybody knows that the largest party in the Democratic Alliance is the PSD, and will be so until a new election perhaps gives different results. I cannot see why the largest Portuguese party, which has the majority, which has the largest number of ministers and secretaries of state in the government, should have grounds for feeling a complex. The opinion polls say that the CDS is growing. That is a good thing. Is that growth, however, being effected at the PSD's expense? That is something which can only be confirmed at the time of the legislative elections.

Fernandes: Does that mean that in 1984 the CDS will demand a separate count of the votes for each of the Democratic Alliance parties?

Do Amaral: It is very difficult to know how a party grows. In 1975 we had 7.5 percent of the votes. A year later we achieved 16 percent. Our electorate more than doubled.

The PSD, which had 26 percent in 1975, had 24 percent in 1976. Whereas we gained 8.5 percent, the PSD lost only 2 percent. It is obvious that at that time, we did not grow at the PSD's expense.

Moreover, according to an opinion poll commissioned by us, there were swings of votes from the PSD to the CDS, from the PSP to the PSD, from the PSP to the CDS and even from the Communist Party to the CDS. It is obvious that we are not interested in reducing the PSD's importance. The ideal thing for the Democratic Alliance is for all the parties comprising it to grow: All this at the expense of the opposition parties and by mobilizing the abstentions.

PSD and CDS Should Gauge Strength in 1984

Fernandes: What about separate lists?

Do Amaral: What has been discussed and what is desirable is the Democratic Alliance parties being able to count their votes in 1984. Since the Democratic Alliance is not an entity which means or which is seeking to evolve toward the merger of the parties comprising it, this means that they cannot remain eternally shackled by the 1976 results. In 1984, when 8 years will have elapsed since those results, it will be high time for each of the parties to count its votes. How are they to do so? There are two possible ways: Either they run on separate lists or by the method of a coalition of lists. I would prefer a coalition of lists.

To that end, amendments must be made to the electoral law next year. If it is impossible to do so -- or if the president of the republic vetoes it, as it seems he will do in the case of all or almost all legislation -- then we will have to run on separate lists, which would reduce the Democratic Alliance's electoral strength. However, it does not seem to me that the Democratic Alliance parties can be asked to continue for another 4 years, until 1988, without gauging their electorates. This is unacceptable, even in terms of the democratic system's health.

Fernandes: You said that the president of the republic would veto all or almost all legislation. There is talk, specifically, of a veto on the defense law....

Do Amaral: This is what he announced in his strange address. As for the defense law, we will see whether or not he vetoes it. He has that right, although there are probably few democratic countries where the head of state has the right to veto a law approved in Parliament by a majority exceeding two thirds. If there is a veto, the assembly will certainly analyze its grounds, and if it believes that the president of the republic is right, it will amend accordingly the provisions which caused the veto. Otherwise, it will confirm the initial text.

Saraiva: There are CDS leaders who suggest that if the CDS were in power alone, it would not conduct this policy. I ask you whether or not this is so, and, in the event of a negative reply, whether you feel hindered in this coalition with the PSD.

Do Amaral: If we formed a government on our own, we would seek to implement our party program. But we are not doing so. We are implementing the Democratic Alliance program approved in 1979. This means that each party is partially hindered from implementing its program in full.

In terms of domestic and foreign policy, if we were on our own, we would conduct basically this policy. However, in terms of economic policy, we would emphasize more the element of liberalization of the Portuguese economic system. I make a point, however, of stressing that no fundamental disagreement at the ideological level has so far arisen among the Democratic Alliance parties at government level.

Fernandes: But there are disagreements in the government. The most obvious is the disagreement on the overall state budget, which has not even been approved as yet.

Do Amaral: There was no ideological disagreement on the matter. There were disagreements on political opportuneness. In the government, we are all in agreement that it is necessary to make a stringent budget which will contain the deficit at 150 million contos. Everybody is in agreement on beginning to ask austerity from the public sector, instead of asking it from citizens, families and enterprises. The question was how far we could go in fulfilling these aims.

Fernandes: Do you support Joao Salgueiro's economic policy?

Do Amaral; The economic policy is not solely Dr Joao Salgueiro's; it is the government's. I support it; otherwise, I would have already proposed altering it.

Fernandes: You have said that you will be in the executive next year. Is it true that you are making your continued stay in the government conditional on the implementation of a government reshuffle?

Do Amaral: There has not even been any mention of a reshuffle.

Fernandes: But do you in fact advocate a reshuffle in January?

Do Amaral: I do not, and would not, publicly advocate government reshuffles. It is a matter entirely for the prime minister and it is not for other members of the government to take initiatives in this regard.

Fernandes: What would a Democratic Alliance defeat in the local elections mean to you?

Do Amaral: In elections of this kind winning or losing are just words of very relative significance at the national level.

Fernandes: If there is a major electoral defeat of the Democratic Alliance in the local elections, there are three possibilities: Either the Democratic Alliance requests early general elections; or it leaves everything as it stands; or it tries to have recourse to Parliament, thus responding to the appeal from a sector of the PSP, to form a government of national salvation, composed of the Democratic Alliance plus the PSP. Which is the most likely of these three hypotheses?

Do Amaral: I consider them all improbable, since I believe that the Democratic Alliance will achieve a good result. I have various pointers in this direction. Assuming a bad result for the Democratic Alliance, however absurd, it in no way rules out the Democratic Alliance's viability as a parliamentary majority. There are various possible initiatives, but the choice of the most suitable one can only be made afterward, if the defeat materializes.

Saraiva: Would you accept a Democratic Alliance-PSP government if early general elections were held and the Democratic Alliance failed to gain an absolute majority in Parliament?

Do Amaral: If the Democratic Alliance survived despite its elections defeat, if it decided it should not form a minority government, if the PSP also refused to govern with a minority and if, in short, this were the only way of providing the country with a democratic government -- that is, by ruling out further attempts at forming a government based on presidential initiatives -- I would accept such a possibility.

Fernandes: One PSD minister has told me that the Democratic Alliance is dead and that it lacks only a death certificate. Do you consider the Democratic Alliance moribund?

Do Amaral: We are a country that tries to destroy everything positive. The Democratic Alliance has been in government for 3 years, which is now unusual in Europe. The Democratic Alliance has not lost a single vote in Parliament. The government has never had any of its initiatives rejected by Parliament. We have successfully coped with two attempts at a general strike. All motions of confidence have prospered. Despite this, they say that the Democratic Alliance is moribund. What about the facts?

Fernandes: Do you not consider it necessary to renegotiate the Democratic Alliance agreement in 1983?

Do Amaral: I believe that there must be further negotiations on whether we all agree to prolong the Democratic Alliance for the period 1984-88. And so that 1984 can be a year of a victorious advance to the elections, the renegotiation of the accords must take place in 1983.

"I Do Not Make Criticisms In Public"

Fernandes: Do you agree with Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa when he accuses the Democratic Alliance of lack of leadership?

Do Amaral: I do not make criticisms in public, so I cannot say with which criticisms I agree or disagree.

Saraiva: If the CDS reached the conclusion that the Democratic Alliance had lost its potential, would it be brave enough to propose its dissolution?

Do Amaral: Since the outset the Democratic Alliance has been an alliance that identifies with national interests. If, for the sake of argument, the Democratic Alliance tomorrow ceased to reflect the interests of this or that party, I believe it would be difficult for that party to end the Democratic Alliance. But if the parties that make up the Democratic Alliance reached the conclusion that it had ceased to reflect the nation's interests, they would have an obligation to act.

Saraiva: However, inasmuch as the Democratic Alliance was to a large extent the personal creation of Sa Carneiro, any party that proposed its dissolution would always appear as a traitor to the memory of Sa Carneiro. I ask you again: Would the CDS have the courage to do it?

"Central Bloc Would Benefit CDS"

Do Amaral: If, to take an absurd hypothesis, the Democratic Alliance were to become opposed to the national interests, we would certainly have that courage, to end it....

Saraiva: Several social democratic leaders say that if the Democratic Alliance were dissolved, the PSD would derive partisan advantages from it. What about the CDS? Would it gain or lose?

Do Amaral: From a partisan viewpoint the CDS would not be harmed, rather the contrary. The PSD-PSP bloc would benefit the CDS. I believe that the PSD would find it more difficult to reach an understanding with the PSP than it did with the CDS. What is the PSP now? It is a completely divided party, without a strategy and with a disputed leadership. Its conduct in government would therefore be unpredictable. It seems obvious to me that a PSP-PSD government would cause profound dissatisfaction within the PSD, which would benefit us. So the CDS would grow at the PSD's expense.

Saraiva: How do you envisage Portuguese politics without the Democratic Alliance?

Do Amaral: I believe that we would have an openly very argumentative government. Coalitions between two major parties do not last long, as we have learned from Europe's experience.

On the other hand this central bloc would exacerbate the political tensions. Unfortunately, the major trade union confederation is sympathetic toward the PCP. There would be no social truce. Apart from that, without any homogeneous bloc providing a government alternative, many people would channel their dissatisfactions outside the system. Last, the following should be noted: What Portugal needs now is to become a real market economy, dismantling the collectivist heritage of Goncalvesism. A PSD government with the PSP could not do this. Such a government would therefore be against the nation's interests.

Fernandes: You have made a disturbing statement: You said that coalitions are stable only when formed between a major party and a minor party. I would like to ask you: Do you believe that after 1984 the CDS will still be a minor party or that it will grow, in which case problems will emerge within the Democratic Alliance?

Do Amaral: There is also a third hypothesis, which is that the CDS becomes a major party and the PSD a minor party. I do not foresee this, for the time being....

CDS' Growth

Fernandes: Opinion polls indicate that the CDS is close to or level with the PSD....

Do Amaral: Let us suppose that the PSD and CDS are very close in 1984. I acknowledge that in such an eventuality, certain problems could emerge within the Democratic Alliance coalition. But you cannot ask a party to abandon its own growth for the sake of maintaining another party's supremacy.

DRAFT BUDGET SHOWS TAX BENEFIT REVENUES

[Unattributed report: "Budget Seeks to Contain Deficit and Increase Tax Revenues"]

[Text] The draft state budget for 1983 aims at a deficit of 150.3 million contos, as against the 150.7 million contos forecast for this year. The document was delivered at the Assembly of the Republic by the Ministry of Parliamentary Affairs yesterday.

In order to finance that deficit, the government may raise foreign loans up to the sum of 60 million contos, resorting to finance the remainder through subscriptions on the part of the public and banking and insurance institutions. According to the draft, the deficit appears the same as this year's deficit in nominal terms, which represents a 20 percent decrease in real terms.

The government states that the sums earmarked for less essential current expenditures have been limited as far as possible, the provision setting a 4 percent increase in productivity as a target to be achieved by the public services in 1983 being maintained. The campaign against tax evasion and fraud is cited as making possible the increase in tax revenues.

Tax measures

In order to secure the necessary revenues -- and over and above the domestic and foreign loans which we mention above -- the draft budget envisages increasing some duties and taxes and creating new ones. It is thus that in the field of direct taxes the creation is advocated of a special tax on profits, whose rate will not exceed 5 percent, affecting incomes subject to industrial tax.

Increases of 10 percent on the capital tax and on surtax, and of 15 percent on value-added tax [imposto de mais valia], the inheritance tax and the transfer tax (in this last-mentioned instance, only when the sum which it affects is equal to, or greater than, 10,000 contos), are also envisaged.

Despite these increases, there will also be measures of a contrary nature, including the raising to 190 contos of the exemption limit for the trade tax [imposti profissional], concerning which new grades will be set for the 2 percent and 4 percent rates. Pensions will be exempt from that tax, except when their holders work for somebody else.

In surtax, the concern for greater social justice will cause in section A, the raising to 100 and 150 contos respectively of the allowances to which unmarried and married people are entitled. Child allowances will also be increased to 25 to 30 contos. In order to combat evasion of surtax, the criterion of external signs of living standards will be introduced, which will operate in instances in which there is a conspicuous disroportion between declared income and the taypayer's lifestyle.

In the industrial tax, reappraisal of the provisions concerning the classificaton of taxpayers into various groups is envisaged. The maximum limit on the sums of management incomes for the purpose of determining the amount collectable will rise from 560 contos to a sum to be determined in accordance with procedures envisaged in the draft. For taxpayers without organized accounting a sum corresponding to the national minimum wage will be set.

As for the capital tax, the rate of the tax on loan interest falls (from 30 percent to 18 percent) and that of the tax on profits distributed to partners falls from 18 to 15 percent.

Stamped Paper at 50 Escudos

As far as indirect taxation is concerned, purchase tax rises to 17 percent, and the specific duty on beer will be set at 15 escudos per liter. Purchase tax will be extended to the renting of video tapes and to certain services. A tax on enterprises' entertainment allowances, as well as on income from some forms of real estate will be created. Another will be introduced for journeys abroad by air (people over 18 years of age will pay 1,000 escudos, people under that age, 500 escudos.

Stamped Paper will cost 50 escudos, and the rate of the tax on television advertising will rise to 15 percent. In addition, reappraisal of the taxation of banking transactions, as well as of the system of stamp duty on promissory notes, written orders for payment, checks and statements of account [extractos de factura] is also proposed.

The excise tax on domestically produced tobacco will be increased by not more than 25 percent.

Taxes Will Yield 115 Million Contos More

In tariff policy, and bearing in mind entry into the EEC, the alteration of the import duties tariff, so as to bring it into line with the common external tariff, is envisaged. Some duties will be changed into domestic excise taxes. On the other hand, a tax on imports of agricultrual products will be created, so as to avert differences in the prices of products purchased on the world market and those of domestic products.

On the the other hand, the granting of exemption from import duties on capital goods for enterprises in the fisheries sector and in the extractive and processing industries is proposed.

Seeking to encourage and support production activity, it is envisaged granting exemptions from value-added tax in instances of incorporation of the legally established revaluation reserve [rezerva de reavaliacao] into companies' capital.

Tax benefits concerning hotels and similar establishments (for tourist use) and the purchase and construction of homes will be reviewed.

Overall, it is expected that the tax revenues will register an increase of 114.5 million contos in comparison with the previous budget, totaling some 437.6 million contos. That sum will represent 91 percent of current revenues (481.5 million contos). The total amount of actual revenues is estimated at 498.1 million contos.

GONZALEZ SEEKS TO LEARN ARMED FORCES' NEEDS

LD081814 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1400 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez and Defense Minister Narcis Serra attended ceremonies this morning at the Brunete Armored Division held to make the day of the Virgin of the Immaculate Conception, patron saint of Spain and of the infrantry.

The general in chief of the divison, Maj Gen Prudencic Pedrosa, welcomed the prime minister, whom he called on to get to know us so as to understand us. General Pedrosa ended with the following words:

[Begin Pedrosa recording] We hope that this mutual familiarity will lead to the respect which we owe to and have for you being turned into acceptance. I thank you for your visit to our unit and hope you feel at home among us. [end recording]

The prime minister replied with the following words:

[Begin Gonzalez recording] Allow me on this day to congratulate you sincerely and wholeheartedly. And allow me to express my pleasure also at the happy coincidence of the patron saint of the infantry being also the patron saint of Spain as a whole. I do not want to deliver a formal speech this morning. I simply wish to thank you, General Pedrosa, for your words and to assure you that I share them in letter and in spirit. I also want to say that it is in the interests of the prime minister that you should get to know me, that you should know that my vocation is to serve, and I would also like to pick upon your words that one serves Spain from any post, from any place, and say that I would like you to know today, when the new government of the nation is just setting out, that its prime minister will exercise his functions calmly, prudently and firmly, without taking sides for or against any sector but rather with his sights set on the good of Spain which is the fatherland of all Spaniards. He will exercise those functions only in pursuit of the good of Spain.

I wish to make no secret, from the outset, of the fact that to err is part of the human condition. Errors may therefore occur in what I do as prime minister in the coming years. But there will never be any intention other than the upright one of seeking the good of Spain, the good of our fatherland, the good of the immense majority of the citizens of Spain.

I assure you that from today on, from this festive day of happiness for the infantry, I shall make it my business to get to know, to get to know deeply, the human and material needs of our armed forces; and I shall look to them within the capabilities of the Spanish nation, so as better to serve our national defense, and for the honor of Spain and the defense of its integrity, its sovereignty and its independence.

I am a servant of Spain, to whom it falls to assume a grave responsibility. I assume that responsibility with the calmness of mind which I have just affirmed, I assume it in the knowledge of the responsibility resting on my shoulders, I assume it in the hope that it will be for the good of Spain. [end recording]

FERNANDO MORAN ON FOREIGN POLICY ISSUES

PM081525 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 30 Nov 82 p 12

[EFE report: "Foreign Policy Will Pay Attention Especially to Relations With Europe and Maghreb's Stability"]

[Text] Virtual Foreign Minister Fernando Moran has said in statements to EFE that "I do not arrive in the ministry vindictively," and that "all the officials are fit to work with the future government."

The future chief of the ministry cited the strengthening of relations with France, the policy of cooperation with Latin America and the maintenance of stability in North Africa as the fundamental aspects of socialist foreign policy. As for that ministry's internal functioning, he said that "foreign policy must not be a secret, since if it is not based on public opinion, it is doomed to failure."

According to Moran, the changes will be effected gradually, since the new budget will not be available until next summer, and the current budget is very scanty. The next foreign minister's philosophy as regards appointments is based on the idea that a change of system has not occurred with this election, but "there has been something more than a mere change of governemnts; there is a change of political class."

He stressed that the Socialists "will restrict the number of political ambassadors," although he acknowledged that it is essential that some embassies be held by politicians" [opening quote marks dropped in newspaper]. He described the previous government as "enormously incorrect in its appointments policy over the last few months," some of which, he explained, are incorrect not as regards personnel but as regards timing.

On the issue of the EEC, Fernando Moran stated that the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] is concerned more about "whether and how membership is achieved than when. Nevertheless, is Spain has no option in 1985 [as published]. We believe that the current situation will not have been surmounted," and membership would be of interest neither to Spain nor the Community, he stated, echoing the words of Deputy Premier Alfonso Guerra.

Moran recalled Felipe Gonzalez' words to the effect that we will not be obsessed with the issue of the Community, and maintained that the final advance could in fact occur under France's chairmanship in the first 6 months of 1984. This, he added, does not mean that our only European factor is going to be France, but our relations with that country must be global. To this end, he announced the setting up of a large embassy in Paris, in charge of which a person of high standing would be placed.

NATO, Freeze Negotiations

Moran stated that the PSOE's stance on the NATO issue is clear: "It is not anti-NATO, but we deem it neither desirable nor necessary for Spain to become integrated into the military organization, nor did we even deem it necessary to take it into the alliance." "We remain opposed," he said, "to the Union of the Democratic Center government's action in joining the alliance, and we will therefore seek in the first place the freezing of the process of integration into the military organization and into any of the integrated commands."

Fernando Moran reiterated the PSOE's intention of calling a referendum, although without allowing itself to be tied down by a date, "because we must bear in mind that this decision must contribute neither to Spanish internal instability or to the alliance's instability." Nevertheless, Moran declared himself in favor of maintaining the NATO embassy during this time, because "it makes no sense for our voice to cease to be heard."

The future foreign minister stated that the PSOE accepts the agreements with the United States, because they can contribute to Spanish defense, and explained that some readjustments and corrections of them, rather than a renegotiation, must be undertaken. He also said that "a sounding has been taken, and the initial impression is that the United States is prepared to make some adjustments." "We are confronted, he said, "with the recently signed agreements with the United States, but the essential thing, which is a guarantee of defense for the entire integrity of the territory, is not secured in these agreements."

In the Gibraltar dispute, the claim will be relaunched, resting on the UN resolutions, seeking negotiations and using the Lisbon declartion -- which "I do not like, but it is all that there is," according to Fernando Moran. He also said that the PSOE is in favor of opening the gate, "because an alienation of the Gibraltar population has occurred."

Moran added that the PSOE deems it essential to avert a conflict in North Africa, which would have negative repercussions on the current balance of forces. He also stated that it believes that Morocco's stability is essential to our own stability: "Not only will we do nothing to destabilize the king of Morocco, even though his policy is contrary to ours," he said, "we will do what is incumbent on us to maintain his stability." The future foreign minister also told EFE that Prime Minister-designate Felipe Gonzalez intends that his first visit abroad will be to Rabat.

According to Fernando Moran, Latin America's deterioration could be catastrophic for the world, and could even cause several world conflicts. "Therefore," he said, "the socialist government will pay preferential attention to Latin America."

MANUEL FRAGA SPEAKS IN INVESTITURE DEBATE

PM081455 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 2 Dec 82 p 4

[Unattributed report: 'Fraga: First Day of Relentless Opposition']

[Excerpts] The Congress of Deputies plenary session, at which the program submitted by socialist candidate Felipe Gonzalez was debated and the investiture approved, resumed at 1630 hours yesterday afternoon. Herri Batasuna Deputies Inaki Esnaola and Pedro Solabarria, who did not attend the first session either, were absent from the session. A good many ministers of the outgoing cabinet were also absent. On the grounds of importance, we begin the report on the debate with the speech by Manuel Fraga Iribarne, spokesman of the opposition popular group.

"The Spanish people certainly always deserve, especially at moments such as the present, that we tell them the truth, but the whole truth. And they deserve that we tell them it before the election, and to adjust our promises to that truth, which was perfectly well known even then. Now they must be told at least that that truth will render virtually impossible the fulfillment of election promises which were never realistic," Manuel Fraga stated in his speech in the investiture debate.

"Since, whether we like it or not, the countdown for time and the people judging us all now begins," he added, "I have the grave duty of telling the magnificent people of Spain that if an attempt is made to implement the socialist elections program, the consequences for the budget deficit, the disequilibrium in the balance of payments, increased taxes (especially indirect taxes, which are the most regressive socially), the growth of inflation, disinvestment and hence increased unemployment will be such that before 2 years are out, the socioeconomic situation will be simply intolerable. I leave it, of course, to others to express their opinions on what will happen if the program is not implemented, fully proving right those of us who have described it as unworkable."

Mr Fraga described the debate as exceptionally important, and stated that he had the honor to speak on behalf of the popular group in the Congress, resulting from the Popular Alliance's coalition with the Population Democratic Party and with the Navarrese People's Union, the Aragonese Regionalist Party and the Valencian Union -- examplary regionalist forces, which in addition to agreeing on the furtherance of the same model of society, serve Spain's unity effectively by means of the effective defense of their respective regional identities.

Mr Fraga continued by saying, among other things: "It is common knowledge that the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] maintains more than one program. There is a maximum program of the party, which is endorsed at congress after congress, most recently at the 29th congress held in October 1981. It seems that there is a detailed government program which has not been published. "I repeat that this is a crucial issue. In contrast to the statement made in recent polemics that there are no probems with the model of society, that it is the one envisaged in the 1978 Constitution, the political resolution of the 29th congress says verbatim (page 5) that 'the Constitutional framework...does not define a single model of society but can accomodate different forms of society.'

"I have before me the party's maximum program,which is certainly maximalist. It reiterates without palliatives the false doctrine of the class struggle and of the proletariat's servitude, and that the solution 'can only be achieved in one way: By transforming individual and corporate ownership of the implements of labor into joint ownership by the whole of society.'

"I believe, and this is what I once said, that it was essential that Mr Gonzalez Marquez explain to his voters in a public debate the real significance of these -- I repeat -- 'essential and unrenounceable' principles, which are certainly extensively expounded on all the pages of the maximum program, which talks, for instance, of the 'possession of political power by the working class' -- an antidemocratic principle if ever there was one; and even talks of the 'taking of political and economic power and the nationalization of the means of production, distribution and exchange by the working class,' it being specified that 'our ideology leads us to reject any path of accommodation with capitalism or merely reforming it.' The 'socialist society' which is advocated 'must be self-managing.' Its guidance will come from a socialist party -- a 'class, mass, Marxist, democratic and federal party' -- and it is specified that it is Marxist because it accepts 'the scientific method of knowledge and of transformation of capitalist society by means of the class struggle as a driving force of history.'

"In order to succeed in achieving these aims, the PSOE 'advocates a dialectical method of transition to socialism which will combine the parliamentary struggle with popular mobilization in all its forms.' All this, it is explained, is because in the 'transitional stage of building socialism,' 'vigorous and decisive interventions concerning the acquired rights and economic structures of bourgeois society will be necessary'; an issue which was certainly referred to worryingly in yesterday's speech, at least as regards land ownership.

"It is absolutely necessary that Mr Gonzalez Marquez explain to us here and now what the exact significance of these and other statements is, since the official declaration is categorical: 'The PSOE has a basic document -- its maximum program -- which because it remains totally in force, constitutes the basis of all our thinking and action.' If this is so, it is clear that the Spanish people and we parliamentarians must ask ourselves at this moment whether this is really the destination toward which the socialist ship is taking us.

"Mr Gonzalez himself dwelt yesterday on this concept of the socialist 'course.' Either the maximum program is designed to satisfy some socialists, who are in a majority in the Congress, the intention being not to implement it, or else all the rest are stages on a path whose final goal is irreversible and unrenounceable.

Government Should Act Against Noone

"It should be added that Mr Felipe Gonzalez, during the election campaign, and another prominent member of the party more recently, have been especially anxious to explain that their party is not a social democratic party but clearly socalist, and it has been specified why. In Spain -- so it is claimed -- 1 per cent of the citizens own 25 percent of the wealth, and no policy of reforms but a policy specifically directed against the group is sufficient to tackle this problem.

"The role of the opposition -- his majesty's loyal and democratic opposition -- is to exercise, also on behalf of the entire people and not only of its voters, parliamentary scrutiny, which is the basis of the other constitutional forms of scrutiny."

Mr Fraga added, among other things: "What cannot be accepted is that capitalism should once more be to blame for capitalism's mistakes and also be to blame for socialism's weaknesses, as Mr Marchais has just said in France."

Economic Program Full of Vague Ideas

"The speech of the socialist candidate for the premiership has proved to be a catalogue of good intentions as regards economic policy, many of which we share. But the priority of aims, without specifying the necessary means, proves it to be a program full of vague ideas and contradictions.

Thus as for the tax policy deficit, to call for reducing it and reorganizing expenditure without specifying what subsidies will be reduced or what public revenues will increase is a remarkable instance of imprecision. "Thus, as regards the Spanish economic system's competitiveness, Mr Gonzalez states that he will reduce Spanish production costs while simultaneously promising to attack unemployment by "modifying and reducing working hours,' which would increase our products' unit costs.

"My desire, our parliamentary group's fervent desire, is that the socialist government's economic policy succeed. However, I fear that Mr Felipe Gonzalez' government will fail in the endeavor.

We Deny Vote but Will Cooperate

"The fact that we deny it our vote does not mean that we will not give it our critical cooperation throughout the months. If at any time -- in view of the confusion which its measures have created -- the government does not know what to do, let it turn to us who do know.

"You cannot continue to irresponsibly resort to public funds, holding back and taking away resources from private investment, which is essential for creating truly stable jobs. "The candidate's election program promised to create 800,000 jobs over the next 4 years, and also to reduce the number of unemployed to under 1 million -- 600,000 exactly, I believe I recall -- in 1986. It would be a good thing for him to spell out to us at what annual rate these goals will be achieved (so we can monitor their realization precisely), and quantify for us the expected results of each of the measures proposed."

Manuel Fraga concluded his speech by saying: "According to Article 99 [of the Constitution], the vote in this poll is for confidence in the candidate and his program. It is obvious that our vote cannot, unfortunately be favorable, cannot express a confidence which we do not feel. This does not prevent our expressing at this historic moment our best wishes and desires for success to Mr Gonzalez Marquez and the government which he will form, because, if we disagree with most of Mr Gonzalez Marquez' ideas and with his program's approach, in one thing we do wish to trust: In his patriotism and in his awareness of a leader's responsibility. In his turn, let Mr Gonzalez Marquez not doubt that in that spirit he will always find in us the greatest goodwill."

PCE'S GERARDO IGLESIAS ON PARTY'S PROBLEMS

PM081601 Madrid MUNDO OBRERO in Spanish 19-25 Nov 82 pp 5-8

[Unattributed interview with PCE Secretary General Gerardo Iglesias in Madrid -- date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] The PCE has had three secretaries general -- Jose Diaz, Dolares Ibarruri and Santiago Carrillo -- without whose names the PCE's history cannot be written. Today the PCE secretary general is called Gerardo Iglesias. What does this mean to you personally?

[Answer] In these instances it is usual to say that it is a great honor that the party is placing that great responsibility on you. But what I sincerely feel is enormous concern, because I believe that it is a very grave challenge which is confronting me. In the first place, because replacing a person of Santiago Carrillo's stature in the post of secretary general is no easy task; second, because the replacement occurs at a difficult moment for national political life and for the PCE itself.

[Question] You do indeed become secretary general at one of the most difficult moments in the PCE's existence. Outside it, and even within the party itself, it is being said that these election results have made clear the failure of the PCE's whole policy of unity between the workers forces and progressive sectors of the bourgeoisie. Do you believe that these election results must lead the party to change its political strategy radically, and if so, in what way?

[Answer] I believe that the fact that that policy has not made headway does not mean that it is incorrect and should therefore not be maintained. That policy of broad democratic cooperation has indeed been gravely curtailed by the election results in which a clear trend toward the bipolarization of Spanish society prevails.

Does the bipolarization help the development and enhancement of the democratic process? I sincerely do not believe so, and we have said this and reiterate it today. Following the election, the same questions remain: Do or do not the consolidation and development of democracy require the broadest cooperation, the broadest support, the broadest social base? Is a social bloc of progress which will make it possible to successfully tackle the necessary transformations necessary? I believe so, and that the policy which the party is upholding therefore remains valid, although -- and the recent Central Committee plenum spoke out in these terms -- a thorough analysis to adjust that policy and to seek more effective channels of implementation in everyday practice is necessary. Democracy in Spain is still not consolidated and is encountering major obstacles and difficulties. The policy of democratic concentration which the party upholds is aimed precisely at creating the favorable conditions for surmounting those difficulties.

[Question] One of the issues raised in this debate on the election results is the lack of unity in the party and the successive crises in the leadership which have reduced the communist election platform's credibility. Do you believe that all these crisis episodes can be regarded as belonging to the past?

[Answer] I believe that they cannot be regarded as surmounted. I wish, hope and trust that the measures which have just been adopted -- this beginning of changes which are starting to be adopted in the party leadership -- mean the end of those successive crises. A thorough examination by the party as a whole is necessary; a lengthy process must be undergone in order to surmount the consequences of the successive crises. The important thing -- and this we can begin to achieve -- is to end that sequence of conflicts by approaching the party's situation with broad and flexible viewpoints and with a determined readiness for dialogue and for ending the real causes of those problems, which I believe are numerous.

[Question] Your appointment and some of the changes which have been announced have aroused some expectation, not only within the Communist Party but in some sectors which have distanced themselves politically from it. Do you believe that communist influence in various social sectors can be revitalized or begin to be revitalized? Do you believe that the Communist Party's image can improve?

[Answer] I wish to make two remarks. In the first place, I am quite confident about the Communist Party's recovery, but I am confident irrespective of who is currently secretary general. Despite the election results, I believe that the PCE is a real force with a strong presence in the trade union movement and in other movements, with a long history and with a lengthy experience.

I believe that the Communist Party has an extremely clear political and social area in this country, especially when other leftwing forces are characterized by a certain aloofness from a clear policy of transformation of social, economic and cultural life. However, I do not believe that Gerardo Iglesias' becoming communist party secretary general represents something like a magic wand for resolving the problems. First, because the problems which the Communist Party has -- which are to some extent a reflection of the problems experienced by the country -- are difficult to resolve and will be resolved in a -- let us hope -- not very lengthy process, but a process when all is said and done. Something else must be borne in mind. I become secretary general replacing Santiago Carrillo, but not because the policy which he was upholding and to which he contributed decisively is being questioned, because in general, that policy is still accepted as valid. What was under discussion above all was working methods and the obstacles to making headway in the social movements and making headway in general in political life. In an initial stage of the transition the PCE had a very strong presence, far beyond its parliamentary representation, and that presence did indeed diminish, and that gave rise to a number of anxieties, of problems, without disregarding mistakes and shortcomings. I believe that it is necessary to say so, because it is the confirmation of the fact that around the PCE, forces interested in weakening it have operated, and have operated in the direction of heading toward the two-party model.

[Answer] With Santiago Carrillo's replacement, a stage of changes begins in the PCE; changes which could affect personnel and which should involve a profound reflection with regard to the party's entire functioning and the conception and layout of the leadership bodies themselves. All I can promise is to be loyal and to carry out the very spirit of the decisions of the 10th congress and of the last Central Committee meeting, with a full desire for change, with a full desire to discuss and reflect and with the desire to achieve the most agile and lively functioning of the Communist Party bodies as a whole. It would be a false expectation to believe that problems which arise in a very complex, not only national, political situation will be surmounted overnight by the mere replacement of the PCE secretary general, when I also feel the need to acknowledge publicly that the change of secretary general may have been necessary, but, of course, on no account because the new secretary general has better qualifications, ability and experience than the outgoing secretary general.

[Question] There is currently a controversy in Madrid which has become known to the news media: It is whether the PCE should or should not hold a special congress.

[Answer] I must assume that those who are demanding a special congress and those of us who believe that the congress should be held in due course agree on one thing, and that it that from various stances we are really seeking the party's recovery. If that is so, and I believe that it is so, it seems to me that the fundamental problem is not whether the congress should be held within 6 months or within a year. The first problem that should be considered is: A congress for what purpose? The congress -- all congresses -- must be set very specific aims. If a congress is never a formality, in this situation the congress assumes extraordinary importance, because there is a very complex political framework, with very radical changes in the political context, such as the change stemming from the very outcome of the election, and because the party is experiencing a whole set of problems and difficulties. The first thing that must be considered is: What fundamental aim must be sought at the next PCE congress? The answer is the surmounting of all those problems which the PCE is experiencing, and especially the finding of answers to problems with regard to a greater involvement in social and political life.

If we did not seek that aim, the congress could be a very heavy blow for the PCE. If we held a congress at which the major outstanding problems were not resolved, I believe that it would be bad for everybody. The Central Committee resolution itself, bearing in mind that the congress is statutorily scheduled for mid-1984 -- which is not such a distant date, either -- speaks in its documents of bringing forward the date of the 11th congress. I believe that that congress requires meticulous preparation. We cannot hold it with improvised formulations, springing solely from the creative effort of a team of leaders. I believe that because of the nature of the problems which we must face in the party and in society, the proposals taken to the next congress, whenever it is, must be made by means of a vast process of reflection and analysis concerning many problems. The congress must not be viewed as the place where we are going to change and alter a number of things but as the culmination of changes in the party, as the culmination of a process. In practice we are already preparing for the next congress, because the changes have already begun, and we will be holding the national conference. We are entering into a process of reflection, not only in the leadership bodies but throughout the party.

GOVERNMENT TO BUY 10 USSR ELECTRIC LOCOMOTIVES

[Unattributed report: "Ten Electric Locomotives Ordered From Soviet Union"]

[Excerpt] On Wednesday [1 December] the Board of Finnish State Railways was granted the authority to order 10 new electric locomotives from the Soviet Union worth a total of 73 million markkaa. The locomotives, which are of the SR1 class, will be delivered in 1983-4. The government agreed on the locomotive purchase during its budget discussions earlier this fall and a preliminary allocation of 8.3 million markkaa was made in this year's third additional budget.

Next year, four locomotives will be delivered and the remainder will follow in 1984. In the past, Finland has purchased a total of 100 Soviet locomotives. The locomotives which have been ordered are, to a certain extent, made in Finland. Companies such as Stromberg and Siemens supply various electrical equipment for the locomotives.

PLO WILL NOT RECEIVE FULL DIPLOMATIC MISSION

PM081641 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 3 Dec 82 p 15

[Unattributed report: "No Political Office for the PLO"]

[Text] The PLO's attempt to set up a political office in Helsinki has failed. The organization will be allowed to found an information bureau like the one in Stockholm, but nothing more.

PLO representative Fu'ad Bitar had hoped to be allowed to start a political office with a higher status than an information bureau. Bitar had already declared in public that the PLO and the Finnish Foreign Ministry had "as good as" reached agreement on such an office, but Finnish spokesmen are adhering to their old stance that the PLO may only open a bureau with the same status as the one in Stockholm.

In practice, the PLO has been in a position to do so for several years, but has not made use of the right. In other words, it is uncertain whether the PLO will bother to found a bureau in Helsinki.

In the past, PLO representatives in Stockholm have indicated that an information bureau is of no interest to the organization since it already has one in Stockholm.

Yesterday, Finnish Foreign Minister Par Stenback said that Finland cannot make an exception for the PLO, since the organization is not unique. The Polisario and OAU, for example, are in exactly the same situation as the PLO.

According to Foreign Ministry Departmental Chief Richard Mueller, the PLO representative understood the Finnish position of not granting diplomatic status, once Finnish representatives had explained Finnish legislation on the point. The reason why PLO representatives cannot be granted diplomatic immunity in Finland is that Finland only recognizes states, and not organizations.

Fu'ad Bitar had sought a model which would have made it possible for the PLO to maintain direct contact with the ministries and the government. The status which the organization will now have in Finland makes this impossible and the PLO will only have a right to unofficial contacts with these circles.

Nor will the PLO be able to call its bureau diplomatic or political. Foreign Minister Stenback stressed yesterday that both sides will have to agree on what the bureau will be called if it is set up.

There has been specualtion that the PLO will formally accept the Foreign Ministry's view, but will later display [skytta med] a higher status than the organization has actually achieved.

Finland, however, is careful to point out that the decision, which is naturally a disappointment for the PLO, is not directed against the PLO itself. The foreign minister again stressed yesterday that the PLO is the foremost representative of the Palestinian people.

Stenback also considers that the PLO has made significant political gains from the events of this fall and that the party is now politically stronger than before.

PLO representative Fu'ad Bitar, who talked with the foreign minister yesterday for half an hour before holding talks with Foreign Ministry officials, promised to inform his superiors in the organization on the Finnish position. In other words, the PLO has not turned down any information bureau, but experts think it highly unlikely that the organization will accept the conditions laid down.

Fu'ad Bitar, who at present is acting chief of the PLO's bureau in Cyprus, would probably have headed the bureau in Helsinki.

NORWAY

PAPER BACKS GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ARMS TALKS

PM071509 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 27 Nov 82 p 2

[Editorial: "Steady Course With Stray"]

[Text] Many people have asked whether there is any alternative to the NATO dual decision if the objective actually is to achieve results in the negotiations with the Soviet Union on nuclear arms reductions in Europe. Is there any point at all in negotiating with the Soviet superpower if the West abandons the only card it has?

In the light of the recent debate in Norway, these questions must be raised again and again, and Foreign Minister Svenn Stray did this when he delivered his foreign affairs report to the Storting yesterday. What is the alternative to the negotiating position which was supported by the two previous Labor Party governments and is now being loyally followed by the Willoch government, but which the Labor Party in opposition is no longer willing to recognize? As expected, the foreign minister was only able to note that there are still no concrete indications of what such an alternative approach would contain, apart from the fact that some individuals have called for unilateral Western disarmament. For our own part, we are assuming that the downhill slide in the Labor Party has as yet not reached the stage where a compliant and conciliatory approach has become the party's official policy.

The most important objective of the NATO dual decision is to achieve negotiated results which make the deployment of new Western nuclear missiles unnecessary.

The decision to complete the preparations for possible future deployment of modernized medium-range nuclear missiles is a clear signal to the Soviet Union that if they are not prepared to reduce their superior nuclear forces, there must be no doubt that NATO will implement measures which are aimed at reestablishing a balance. In his report yesterday, Foreign Minister Stray said that the preparatory work which NATO wants to carry out is absolutely essential to demonstrate to the Soviet Union that the country is facing a choice: Either an agreement, or the completion of the NATO modernization program. As a result, preparatory construction work will help to strengthen the Western negotiating position in Geneva. If this is weakened to any great extent, the negotiators might as well go home, Stray declared, and we are in wholehearted agreement with him. Like the foreign minister, we also want to stress that we intend to act so that it will not even appear correct to claim that we have helped to bring about such unfortunate developments. We can only express our regret that the Labor Party has not taken a similar view.

In connection with the UN vote on the proposal for so-called freeze on nuclear arms, the foreign minister found himself forced to delineate the government's chief objective -- the achievement of reductions in the numbers of nuclear arms. For Western European nations a freeze today would mean that Soviet medium-range missile superiority in our part of the world would remain intact. Thus, a freeze would only serve one side in the negotiations on nuclear arms in Europe -- the Soviet Union's. We are quite convinced that the majority of Norwegians will agree with the foreign minister when he states that our efforts must be concentrated on achieving significant reductions of the existing nuclear arms stockpiles.

Foreign Minister Stray also took the opportunity to reject all the recent accusations from the Labor Party that the government is keeping a high profile on foreign and security questions and that it attaches greater importance to deterrent measures than to detente and disarmament. What the government is really doing is to pursue the main elements of the policy about which there was broad agreement in the past and for which the Labor Party has also been a guarantor, at least when the party itself was in power. And we also hope that every one noted the foreign minister's reminder that in the course of the last year, the Norwegian foreign service has carried out arms limitation and disarmament activities which are unsurpassed by any previous period.

ARBEIDERBLADET VIEWS DISARMAMENT PROSPECTS

PM071457 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 27 Nov 82 p 4

[Editorial: "The Desire for Disarmament"]

[Text] In his report to the Storting on Friday [26 November], Foreign Minister Svenn Stray said that we should not adopt a stance that would significantly weaken the Western nations' negotiating position in Geneva. We can agree with this. But we must also demand that the United States tackle the negotiations in such a way that we are made to believe that the United States really wants to achieve a result.

Hitherto, the two superpowers have shown little desire to move. During U.S. visits earlier this year, West European statesmen like Helmut Schmidt and Willy Brandt criticized the United States for having an insufficient desire for negotiations.

The United States has failed to convince us that the country's main objective is to avert deployment of new missiles like the cruise and Pershing II.

On the contrary, military sources have often said that these weapons are totally necessary to the defense strategy which the United States and NATO have worked out for Western Europe.

In his statement to the Storting, Sven Stray made it seem as if the Soviet Union has acquired a solid military superiority and that the trend, if it is allowed to continue, would be the same as recognizing the Soviet Union as the leading power in Europe. This account is completely in line with the Reagan administration's fearful vision -- but it simple does not accord with the facts.

Independent institutions like the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute and the Institute for Strategic Studies in London both agree that the power blocs are more or less equal in strength and that at present neither is in a position to defeat the other. It is also clear that at present, both blocs have enough atom bombs to wipe each other out tens of times over. In such a context, the counting of the number of missiles in a given geographical area is of minor importance.

If a result is to be reached in Geneva, both sides must be prepared to make concessions. If the number of nuclear arms in Europe is to be reduced, it will have to be admitted that the West's demands, which Stray defended in his report, are unrealistic.

It will never be possible to get the Soviet Union to agree to remove all its medium-range missiles, both the old SS-4's and SS-5's and the more modern SS-20's, while the West's nuclear arsenal was maintained at the present level. If such a position were adhered to it would be the same as saying that the cruise and Pershing missiles will be deployed.

The Soviet Union has based an important part of its defenses on land-based missiles, while the West has a larger proportion of its nuclear arms on aircraft and on ships. In such a situation it is unrealistic to expect the Soviet Union to remove all its land-based missiles, while the West's forces in the air and at sea are maintained. The demand becomes even more unrealistic when the West insists at the same time on excluding British and French nuclear missiles from the discussions.

The Soviet Union's demands are just as unrealistic.

It goes without saying that the West cannot accept that all the SS-20s already deployed should remain in place or simply be withdrawn beyond the Urals. It is just as difficult to accept that Soviet aircraft should not be counted when the military balance sums are completed.

Up to now, the world has based its disarmament negotiations on a continuous strength buildup -- no matter how reversed this may sound. Up to now, all new weapons have been defended with the suggestion that they are intended to force the opponent to negotiate. And we have to concede that it is the United States which has set the pace in this death race.

But the Soviet Union is just as unwilling to accept Western technological superiority in the arms field as the West is to accept Soviet superiority. New missiles like the cruise, the Pershing II and the MX are all weapons which the Soviet Union will also want to have, if the West deploys them. And it is an illusion to think that the Kremlin will not be able to squeeze out the money needed to finance such an arms program.

Rearmament to bring about disarmament has gone wrong time after time. The negotiations in Geneva are in progress and must be brought to a successful conclusion. Hopefully, both sides will be able to make enough concessions to succeed in reaching an agreement. But such an agreement will only cover medium-range nuclear arms deployed in Europe. If we are to break the deadly circle which has given the world ever more sophisticated nuclear arms, we cannot do without an agreement on a freeze -- and on negotiations which are based on such a foundation.

GOVERNMENT PROPOSES NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE IN EUROPE

LD081806 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Excerpt] We begin the government's proposal for a nuclear-free zone in Europe. This afternoon we received confirmation that the government has agreed on the initiative. The proposal concerns a 150 kilometer zone on both sides of the borders of the power blocs. This proposal is based on an idea presented by the international Palme commission last summer. Here is a report: The Swedish Government today has contacted through diplomatic channels all countries belonging to NATO and the Warsaw Pact and all neutral and nonaligned countries in Europe and presented its proposal. The nuclear-free zone would run along the border of the power blocs in Central Europe and cover a zone of 150 kilometers on both sides. According to the proposal, no nuclear weapons would be allowed in this zone. In the opinion of the Swedish Government, the effect of such a zone would be to strengthen detente and to improve trust between the military blocs. But the proposal has not yet been worked out in detail and it is described like this by Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom: [Begin recording] This is only a sounding out of views concerning the idea in broad outline. We shall then see what the response is like and whether there are preconditions for further steps.

Paper on Nuclear-Free Concept

PM071431 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 23 Nov 82 p 2

[Olof Santesson editorial: "The Zone and the Baltic"]

[Text] As far as the question of a Nordic nuclear-free zone is concerned, one is tempted to say, "no explanations, they only make things worse!" even if things do get worse, we must of course talk about these things.

The Social Democrats and the nonsocialists have, on the whole, avoided disagreement over the nuclear-free zone and spoken of it in a "European context." The Riksdag Foreign Affairs Committee has always been unanimous in its annual recommendations. This unity has also stretched to the demand that the Baltic should be nuclear-free. "All nuclear-armed vessels out of the Baltic!" Olof Palme said after the submarine affair. To which [former Prime Minister[Falldin added that he has also spoken of "the necessity of keeping the Baltic free from nuclear arms."

Now, since the Social Democrats' return to government power, this general agreement on disarmament and nuclear-free status seems to be more difficult to maintain. In a long debate on Monday [22 November] representatives of the Moderate Coalition Party complained that in its government declaration for the first time a Swedish Government had called both for undertakings renouncing the first use of nuclear arms and for a temporary ban on the further development, production, stockpiling and deployment of nuclear arms: Both demands were seen as direct calls to NATO.

But it cannot be denied that they are in line, with past Swedish disarmament endeavors.

Questioning the blessings of nuclear deterrence and the Palme commission calling instead for "joint security" as a basis for detente are hardly very controversial stances. But there is every reason to raise eyebrows at the government's official zone arguments, extrapolated from a somewhat confusing series of statements.

Suddenly it has merely become "desirable" that the Baltic should be nuclear-free, that nuclear-armed submarines at most "should" leave the area, that the Baltic only "should" be covered by zone arrangements. It seems as if the government wanted to get to work on a zone without locking itself in advance into demands for "concessions" primarily from the Soviet Union. But surely without these a large part of the point of a zone is lost?

Foreign Minister Bodstrom himself said that Soviet concessions should be demanded in return for NATO renunciation of its so-called nuclear option "if a nuclear-free zone can be established in the Nordic area and Norway and Denmark join it." His choice of words is strange. They point to the possibility of Norwegian-Danish membership of an already established zone.

However, one thing should be clear -- the Palme government does not want to start a zone with Finland and Sweden alone!

SOVIET MEAT BANNED TO PREVENT IMPORTING DISEASE

PM071433 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 7 Dec 82 p 5

[Unnamed "Own correspondent" dispatch: "Sweden Bans Soviet Meat Imports"]

[Text] All meat imports from Russia have been banned by Sweden after reports that a serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease has affected cattle, reindeer, and elk herds in the Soviet Baltic republics of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. The Swedish ban follows a similar measure in Finland last week. There is no official confirmation of the outbreak from Soviet authorities, but Swedish and Finnish spokesmen say there have been at least six major confirmed outbreaks in Estonia with two other suspected cases. The spokesmen were unable, however, to shed light on reports in Helsinki that mass vaccination of cattle herds had begun in the three Baltic states.

SVENSKA DAGBLADET WELCOMES NEW DEFENSE MINISTER

[Editorial: "The Defense Minister"]

[Text] "For purely personal reasons." These are Social Democratic Defense Minister Borje Andersson's own words outlining the reason for his resignation from the government after such a short spell in office. He has a right to be taken at his word. During his short period as Defense Minister Borje Andersson has demonstrated that he possesses the ability to gain an understanding of very complicated questions swiftly — the unparalleled Harsfjarden submarine intrusion was going on at the time of his appointment to the Defense Ministry. During the recent work on next year's budget he has succeeded in satisfying Sweden's defense requirements under what are difficult conditions for state finances.

By winning the government's support for modest savings proposals spread over several years, Borje Andersson has laid the foundation for the work of all the defense forces -- a foundation which could be said to have been absent despite the spring Riksdag session's decision on defense spending. The change of government meant that defense spending like that in other fields could have been subjected to new and less sympathetic scrutiny -- because each Riksdag has total control over budget questions.

Borje Andersson, the minister, has been a man of few words. There is nothing wrong with that -- we have seen far too many examples of the opposite in the new Palme government. No one can accuse Borje Andersson of in any way spreading uncertainty about our defense and security policy endeavors. The fact that like other earlier defense ministers he has been forced, in SVENSKA DAGBLADET's view -- taking into consideration the major increase in international tension in the last few years, which has led to a tangible increase in the superpowers' interest in northern Europe as an area of military importance -- to work from a defense spending framework which is way too low is beside the point.

Sweden's new defense minister will be UN Ambassador Anders Thunborg, who will take office in January when "acting" Defense Minister Curt Bostrom will return to being full-time communications minister. Olof Palme is to be congratulated on the choice of Thunborg and for the fact that Thunborg this time -- having turned down an opportunity to become some kind of minister in the Trade Ministry, which has not yet been dissolved, or was it some highly qualified assistant at ministerial level in the Foreign Ministry -- placed himself at the government's disposal as defense minister.

What the government could be losing in the way of a popular base through Borje Andersson's resignation is being compensated for, it could be said, by Thunborg's considerable experience of the real facts of defense and foreign policy. Thunborg not only has his years at the United Nations to fall back on. He has also been engaged in high-level work on security questions of significance for Sweden's freedom and defense at both the defense and foreign ministries.

Judging by the many statements emanating recently from various government members on the government's foreign policy -- some statements have of course been retracted; others, it has been claimed, were never made; and yet others were based on misunderstandings, with the odd statement being correct -- the Palme government greatly needs a security policy spokesman firmly rooted in the real world which Sweden inhabits.

Thunborg fulfills all the requirements for such a spokesman. The future will show whether he will be able to convince the government's other members of what Sweden's defense needs are in order for its defense policy to seem credible. For the sake of Sweden's freedom, we must hope that Thunborg will succeed with this goal as new ministry head.

SINDERMANN, DELEGATION MEET WITH BRITISH MP'S

[Text] London, 8 Dec (ADN) -- The parliamentary delegation under the leadership of People's Chamber President Horst Sindermann, member of the Politburo of the SED Central Committee, had talks on Wednesday in the British Parliament with MP's from the ruling Conservative Party and from the Labour Party. Horst Sindermann also had meetings with the leader of the Commons, Cabinet member John Biffen, and with the chairman of Imperial Chemical Industries, John Harvey-Jones.

The People's Chamber president and the Parliamentary under secretary of state at the Foreign Office, Malcolm Rifkind, spoke at a dinner in favor of the continuation of the political dialogue between the GDR and Great Britain. At the beginning of talks between the parliamentarians from both countries, the chairman of the British group of the Interparliamentary Union, the Conservative MP Peter Temple-Morris, described the visit of the GDR parliamentarians as useful for international detente. Such meetings could contribute "to creating a climate of trust and thus contribute to an improvement of East-West relations." The British MP spoke in support of continuing the Madrid dialogue. "That also includes the work of the preparation of an all-European disarmament conference." In spite of all the difficulties that were involved in this, it was essential to work toward further progress. In this connection he referred to the significance of the Geneva disarmament talks.

Horst Sindermann informed the British MP's present about the structure and methods of the people's representation of the GDR and explained the activities of the parliamentary parties and committees in the realization of the economic and social goals. Following this came an exchange of thoughts between the British MP's and People's Chamber Deputies Werner Kirchhoff, Klara Rose, Gerhard Lindner, Prof Karl-Heinz Hengst, and GDR Ambassador Martin Bierbach.

After the discussion in the British Parliament the head of the GDR delegation paid a visit to the leader of the Commons, Cabinet member John Biffen. The People's Chamber deputies were then guests at a dinner given by Malcolm Rifkind on behalf of the government. Rifkind described such visits as important in order to overcome mistrust and prejudices. In spite of differing standpoints and opinions, there was much common ground. Therefore, it did not only benefit the state and economy, but also both peoples, if the dialogue was cultivated in the interests of understanding and peace as well as the development of bilateral relations. In his reply, Horst Sindermann agreed with these thoughts and noted that the current visit to Great Britain pursued precisely this aim. The GDR supported cooperation which was based on equal rights and was fruitful and regarded highly the responsible work of parliamentarians.

During a meeting with Imperial Chemicals Chairman John Harvey-Jones, Horst Sindermann made it clear that the GDR saw in the development of economic relations a decisive factor in the promotion of detente. For many years there have been connections with this firm in the scientific and technical field, which it had happily been possible to expand in recent years. The GDR was interested in economic cooperation with Great Britain and large British concerns.

Sindermann Meets CP Leader

LD090432 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1852 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Text] London, 8 Dec (ADN) -- Horst Sindermann, member of the Politburo of the SED Central Committee and president of the GDR People's Chamber, had a friendly meeting in London today with the general secretary of the Communist Party of Great Britain, Gordon McLennan, during which he conveyed cordial greetings from the general secretary of the SED Central Committee, Erich Honecker. The SED, Horst Sindermann stressed, regarded the further expansion and deepening of the traditional; fraternal cooperation between the two parties as an important contribution to the safeguarding of peace and in the struggle for social progress.

The representatives of the two parties stressed the responsibility of communists, especially in the present dangerous international situation, to put a stop to the confrontation and arms drive policy of the most aggressive circles of imperialism, especially of the United States, and to achieve measures for arms limitation and disarmament.

Horst Sindermann and Gordon McLennan stated that 1983, the Karl Marx year, was particularly important for relations between the SED and the Communist Party of Great Britain. The work of the German revolutionary and theoretician was linked most closely with the German and British working class.

KLIRIDHIS REITERATES ALIGNMENT WITH GREEK POLICY

NC091018 Nicosia ALITHIA in Greek 9 Dec 82 p 10

[Text] Referring to yesterday's government statement with which it tried to bypass the adverse repercussions that Greek Prime Minister Papandreou's recent statement to the EEC had on it and to shake off his censure motion on the way the intercommunal talks are being held, presidential candidate Glavkos Kliridhis has stated the following:

If any criticism on the terms and form with which the talks are being held has been made, it came from Greek Prime Minister Papandreou and was fully adopted by the opposition, despite the fact that we pointed out long ago that the talks are unproductive. Mr Papandreou, among other things, indicated:

1. That as the dialogue is being continued in the presence of Turkish troops, it is substantively being carried out with Ankara, and thus it cannot be productive. Consequently, he proposed an increase in the UN peace force funded by Greece so that a substantive dialogue will begin between the two communities after the withdrawal of the Turkish troops.

2. That the interlocutors are occupying themselves with secondary issues instead of substantive issues, among which are the three basic freedoms (free movement, free settlement and respect of property).

We have been forced to explain some of the Greek Government's position because it appears that the partnership government either does not understand or pretends not to understand them -- something tantamount to the president's renowned observation: "We did not realize that Mr Papandreou was being insulted."

Regarding the question as to what the Democratic Rally wants, and in order to make the government of partnership understand once again, we repeat: the Cyprus Government's policy should be identical with that of the Greek Government. We believe that this is simple and brief enough for the Kiprianou government to understand.

BRITISH OFFICIAL INVITED TO VISIT NORTH

TA081203 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Text] The spokesman for the Turkish Cypriot Foreign Ministry has invited the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, Mr (Gerald Oppenheimer), who is on a visit to southern Cyprus, to visit the north as well. In a written statement today, the spokesman said that for the sake of equality and impartiality, Mr (Oppenheimer) should also visit the north and see the facts on the spot. He said he wanted to remind Mr (Oppenheimer) that there are two separate people, two separate zones and two separate administrations in the island. If Mr (Oppenheimer's) visit is, as announced in the press, a fact-finding mission, it is evident that the aim will not be achieved if he only visits the south and has talks only with the Greek Cypriot leadership.

The spokesman added that the two sides of the Cyprus problem have to be studied to arrive at a proper and impartial opinion and it is essential that contacts also be held with leaders of the Turkish Cypriot people representing one of the cofounders of the Cyprus Republic.

KHARALAMBOPOULOS COMMENTS AFTER MEETING SHULTZ

[Excerpts] U.S. Secretary of State Shultz arrived in Brussels today to attend the NATO foreign ministers conference. He met with Greek Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos, with whom he discussed various matters of joint interest.

I hope, Kharalambopoulos told press representatives, that all these discussions which the prime minister and I are conducting, presenting the Greek arguments, will, step by step, change the climate from a disinterested or negative climate into a positive one.

PAPANDREOU, TEREBILOV COMMENT AFTER MEETING

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou was visited at noon today at Kastri by the CPSU delegation that is visiting our country under Soviet Justice Minister and member of the CPSU CC Terebilov. The meeting was attended by Greek Public Works Minister Athanasios Tsokhatzopoulos on behalf of PASOK's Executive Bureau, and Soviet Ambassador to Athens Kaboshkin.

Following the meeting, the prime minister stated, among other things, that he had the opportunity to review the international situation in regard to the prospects for peace and detente as well as the dangers created by increased nuclear armaments, particularly in Europe. The prime minister also said he had the opportunity to exchange views with the Soviet delegation on bilateral relations, which both sides want to strengthen. The arrival in Athens of Soviet Premier Tikhonov will greatly contribute toward this end.

On his part, Terebilov stressed that the Soviet side now has a fuller picture of the policy being pursued by PASOK and the Greek Government. He expressed the conviction that personal contacts between the two heads of government will positively contribute toward the solution of the complex international problems in the interest of peace.

According to reports from news agencies and diplomatic circles in Athens, Tikhonov's visit to Athens will take place during the first 2 months of 1983.

AKROPOLIS REPORTS REVIVAL OF TERRORIST THREAT

NC081720 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 8 Dec 82 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] Political and economic personalities in the country are being threatened by terrorist groups.

At the same time, foreign diplomatic missions and representatives have expressed strong fears over attacks against them by Greek and foreign terrorists.

This was revealed in a series of answers Public Order Minister Skoularikis gave to reporters yesterday concerning the "Kifisia battle" [a recent shootout between police and thieves] and the report that the justice minister has requested a 100-man police force to reinforce prison guards.

The minister stated that there are 761 "targets" in the Attiki Basin which are being guarded by a considerable police force.

In answer to a question on whether the dangers are specific and obvious, Skoularikis replied that "the dangers are probable." He added that many personalities and foreign diplomats have applied for police protection.

Terrorist activities have resumed lately, and associated reports indicate that terrorist groups are being armed for unknown intentions. This, together with the fact that it is now December, when the "17 November" organization -- which has murdered four policemen and the CIA station chief Wells — usually acts, has particularly concerned the police.

When asked yesterday about the personalities being threatened, Public Order Minister Skoularikis stated that "these personalities have played an important role in the country's political affairs." He did not want to elaborate on the issue. However, he clarified that a considerable police force is being used to guard them. He further stated that 242 men are being used to guard the embassies and these political personalities, 147 men to guard the Chamber of Deputies and 700 men for outside prisons. [figures as printed]

FOILED BOMB ATTACK ON KUWAIT AIR OFFICE 8 DEC

[Text] One of the two young Arabs held by the Athens general security for the bomb attack against the offices of Kuwait Air on Amalias Avenue early this morning refuses to talk to security officers. The detainee said that he is Armenian and that he has Iranian nationality but this is doubted by the police offers. The second young Arab, whose identity is also unknown, was seriously injured in the head and chest by shrapnel and is being treated at Evangelismos Hospital. His condition is critical.

Officers of the Athens general security believe that the two Arabs are the culprits in the bomb attack. They were riding a motorbike when they threw the bomb at the airline office. However, the bomb hit an electricity pole and exploded, seriously injuring one of them. They were then arrested by police.

Further Details

[Text] The foreigner who was critically injured by the bomb that went off in front of the offices of Kuwait Airlines on Amalias Avenue at 0330 died of his injuries. His identity is still not certain. His collaborator, according to the police, is (Vaheh Kontaverdian) 21, from Isfahan. Iran. He temporarily resided in Athens at 28 (Renee Piau) in Neos Kosmos.

During interrogation, (Kontaverdian) claimed that his collaborator, who died at Evangelismos Hospital, was named (Sako) and that he does not know any other particulars.

He said (Sako) instigated him to throw a bomb at the offices of the Saudi airlines, but that they made a mistake and threw the bomb at the Kuwait airlines office instead. The matter is being investigated by Athens general security.

LABOR, PARTIES REACT TO GOVERNMENT INCOME POLICY

[Text] The Executive Committee of the Greek General Confederation of Labor, GSEE, will hold a special meeting on Friday to examine the entire issue of the income policy announced by National Economy Minister Yerasimos Arsenis. In a statement it released today, the GSEE stressed its opposition to the policy, stating that it will examine the legal status of automatic readjustment based on the cost-of-living index. The GSEE Administrative Committee will meet at the end of December to be briefed and make decisions on negotiations on the new national collective labor agreement, the government income policy and the increasing unemployment. In its statement today, the GSEE announced that it insists on its demands as submitted to employment agencies and that in this light it will continue negotiations at the next meeting on Saturday.

New Democracy has accused the government of not having an economic policy. As argued by New Democracy, if the income policy is implemented, the workers will lose at least 10 percent of their true income within a year. Such a cut, the statement said, will not only fail to achieve any improvement in the economy, but on the contrary, will result in the collapse of demand, productivity, employment, economic activity and budget revenues.

The press bureau of the KKE Central Committee has issued a statement stressing: the government's 1983 income policy not only fails to correct the losses suffered by workers as a result of inflation last year, but cuts into the workers incomes for 1983, in advance by at least 15 percent, in addition to the other losses they will suffer as a result of the new increase in the cost-of-living index. In addition, the government has also limited the mutilated automatic readjustment based on the cost-of-living index, which it implemented, and is thus limiting popular consumerism. No expediency, neither the economic crisis nor the problem of the competitiveness of the Greek economy, nor even unemployment can justify this drop in the workers' standard of living.

Ioannis Zigdhis, chairman of the Democratic Center Union, EDIK, said that this means a freeze in wages, salaries and pensions and that the government could have prevented the workers' disappointment had it informed public opinion beforehand about the harsh economic reality. Zigdhis asked the government to implement its policy with as much flexibility as possible in order to improve working conditions so that the battle against unemployment can be waged and the revival of the economy achieved.

The government spokesman has stated that the income policy is aimed at strengthening institutional changes. In reply to questions from the press, he added that 1983 will be a very difficult year for all countries, both in the West and the East. Millions of workers in the West are threatened by the specter of unemployment. Unemployment in the EEC countries has reached 11.5 million, and there is a dramatic forecast it will go over 20 million this winter. The income policy chosen by the government, Maroudhas emphasized, is the only one which can:

1. Limit unemployment in our country and create prerequisites for new jobs. In any other eventuality, we run the danger of an unemployment explosion which could reach 30 percent.

2. Strengthen the economic achievements of 1982, such as the control of inflation, which resulted in strengthening the income policy of 1982. This was a truly generous policy for low-income people as well as a redistributionist policy due to the basic increases given to the low wage earners.

Over and beyond all this, the government spokesman added, the government, as announced by the national economy minister, has resolved to make up any possible losses the workers may suffer in 1983 by 1984. In conclusion, Maroudhas stressed that the income policy strengthens our fatherland's progress toward change and strengthens the institutional changes which our people have waited for for so many decades.

FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS SHULTZ IN BRUSSELS

Turkmen, who is in Brussels to attend the NATO Ministerial Council's winter meetings, met with NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns this morning. In the afternoon, Turkmen met with the foreign affairs aide of the EEC Commission chairman, (Wilhelm Hapfercamp). Selma Berksoy and Bulent Alioglu from the Turkish radio and television news center report that during their meeting, Luns and Turkmen made a general assessment of the NATO defense ministers meeting last week. They also dwelt on the issue of solidarity within the alliance.

After his hour long meeting with (Hapfercamp), Turkmen said that they discussed the economic and political aspects of Turkish-EEC relations. Turkmen added that the Community should decide whether or not it will continue its current approach from the viewpoint of the future of Turkish-EEC relations.

DEFENSE MINISTER'S STATEMENT ON VISIT TO JORDAN

TA090906 Ankara ANATOLIA in Turkish 0855 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 9 Dec (AA) -- National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken made a statement to ANATOLIA on Wednesday before leaving for Jordan as the official guest of Staff Lt Gen ash-Sharif Zayd ibn Shakir, commander in chief of the Jordanian Armed Forces. Bayulken said: Fields of cooperation will be reviewed between Turkey and brotherly Jordan during my talks there. I am convinced that new steps will be taken for the promotion of our relations and defense cooperation to the benefit of both our countries.

In answer to a question by an ANATOLIA correspondent on the sale of Turkish defense equipment to Jordan, Bayulken, who left for Amman in a special 25-passenger aircraft sent by the king of Jordan, said that this subject would also be discussed during his visit and that this was a possibility.

VOTCP BLAMES NATO FOR DEADLOCK IN CYPRUS TALKS

[Text] UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar has asked the Security Council to extend the mandate of the UNFICYP by another 6 months. In his statement, Perez de Cuellar maintains that the necessity for the UN troops in Cyprus is continuing, adding that no constructive results have been reached so far in the intercommunal talks being held in Cyprus, a fact which, he said, reduces the prospects for a negotiated solution between the two parties. As is known, the present mandate of the UN troops in Cyprus ends on 15 December.

As the UN secretary general said, no positive results have been attained so far in the intercommunal talks being conducted in Cyprus for a peaceful solution of the problem. The main reason for this is the undermining by NATO of all initiatives aimed at brotherly coexistence between the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities and the efforts being exerted for the sake of a plan to transform the island into a NATO base.

In fact, what the democratic forces in Turkey, Greece and Cyprus as well as the socialist countries and the world progressive democratic public urge is the solution of the internal problems of Cyprus through intercommunal talks taking into consideration the interests of both communities and the settling of its foreign problems through an international conference under UN auspices.

During talks held in Moscow recently between Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko, the latter reiterated the constructive Soviet stand which envisages the just solution of the Cyprus problem.

ULUSU SUBMITS 1983 BUDGET TO COUNCIL 9 DEC

[Text] The draft fiscal 1983 budget law is being discussed by the National Security Council. The council met at 0930 today under President Kenan Evren to take up the budget bill.

In his introductory statement to the council, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu pointed out that the budget was based on sound income estimates in accordance with the goals of the development program and consistent with government stability measures. Ulusu said that inflationary problems caused by the instability in the balance of supply and demand were solved to a great extent. He added that presently a struggle must be carried out against foreign inflationary factors and problems connected with productivity which negatively affect prices. This situation, Ulusu said made the fight being carried out against inflation more difficult and necessitated the strict implementation of the development program without concessions.

Ulusu continued: The current financial and loan policies in accordance with the investment program as well as the index adjustment policies will be continued in 1983. In line with the careful verification of the flow of currency, a policy of bank interest will be maintained in a way that will encourage savings and avoid the loss of the real value of the money deposited.

Stressing that the government attributed special significance to implementing policy in the social field, the prime minister said that the minimum wage committee was convened earlier than usual.

Ulusu said that the salary coefficient would be regulated in a way that would not allow a real loss in the salaries of the public servants and the retired. Ulusu added: In general, the sectors primarily affected by inflation are the workers and government employees with low and fixed income. It is only natural that in the event the inflation rate continues to escalate, the increases provided to workers' wages and employees' salaries will bring no relief. That is why economic programs planned to fight inflation are most beneficial to these sectors. Our government takes these factors into consideration while determining floor prices for agricultural products or the arrangement of minimum wages for workers and salaries for employees.

Recalling that work continues in connection with the reorganization of the administration and the status connected with it, the prime minister said that this should be concluded no later than May 1983.

Following the presentation of the draft budget law by Ulusu, the council began discussing the articles of the bill. Following its adoption by the council, the budget law will go into effect on 1 Januray 1983.

CETINER ON SHAKEUP IN POLICE FORCE, PROVINCES

NC090919 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 6 Dec 82 pp 1, 14

[Interview granted by Turkish Interior Minister Selahattin Cetiner to TERCUMAN correspondent Yavuz Donat in Ankara -- date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: Do you have any plans? Are you making any contacts? Do you contemplate entering politics?

Answer: Such thoughts are completely out of the question.

Question: Our security organization was polarized prior to 12 September. Policemen had begun to shoot policemen. Have you completely overcome this division?

Answer: We have exerted every possible effort to raise the discipline in our police organization to the desired level. We have not tolerated the guilty and have punished them. We are taking every possible measure to prevent our police organization from returning to the unfortunate pre-12 September circumstances. We are working seriously on this issue. Meanwhile, I wish to give you some figures related to actions taken since 12 September. We have dismissed 31 policemen from state employment; removed 784 policemen from the police organization; terminated the services of 148 policemen in accordance with Law No 1402; and have deprived 522 of them of the right to run for office. We have thus penalized a total of 1,485 policemen.

However, these are not the only punishments we have inflicted. The promotions of 3,285 members of the security organization have been suspended for 24 months. Moreover, the promotions of 6,379 members of the security organization have been suspended for periods ranging from 3 to 18 months.

We have also punished personnel. A total 9,939 policemen have had their salaries reduced; 2,517 policemen have been "admonished;" and 2,041 of them have been "warned." The number of policemen punished is 14,497. Thus, a total of 25,646 policemen have been penalized.

Question: Investigations were also opened soon after 12 September of some governors, deputy governors, commissioners, high-ranking security officers, directors of legal affairs, registrars and municipal council and private enterprise personnel. Could you give us some information about them?

Answer: Certainly. Investigations of 117 governors have been opened. Police reports have been prepared on 28 of them. Fifty-nine of them have been found to be free of blame. Certain investigations are still continuing.

Question: Can you give us the names of these governors?

Answer: I do not wish to provide names. Let me merely say this: Among those governors about whom we carried out investigations, there are some but not many who had retired from service before 12 September. With regard to deputy governors, investigations have been conducted of approximately 20 deputy governors. Police reports have been prepared on 2 of them and 10 of them have been found to be free of blame. Investigations are continuing concerning eight of them.

A total of 945 governors, deputy governors, commissioners, security directors and officers and municipal officials have been subjected to investigations. Some of them have been found innocent. Investigations of 483 of them are continuing.

Question: Have adequate measures been taken against narcotics and arms smuggling? Where does Turkey stand on this important issue? What new measures are necessary?

Answer: There has been some improvement in the organization which deals with this matter. New branches have been opened in some districts and provinces. Some organizational changes have been carried out in the structure of the general security directorate. A new organization has been set up within the Interior Ministry to collect information on smuggling, intelligence and operations.

NEW LEGISLATION FOR CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

[Text] Ankara, 9 Dec (AA) -- "The Constitutional Court is the greatest guarantee of the Constitution. The coming administrations will feel themselves within the Constitution to the extent that we vigorously own up to the Constitution, implementation of which will enable maintenance of peace and calm within the boundaries of the Turkish Republic," President Kenan Evren said during a call he paid Wednesday on the Constitutional Court.

President Evren observed the new alternate member of the Constitutional Court Mithat Ozok taking the oath with a ceremony. Evren was also presented by president of the court, Ahmet Boyaciolu, with a medallion symbolizing the court. Boyazioglu said, in his turn, that preparations were underway to legislate a new law regulating the Constitutional Court in line with the new Constitution.

President Evren also paid calls to the Court of Appeals, Conseil d'Etat, Supreme Elections Supervisory Board, the High Council of Judges and Prosecutors and declared: "The constitutional referendum took place in a very democratic manner in calm and security which bar any kind of objection." He also announced new laws were being elaborated to shift partially the great workload of the Conseil d'Etat.

ARMENIAN PATRIARCH VISITS PRESIDENT EVREN

[Text] Ankara, Dec 8 (AA) -- President Kenan Evren received Tuesday Patriarch Snork Kalustyan, head of the Armenian Orthodox Church based in Istanbul, and told him: "I hope Armenian terrorists will soon give up their attempts, underway since a long time, to massacre Turkish diplomats.

They will give up soon these attempts to which the world public opinion seems to have begun to react in a negative way, and they will realize that such attempts will not bear results. I hope the Armenian terrorists will feel sorry for their deeds seeing that Armenians in Turkey are living in calm and comfort."

Kalustyan congratulated President Evren on his assuming the presidency and said adoption of the new Constitution which reflected the great Turkish nation's common sense was a cause for great joy for the Turkish Armenian community, "who constitute an indivisible part of Turkey."

[Summary] The press and public relations office of the VI Army Corps and Adana, Icel, Kahramanmaras, Gaziantep, Adiyaman and Hatay Martial Law Command has issued a statement saying that 13 militants belonging to the Turkish Communist Party Marxist Leninist partisan organization have been captured as a result of operations conducted by the security forces in Adana. The suspects have been involved in murder, bombing, assault and other terrorist activities.

TERRORIST RESENTENCED TO DEATH FOLLOWING APPEAL

TA081729 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 8 Dec 82

[Text] The Aegean Army and Martial Law Command First Military Court has again condemned to death Atalay Celikoglu, accused of killing two persons for ideological reasons. Celikoglu had shot to death Cetin Aksu and Mehmet Ali Sarica in Manisa's Saruhanli District in 1980. He was condemned to death by the same military court for having committed these murders. However, the Military Court of Appeals annulled the death sentence. During its hearing today, the Aegean Army and Martial Law Command First Military Court insisted on its initial decision, and recondemned the suspect to death. The same court sentenced Ahmet Nagar to 7 years and 6 months in prison for selling arms in Izmir's Torbali District.

BRIEFS

AGRICULTURE MINISTRY UNDER SECRETARY — Agriculture and Forestry Ministry Under Secretary Osman Tekinel returned to Ankara today after attending the OECD agricultural committee meetings in Paris. In a statement to the Turkish radio and television, Tekinel said that the agricultural trade of the countries which were members of the OECD was going through a difficult stage due to general economic conditions such as inflation, interest rates and foreign exchange rates. He said that in a report he submitted to the meeting, he pointed out that Turkey was pursuing a consistent agricultural policy, and that international solidarity and cooperation were necessary in that field. OPPOSITION SEEKS NUCLEAR FREEZE ABSTENTION

PM081431 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 3 Dec 82 p 3

[Unnamed "Own correspondent's" report: "Opposition Wants To Prevent Netherlands 'No' at United Nations"]

[Excerpt] The Hague, 3 Dec -- Yesterday the Labor Party and Democrats '66 tabled motions in the Second Chamber calling on the government not to vote against the UN resolution for a nuclear arsenal freeze again.

If either of these motions is to be passed when voting takes place next Tuesday [7 December], between 10 and 15 Christian Democratic Appeal deputies will need to vote with the opposition. Although there are major differences of opinion within the parliamentary group and internal consultations are continuing it seemed unlikely yesterday that either motion would receive sufficient support.

The resolution will be put to the vote in the UN General Assembly next Wednesday. In the recent vote on the resolution in the so-called first committee, the Netherlands voted against it.

Foreign Minister Van den Broek stressed the desirability of the Netherlands' continuing to vote against, the view he had defended the previous day at a meeting of the Second Chamber Permanent Foreign Affairs Committee. He takes the view that a stance other than a "no vote" cannot be reconciled with the Netherlands' attitude toward the Geneva talks between the United States and the Soviet Union on European medium-range nuclear arms limitation.

However, Van den Broek repeated that the Netherlands UN delegation will issue a statement expressing great concern at the continuing arms race when it votes against the resolution.

The Second Chamber opposition has no illusions that the government will vote for the freeze resolution, as leftwing parties desire. However, they hope that the cabinet can be persuaded to abstain. A number of members of the Christian Democratic Appeal Second Chamber group do not accept the idea that an abstention would compromise the Netherlands position on the negotiations in Geneva.

PAPER SEES POSSIBLE DIVISION OVER FREEZE VOTE

PM091151 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 3 Dec 82 p 7

[Editorial: "The First Tiny Crack"]

[Text] In the government accord which forms the foundation for the Lubbers government's program, the so-called NATO dual decision of December 1979 -- the modernization of medium-range nuclear arms in conjunction with a simultaneous offer to the Soviet Union of negotiations on such arms -- is accepted as "a fact." The government accord calls the success of these negotiations, which in the meantime have begun in Geneva, "a central objective."

The West's opening gambit in the negotiations is the so-called zero option, that is, no deployment of new NATO nuclear arms such as the cruise missile and the Pershing II in Western Europe on the condition that the Soviet Union begins to dismantle its (existing) systems such as the SS-4, SS-5 and SS-20. In March of this year, Moscow announced a unilateral freeze on Russian medium-range nuclear potential. However, this has not stopped the continuing deployment of SS-20 installations since then at the rate of one a week, now totaling 324 installations, each with 3 warheads.

In this light it is hardly surprising that Foreign Minister Van den Broek is disinclined to show much sympathy toward requests from the parliamentary opposition in the Second Chamber that the Netherlands change its vote -- to one that is not negative -- on the Swedish-Mexican resolution which calls on Moscow and Washington to implement an immediate total freeze on their nuclear arsenals.

This is an important request because in the UN First Committee last week, the Netherlands voted against the resolution, along with the majority of its NATO partners (exceptions: Iceland, Denmark and Greece. If the 1979 NATO dual decision was a reaction to a growing imbalance -- which has since increased even further -- in the field of medium-range weapons, an imbalance which the The Hague would like to see disappear through negotiations, support for such a freeze proposal in this area that is so important to Europe would conflict with both the government accord and logic. For the opposition, and especially for the Labor Party [Pvda], at whose request a debate was held yesterday in the Second Chamber on the Netherlands vote, the issue is a different one. The party has always been opposed to nuclear arms modernization, even if the decision for such modernization must of necessity be important as pressure on the Soviet Union in negotiations, and the obligations of the logic contained in the government stance are not its concern. The Pvda and the Democrats '66 Second Chamber groups are making excellent capital out of this. The fact that yesterday the opposition once again asked the cabinet in the motions it submitted not to vote against the so-called freeze resolution appears to have more to do with the vote and atmosphere in The Hague than with the vote in New York. Or, as new People's Party for Freedom and Democracy Deputy Voorhoeve put it, the Pvda only wants to sow dissension in the government camp with its motion. Well, the opposition has to try its best to do this, or -- in stronger terms -- the parliamentary division of labor requires it in many cases to make just such attempts.

Yesterday's debate then was dominated by the question: How divided will the Christian Democratic Appeal Second Chamber group be in next Tuesday's vote in the Binnenhof, [seat of Netherlands Parliament] if what is at stake is a logical extension of this section of the government accord which has been unanimously approved by the two Second Chamber party groups which form the government coalition? An initial estimate is that it could be fairly divided; the first small crack in the new government coalition will only need to be measured.

BUNDESTAG CONFIDENCE VOTE SCHEDULED FOR 17 DEC

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- On Tuesday, Chancellor Helmut Kohl will ask the Bundestag for a vote of confidence in order to clear the way for the new elections intended for 6 March. Government Spokesman Diether Stolze said that during a 1-hour talk on Thursday, the chancellor informed Federal President Karl Carstens that he will make a written application in Parliament on Tuesday morning for a vote of confidence. The chairmen of the three Bundestag parliamentary groups have been notified by the chancellor. The vote on the confidence motion in all probability will take place on 17 December.

While the SPD parliamentary group aims to vote against, the CDU/CSU and FDP parliamentary groups intend to abstain. According to Article 68 of the Basic Law, the federal president can dissolve the Bundestag at the suggestion of the chancellor within 21 days, if the chancellor does not receive the support of the majority of deputies in the vote of confidence proposed by him.

PRESS VIEWS HOUSE DEFEAT OF MX MISSILE FUNDING

DW091447 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0605 GMT 9 Dec 82

[From the Press Review]

[Text] SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG discusses the vote on U.S. President Reagan's missile program, and states: The vote in the House of Representatives against beginning the MX deployment is impressive, even if we take into account that the increased Democratic majority as a result of the November midterm elections played a role in the outcome. The results of the vote show that there is a growing fundamental feeling in the United States which has already found expression in the freeze movement's success in elections and which is now beginning to make itself felt in the legislative branch as well. While the appropriation process has not yet been concluded and the negative action by the House can be changed by the Senate or through mediation, nevertheless, still in the United States itself a discussion has been opened which subjects President Reagan's arms programs to critical scrutiny. This was the opinion of SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG.

The following can be read in the FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE: Weapons exert political effects even during periods of calm. The Soviet Union cannot be induced to make concessions at the various disarmament negotiations unless the renunciation of an abundance of weapons can be made to appear more profitable for them than the possession of these weapons. This makes the outcome of the MX debate so highly significant. The chances for success at the Geneva START negotiations are directly affected. Putting a freeze on Western arms arsenals probably won't mean a first step but, on the contrary, the end of disarmament negotiations with the Soviet Union.

Finally a quotation from the Oberndorf SCHWARZWAELDER BOTE: Even if President Reagan succeeds in overcoming the House of Representatives' resistance to the construction of the new MX intercontinental missiles during the subsequent legislative procedure, in any event this vote constitutes a serious personal defeat for Reagan. Even his personal efforts, with which he has so far succeeded in obtaining majorities in Congress for his bills, were not enough to convince the critics who, by the way, voted against the production of the MX for very different reasons. Nobody should now anticipate that the voting defeat will be the overture to a forced change in U.S. policy. Reagan intends to fight for his plans, and he will obtain majorities again. Still, it is necessary to keep in mind that the peace movement, and especially the efforts to freeze nuclear weapons at their present level, are increasingly gaining influence in Washington as well.

TV Comments

[Peter Staisch commentary in the "Tagesthemen" Program]

[Text] Last night President Reagan received really bad news for his dense pack, the official name for the new MX deployment plan. However, the President apparently will not learn the proper lessons from this personal political defeat so as to be able to successfully implement that part of his security policy which, in my opinion, is reasonable.

What was and is reasonable in Reagan's position, especially regarding the detente decade of the seventies which was euphorically greeted at first, but then ended up in disillusionment, is the following: First, arms control is not a means to its own end or something which follows its own course in security policy; second, the new strategic disarmament negotiations, START, and the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles must be conducted from a position of strength; and third, the Carter policy of advance concessions, such as cancelling the construction of the neutron weapon and the B-1 bomber -- concessions which the Soviet Union ignored with a shrug of its shoulders -- must be halted and an integrated armament program must be stepped up after years of U.S. agonizing.

It was not these reasonable aspects which the congressmen objected to last night because they expressly approved funds for the further development of the MX project. However, they obviously do not want this deployment plan in Wyoming. They do not want the production of a weapon which is expensive -- 26 billion, and perhaps even 60 billion [currency not given]. Also, no one is certain it will do away with the U.S. strategic dilemma: the potential vulnerability to a first strike by Soviet intercontinental missiles.

The MX project, ladies and gentlemen, is far from ready. What seemed to be most sensible -- deployment over broad areas in Utah and Nevada -- was foiled by the resistance of influential local politicians. Subsequent thoughts about possibilities of transporting the MX by plane or submarine were soon shelved. Then the President pushed the deployment of the missiles in a dense pack in Wyoming. This is uncoordinated arms policy and was bound to be grist for the mill of the U.S. peace movement. This kind of behavior strengthens the image of Reagan held by the German peace movement which in any event views the U.S. President as a greater danger than the Soviet SS-20 missiles.

Ronald Reagan should quickly bury his dense pack. His security policy as a whole would thereby gain credibility, and by taking that step, the President would strengthen the argument for European counter-armament.

Invulnerability Debate Futile

DW091323 Bonn DIE WELT in German 9 Dec 82 p 2

[Thomas Kielinger commentary]

[Text] Granted, the House of Representatives refused to appropriate funds for the production of the first five MX missiles. To some people it looks as though the "missile experimental" might turn into a "missile impossible." A hopeless case. In reality, however, it is only the minor portion of the MX funds that has been cut, $2.5 billion for research and development of the missile remained untouched, and in the Senate, Reagan will continue the struggle to regain the disapproved funds.

In this connection, however, the matter of siting remains a major issue. One could almost understand the confused lawmakers who refuse to allocate funds for a weapon on whose deployment there is disagreement. One cannot spare the Reagan administration the accusation of having harmed itself with the rhetoric of the "window of vulnerability." If the debate over the MX remains concentrated on the question of which mode of deployment would make this system invulnerable, it is possible to predict that the MX will never be built. There are legitimate arguments against any kind of deployment. The "dense pack," the latest fashion of the season, is no exception.

The debate over the invulnerability of the MX is and remains an unnecessary waste of effort. No land-based system will ever attain that quality. Deterrence does not spring from the invulnerability of part of the strategic arsenal, but from the credibility of the total arsenal made up of sea, air and ground-based systems.

Had the MX been approached more modestly as a necessary modernization of the land-based part of strategic deterrence -- greater number of warheads, greater explosive force, more pinpoint accuracy -- production would have been decided in Congress long ago. The abortive search for "invulnerability" makes the MX vulnerable in Congress.

PAPER VIEWS SHULTZ VISIT, EAST-WEST TRADE

DW091327 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 9 Dec 82 p 3

[Horst Schreiter-Schwarzenfeld commentary]

[Text] The political climate over the Atlantic has eased and the tension in relations between Bonn and Washington has relaxed by several degrees. The quarrel over steel exports has been settled, and U.S. President Reagan has lifted his sanctions against the West European-Soviet natural-gas deal. With George Shultz, the U.S. State Department is headed by a man, who -- in contrast to his predecessor Alexander Haig -- resists the attractions of public self-representation and instead, tries to put his stakes on the good old secret diplomacy. But although Shultz appears somewhat boring, in this way perhaps he will be more successful with his quiet way in achieving what he desires.

And yet strangeness continues to exist, a deep gap in substance notwithstanding all atmospheric stabilization. The Bonn visit of the U.S. secretary of state, the first leg in a lengthy European tour, has not helped to bridge this gap. It basically consists in a differing assessment of the role played by the Soviet Union. While Bonn advocates a "policy of the outstretched hand" vis-a-vis Moscow, Washington cautions for skepticism. While Bonn shows immediate readiness to be receptive to "positive signals" from the East, American receiving stations are conveying a less sensitive impression. One wants to see deeds, as for instance in Poland or in Afghanistan, and wants to get off from the "signals deal," as Shultz put it, so as to wait for substance.

It was against this background that intra-Western trade quarrels took place in the recent past. If the United States has now given up its resistance against the construction of the natural-gas pipeline from Siberia to Europe, this giving in must surely not be interpreted as a belated approval. Now as before, Washington is against it -- as is being assured time and again. Nevertheless, a pragmatic view of the matter has prevailed under Shultz.

Washington now wants to achieve something else. It wants its allies to toe the line on a joint economic course toward the Soviet Union, meaning a so-called overall concept for trade with the East.

Negotiations in Washington between the four European "natural-gas states," the Federal Republic, France, Britain and Italy, and between Canada, Japan and the European Community achieved the agreement of studying the problem more thoroughly within the Western community. It is a vague project written down in a "non-paper," a non-committal record which is open for interpretation.

This is why different participants are under different impressions. And there exist many different views on the how and what. The purpose of Shultz's mission now is to advance the project in a manner commensurate with American liking. At the next summit meeting of Western industrial countries at least, which is to take place next May in Williamsburg (U.S. State of Virginia), the United States would like to see some tangible decisions.

Yet resistance is already visible now. France suspects infringements on the sovereignty of its trade policy. The Reagan government needs the agreement as a substitute, so to speak, for the dropped natural-gas sanctions. At the same time, George Shultz got caught by the East-West ideology of his master. This starting point of reasoning began with the simple question: Why are we supposed to spend billions to arm against the Soviet Union if we, at the same time, are propping up the Soviet system with other billions in goods, supplies and credits? Europe, to be sure, attaches importance to also including the American grain deliveries to the Soviet Union in the overall political concept of trade with the East. According to a rather authoritative school of thought in Europe, the Soviet Union actually is supported more by food exports than by anything else.

It remains to be seen as to whether Shultz will be able to carry home from his European trip anything more than solemn declarations and niceties. As a matter of fact, the world of today is not longer what it was in the fifties. Conditioned by geography and motivated by the need for getting along peacefully with the big Soviet neighbor, West Euorpe has developed a state of interests of its own. It is more complicated than that of the Americans. And it produces a permanent field of tension with which one obviously has to live.

MENA: GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON MIDEAST ISSUES

NC091642 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1430 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Dec (MENA) -- FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has welcomed President Husni Mubarak's visit to the FRG, which is due to start on Monday. He said: We in the Federal Republic of Germany have a special esteem for President Mubarak. There is also a personal friendship between President Mubarak and myself which dates back many years.

In an interview with the editors in chief of the Egyptian information media in Bonn, Genscher said that he expects that President Mubarak's visit will produce good results, particularly in regard to the assessments and proposals he will make on future developments in the Middle East. He said that the FRG pays special attention to President Mubarak's assessments. He added that West Germany appreciates President Mubarak's leadership of his country during the current stage.

At the beginning of his meeting with the editors in chief of the Egyptian information media, Genscher expressed happiness at the meeting. He said: I am very happy when I meet with my Egyptian friends.

Genscher affirmed that there is no change in the FRG's foreign policy, which is characterized by continuity, especially in relation to the situation in the Middle East.

He expressed the hope that this continuity also applies to the FRG's relations with other states. He explained that he is only speaking in the name of the present FRG Government, which is composed of the Christian Democratic Union, the Christian Social Union and the Free Democratic Party.

Genscher explained that he played a major and basic role in drafting the FRG's policy toward the Middle East. He also participated in defining the framework of this policy within the EEC. He said that he personally had not changed, although the German Government had. He said that although he has been foreign minister since 1974, he hoped that he has learned something since then.

In answer to a question on the various Middle East initiatives, Genscher said: Usually in politics there are no unchangeable initiatives. Every initiative undergoes changes. At the end it is something different from what it was at the beginning. Ideas develop and amendments are introduced. In my opinion, the Fes initiative is positive. I have said this many times before, and I repeat it now.

He added: The U.S. initiative is also positive. It consitutes a realistic change in U.S. policy toward the Middle East. We consider this a positive development. The U.S. and European positions have come closer together. We welcome this, in view of the importance of cooperation among the United States, Germany and Europe.

Genscher said that French-Egyptian concepts are also positive. He expressed the hope that there will be coordination among all these concepts and initiatives, so that they will take the form of joint efforts. He added: We will also greatly welcome Egypt's assuming its place in the Arab world soon, because it is my conviction that a unified Arab stand is one of the requirements for reaching a just and permanent solution in the Middle East. I have reiterated this several times during talks with Arab friends.

In reply to a question on the FRG's role in the Middle East issue during the next 6 months, particularly after taking up the chairmanship of the EEC, Genscher said: We must not expect any new European initiative to be launched, because this would lead to a misunderstanding of the issue, especially since the EEC took a clearcut stand on the issue in the Venice declaration. However, in my opinion, all the parties interested in making progress in the Middle East issue should coordinate the initiatives to facilitate a solution in the area. We will make efforts within this framework.

Genscher expressed the hope that he will hear President Mubarak's assessments, because this will help the FRG make its own assessment of the Middle East situation.

Concerning the French stand on the Middle East issue, which is ahead of that of other European countries, Genscher affirmed the importance of the FRG's stand on the Middle East issue. He explained that the European Community is composed of various states and, therefore, there are various ideas. The Venice declaration is deemed important in view of the fact that it is a declaration of principles unanimously adopted in connection with the Middle East issue. He then added: However, I allow myself to remind you that the FRG has played a vanguard role among the EC states in regard to the fundamental issue in the Middle East, which is the question of the recognition of the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. A few weeks after I took office, we recognized the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. This took place before the UN General Assembly in 1974.

We are also pleased because we have been able to persuade all the EC states of the validity of this viewpoint.

Genscher reaffirmed West Germany's sympathetic attitude toward the Middle East issue.

In answer to a question on the extent of the continuity of the Bonn government's policy toward the East, Genscher said: I can only speak on relations between the FRG and the Soviet Union. Concerning the Bonn government's attitude, the present German Government has left no doubt that it adheres to the agreements and treaties concluded with the Soviet Union. It still has the intention to develop bilateral relations positively. In other words, there is no change in the FRG's policy toward the Soviet Union.

Continuing, Genscher said: My personal impression about the new Soviet leadership is that it too does not want a change in bilateral relations. General Secretary Andropov spoke with us frankly in Moscow and explained that he does not want to squander the level of relations that has been achieved between the two countries. In recent years, Andropov has played an important role in formulating Soviet foreign policy.

Genscher added that West Germany considers that its policy toward the Soviet Union is openhanded, frank and clear. He said that the FRG affirmed this during the recent meetings of the EEC leaders and foreign ministers in Copenhagen, and that this was also emphasized during the press conference he attended with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz yesterday.

Concerning the European states' influence on the U.S. stance toward the East at a time when there are deep differences between the Europeans and the Americans, Genscher said that relations between the West and the Soviet Union and its Eastern allies have made tangible progress in the past few years. He noted that President Reagan's cancellation of the sanctions [word indistinct] gas has clearly shown that the Americans [words indistinct] have removed these obstacles that stood in the way of European-American relations. Genscher also noted that the extensive talks he held yesterday with the U.S. secretary of state show that East-West economic relations are satisfactory. He said that we are in complete agreement that there should not be an economic war with the Soviet Union and its partners. He affirmed that economic relations are an element of stability in the overall East-West relations. Therefore, we give a political importance to these relations in addition to their economic importance.

Genscher explained that the European and U.S. ideas concerning the elimination of tension, cooperation and arms limitation are much closer than the impression which the U.S. election campaign created in the summer and fall of 1980. He expressed the conviction that no U.S. Administration since World War II has made concerted efforts concerning disarmament comparable to those now being made under the Reagan administration.

Genscher affirmed that following the FRG chancellor's visit to Washington and the U.S. secretary of state's visit to the FRG, European-U.S. relations are good because they are based on mutual reliance and on common values and objectives between the two groups. He noted that attention should not be paid to the dramatic dimension sometimes given to some developments. He said these reports merely highlight unobjective matters. He said recent months have shown that there is a positive development.

Genscher explained that his country is pursuing a balanced policy toward the Arabs and Israel.

He said the existence of good relations with the FRG's Arab friends and with Israel gives it the chance to contribute more effectively toward a solution of the Middle East conflict.

In answer to a question on the cancellation of his visit to Syria, Genscher said that there are contacts with the Syrian Government to set a date for the visit, which he said he would like to take place before Christmas. He added, however, that before the visit he wants the subject of the budget to be discussed in the Bundestag. He said that he is awaiting the Syrian Government's confirmation.

Asked whether there is anything new in relations between the FRG and Saudi Arabia, Genscher affirmed that these relations are good and based on friendship.

On the possibility of the Western states facing an economic disaster before the end of the winter, as predicted by former FRG Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Genscher said: I don't want to say that the FRG will face an economic disaster, but there is a difficult economic situation represented by unemployment which we shall face. However, the various European states have adopted several plans to combat unemployment.

He added that his country has adopted such measures. He expressed the hope that medium-term chances for solving the problem of unemployment are good. Moreover, his government's policy toward the general budget is firm and stable.

He said that the central bank reduced the interest rate by 1 percent last week. This helped bring about savings of 8 billion Deutsche marks. This is not the first time the interest rate has been reduced. Other measures have been taken in the past. He said that this step is a positive indicator.

EAST GERMANY'S HERRMANN RECEIVES SPD'S VOGEL

[Text] Berlin, 9 Dec (ADN) -- On Thursday, the member of the GDR Martin Luther committee, Joachim Herrmann, Politburo member and SED Central Committee secretary, received SPD Presidium member Dr Hans-Jochen Vogel in Berlin for a talk. Hans-Jochen Vogel is in the GDR on a visit to the Luther Memorial in Wittenburg. Joachim Herrmann briefed the guest on the work of the GDR Luther committee in preparation for the 500th anniversary of Martin Luther's birth. During the talk, questions of the relations between the GDR and the FRG and their special responsibility for securing peace in Europe were discussed. Joachim Herrmann explained the policies of the GDR aimed at securing peace and detente, as was reaffirmed at the fifth SED Central Committee session. He underlined that the GDR is holding to its constructive policy of peaceful coexistence with the FRG. In the interests of peace in Europe and the relations between the two states, everything must be done to prevent the deployment of new American medium-range nuclear weapons in West Europe and especially in the FRG. If both sides proceed from the basis of the European treaties, of which the framework treaty between the GDR and the FRG is an important part, it will be possible to continue making progress in the securing of peace and in the interest of the citizens of both German states.

For his part, Hans-Jochen Vogel emphasized the responsibility of both German states for peace in Europe and the significance of keeping to the framework treaty and the other agreements concerning the further normalization of relations between the two German states. He spoke in favor of a continuation of the dialogue between politicians from East and West.

In his view all participants, but especially the two superpowers, had to do everything to put an end to the arms race.

The head of the FRG Department in the GDR Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ambassador Karl Seidel, and Hans-Jochen Vogel's advisor, Frank Dahrendorf, took part in the talk.

FRG-GDR Relations Discussed

LD092316 Hamburg DPA in German 2108 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Excerpts] East Berlin, 9 Dec (DPA) -- On Thursday evening the SPD chancellor candidate, Hans-Jochen Vogel, ended a 1-day visit to East Berlin and Wittenberg, during which he had talks with SED Politburo member Joachim Herrmann and representatives of the Evangelical churches in the GDR and visited places associated with Luther. In the discussion with Herrmann there was agreement on the "very high priority" given to continuity in relations between the two German states. In an evening press conference in Berlin Vogel said he had also touched on the problem of the minimum exchange levy for Western visitors, which had been drastically raised by the GDR 2 years ago.

Opinions had differed on the cause of the arms race. Vogel said that Herrmann pointed out that the implementation of the NATO twin decision on the deployment of new American medium-range weapons in Western Europe would create a new material basis for intra-German relations and the stationing of such missiles would damage bilateral relations. Herrmann had also mentioned the GDR's list of demands, which includes demands for respect of GDR citizenship and a settlement of demarcation of the Elbe frontier. Vogel took the view in speaking to journalists that there was a question of whether one should once again "put on the negotiating table" the problem of the Elbe frontier in connection with the linked issues of pollution of the Elbe and improvement of the quality of its water.

In the late afternoon in East Berlin Vogel had a talk with the chairman of the Luther committee of the Evangelical churches in the GDR Thuringian Land Bishop Werner Leich. In the conversation with him, as also in part in the conversation with Herrmann, who is a member of the state Luther committee, one of the topics was the preparations for Luther year 1983.

BARZEL ON UNITY, EUROPEAN PEACE POLICY

LD091752 Hamburg DPA in German 1641 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- The minister of inner-German affairs, Rainer Barzel, has described the Federal Government's policy on German as a European peace policy in the service of national unity. In an interview for the December edition of "DEUTSCHLAND-ARCHIV" Barzel stressed that Bonn was pursuing the aim of unity by peaceful means only. The psychological and political strains which have arisen from the division of Germany should be reduced so that oppositions within Europe are not exacerbated even more.

The minister affirmed that the government seeks to aim at a state of peace in Europe, in which the German people would regain their unity through free self-determination. Moreover, this policy seeks to gradually reduce the dangers to peace arising from the division of Germany and the suppression of human rights. This includes efforts to bring about greater freedom of movement. Barzel decisively rejected the view that the GDR could regard the demand for more freedom of movement for people, information and opinions as a threat. "It is not us who are threatening... [DPA ellipses] the power of the SED, but the SED is not sure of its own power. This is the core of all the problems."

PARTIES URGE IMPROVED INTRA-GERMAN TRAVEL

LD092358 Hamburg DPA in German 2240 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- All groups in the Bundestag asked the Federal Government this evening to negotiate with the GDR on more facilities for contacts in divided Germany. A motion carried by all three groups supports the Federal Government's efforts to increase the number of contacts between peoples in the two German states and, together with the GDR, to open up further opportunities for travel between East and West, which should not only be granted for special family affairs.

The motion which was adopted unanimously, further states that the Bundestag welcomes the willingness of the new Federal Government, as a result of talks between former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker at Lake Werbellin in December 1981, to see to it within their respective possibilities that no additional tensions arise from intra-German relations and that relations are improved and developed in the interest of the peoples in divided Germany.

SCHMIDT INTERVIEWED ON GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS

LD091646 Hamburg DPA in German 1549 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA) -- Former Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has accused the new government of lessening Bonn's pressure on the American-Soviet negotiations in Geneva to reduce nuclear medium-range missiles, thus endangering their success. These negotiations "without such pressure, will not lead to a positive outcome," Schmidt said in an interview with the newspaper FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU, which was prereleased in Bonn, on Thursday.

The government, however, on the same day once again strongly rejected doubts about U.S. conduct at the Geneva negotiations. The government is convinced that the United States is doing all it can to reach a negotiated result with Moscow on time, before the end of 1983 -- the date fixed for NATO counterarming -- Foreign Ministry Minister of State Juergen Moellemann said during a question period in the Bundestag. He said that the FRG and the other alliance partners' collaboration is fully ensured through an intensive process of consultation with Washington. Bonn had a considerable share in the American proposal for a 'zero option' concerning American and Soviet medium-range missiles.

In the newspaper interview, Schmidt criticised both the attitude of Chancellor Helmut Kohl and that of Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Up to now, he believes that only Defense Minister Manfred Woerner is giving the negotiations in Geneva profound thought, Schmidt said. "But I don't see this in the chancellor, and I don't see it -- nor was I ever able to see it previously -- in the foreign minister." On the issue of German room to maneuver in view of the date set by NATO for the possible deployment of new American missiles in West Europe in the autumn of 1983, Schmidt said: "The arrival of the final date should frighten no one." Often in such negotiations the decisive concessions are made at the last minute. At the same time, he stressed: "Concessions have to be made on both sides."

SPD'S BAHR ON DISARMAMENT, ZERO SOLUTION

DW101205 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1730 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Interview with SPD disarmament expert Egon Bahr by reporter Burchardt, place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] The Social Democrats have taken up in an amazingly pleased way a document mapped out in September by U.S. disarmament director Paul Warnke, the contents of which amount to a certain disassociation from the official version of the zero option. Did the Social Democrats disassociate themselves from the official version of the zero option?

[Answer] No, we just consider it as necessary to also ponder compromises and interim solutions because, as former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt said, it is unlikely that a result will be achieved if both sides insist on their current maximum positions. We have heard from Brussels last week that NATO is also pondering interim and compromise solutions. Apparently the Americans are also. We believe that this issue cannot be made a taboo in the Federal Republic because, after all, our interests are primarily involved. We have said, therefore, that this is an interesting suggestion, and we have urged the Federal Government to examine it carefully and if need be, become active itself.

[Question] In case this should be incorporated in the Geneva negotiation package, what reaction do you expect from the Soviets?

[Answer] I cannot yet say. I find it so interesting about the Warnke proposal, that it facilitates a transition to SALT or START, that is, to intercontinental-strategic negotiations, that it includes the existing British and French nuclear weapons and that it comes to a result which doesn't necessitate the deployment of additional American missiles on our territory. I believe these are 3 points which are in accordance with our aims or considerations regarding what is necessary to achieve a result.

[Question] Is the NATO dual decision thus dead as an election campaign issue, for example?

[Answer] That will not be decided by us, but by the Federal Government. We, the SPD, believe that on 6 March no decision will be made on the deployment, but rather on a new Bundestag, and that a deployment decision must be made next year in the fall. If the Federal Government and the coalition parties agree that on 6 March a decision, that is also a possible No, will remain open, everything will be alright, if not, we will voice our opinion on it.

[Question] What would it be like?

[Answer] It could be that we would have to fight for keeping the deployment decision open on 6 March.

JOBERT MAKES 'SLASHING ATTACK' ON BONN, TOKYO

NC092056 Paris AFP in English 2047 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 9 (AFP) -- West Germany and Japan are good examples of countries which appear to support free trade but are in fact protectionist, French Foreign Trade Minister Michel Jobert said here today.

In a slashing attack delivered to the France-Japan press association, Mr Jobert said that both countries hide highly disciplined organisation of trade, industry and even law behind a facade of economic liberty.

West Germany's trade protectionism, he said, comprised 31,000 technical standards, adding that Bonn had struck unpublicised self-limitation trade accords with Japan, particularly concerning cars.

"I am waiting for a denial (of this allegation)," Mr Jobert declared.

Turning his ire towards Tokyo, he said that Japan had instituted a blanket of technical standards, most of them contrary to international rules, that kept imports down to levels of countries such as Turkey.

Mr Jobert warned that France would not lift its "battle of Poitiers" restrictions on imports of Japanese video casette recorders until Japan did something to trim the trade imbalance between the two countries.

He noted that France's trade deficit with Japan had grown from 5,000 to 12,000 million francs (from 725 to 1,740 million dollars) in just four years.

But Mr Jobert said that France planned no import curbs on other Japanese products such as hi-fi equipment similar to the order that all imports of Japanese VCR's must be routed through remote Poitiers in central France.

He warned, however, the France had had its fill of Japanese protectionism. "The Japanese have yet to learn the French expression: The jug will break from over-use. For us the jug is broken, even if for the rest of Europe it is so far only cracked," he said.

The minister claimed that France was the least guilty of all European Community countries when it came to breaking the Community's rules.

He saw proof of this in France's big trade deficit, which is expected to reach 100,000 million francs (14,500 million dollars) this year.

PREMIER MAUROY COMMENTS ON ECONOMIC SITUATION

PM090955 Paris LE MONDE in French 7 Dec 82 p 8

[Unattributed report on interview with French Premier Pierre Mauroy on the Radio Luxembourg-Le Monde Grand Jury Program on 5 December]

[Excerpts] Mr Pierre Mauroy, who was the guest on the Radio Luxembourg-Le Monde Grand Jury Program on the evening of Sunday 5 December, stated in particular:

-- With regard to the development of the economic situation:

"Things are going well for France as regards inflation. It could be better, but let's say thay it is a 'green' light compared with what is happening elsewhere and what was happening here before.

The light is on 'green' in the unemployment sphere compared with what is happening elsewhere and what was happening previously. The light is on 'green' in the growth sphere in the middle of the crisis surrounding us.... We have one red light, and that is our foreign trade deficit.... The stringency policy, like any stringency policy, may be unpleasant for a while. It is unpleasant going to the doctor. But you go there to be cured and it is pleasant to be cured. Well, the same is true in the economic sphere.... The freeze was a technical success. People said: 'The freeze is easy; the great difficulty is lifting it.' We are emerging from the freeze. A meeting has been held with the civil service trade union organizations, and four have voted for the agreements. Why do you not say more about that in view of the fact that France was suffering from the absence of negotiations between the employers and the trade unions? Do you know that we are negotiating in a way which has never been seen before in the whole of France's social history? That is the real contractual policy...

"In other words, the freeze has been lifted not merely amid trade union indifference, but with a kind of trade union cooperation."

In reply to questions, the government chief discussed several topical subjects. He stated in particular:

-- With regard to the PS attitude toward him:

"The PS is not comparable with the rightwing parties which change their general secretaries every year and which are parties which support one man and which need a little music, a large number of dancers and a bit of a show. The PS is not like that. Even without music and spectacle, it meets to discuss and adopt resolutions.... Laignel's remark was very damaging. The Executive Committee met, we discussed the matter, everybody gave his opinion and Laignel himself gave his full support to the government policy. [Footnote: On 5 November, Mr Andre Laignel, deputy for L'Indre and a member of the PS National Secretariat, strongly criticized the new measures taken by the government to help the enterprises. "The government is taking the wrong course," he said in particular. "It is time to state very clearly that by dint of pleasing our adversaries, we are causing despair among our friends."] Indeed, when you pursue a stringency policy there is some reluctance.... The main thing is that the PS, this great party of hope, should understand the need for a stringency policy because it is the means of guaranteeing the country's future in good conditions."

-- With regard to the PCF's attitude:

"There is complete cohesion within the government....

"I see communists showing solidarity in the government. Moreover, it is fairly impressive to see the way in which this majority is united in its diversity; it is not only united around the cabinet table, but also in cases where there are difficulties in explaining measures to the workers who would not understand them.

"The Dollar's Fall Is a Good Thing"

-- With regard to the dollar's fall:

"I am rather surprised by what I hear on the radio and television and what I read in the newspapers.

You give the impression that you are becoming the horsemen of the apocalypse: When the dollar rises, what a sorry adventure it is! When the dollar falls, what a catastrophe it is...! It is a good thing for the dollar to fall, and I hope that it will fall. It is a good thing not only for France but also for all the developing countries and, it is a particularly good thing as regards the reduction of our foreign trade deficit."

-- With regard to the state of foreign trade:

"If necessary, the government would have no hesitation in pursuing a stringency policy in the foreign trade sphere too.... We would also have no hesitation in using intensive treatment to absorb the foreign trade deficit if we did not succeed -- but I hope we will succeed -- in restoring a balance as we would like. I am convinced that things will gradually return to normal during 1983."

JOBERT: LONG-TERM SAUDI OIL DEAL APPROVED

NC091850 Paris AFP in English 1804 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 9 (AFP) -- The French Government has given approval for the signature of a long-term contract for oil supplies from Saudi Arabia, French External Trade Minister Michel Jobert told AFP today.

He said that representatives of the state-owned oil industries of ELF-Aquitaine and Total were soon to visit Riyadh to conclude talks with Saudi Arabian authorities, but French authorities said the deal was not part of a broader financial-military accord.

It would be a three-year contract with effect from January 1, and purchases from Saudi Arabia should be at a "convenient" level, Mr Jobert said. Mr Jobert had talks with Saudi Arabia's Oil Minister Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani in Riyadh at the week-end.

Different well-informed sources said the two companies would undertake to buy annually nearly six million tons of crude from the Saudi Arabian firm Petromin. This is half the amount envisaged under the preceding long-term contract. But the companies would be able to obtain more crude, the sources said.

The French Sofracop firm, half owned by ELF and half by Total, succeeding in reducing its offtake to a rate of six million tons a year at the beginning of the summer because it had adequate supplies.

Saudi authorities, and particularly Shaykh Yamani, today told the French Government that they are ready to receive negotiators from the French companies.

The question of the oil contract was raised late yesterday during a restricted cabinet meeting here chaired by President Francois Mitterrand.

Instructions have been given to oil companies responsible for completing the agreement, but the exact dates of the visit by the French delegation have not been decided, the reliable sources said. The French state is a majority shareholder in ELF-Aquitaine and holds a blocking minority shareholding in Total.

The oil companies wanted to reduce their purchases of Saudi crude, which they said was too expensive at 34 dollars a barrel in relation to falling world prices.

In common with other oil companies at a time of falling consumption, the two French firms did not want to add to already comfortable stocks.

French officials were at pains to stress that this renewal of the oil contract is not part of a "global agreement" between the two sides covering financial, economic and military matters.

Mr Jobert today stressed that the two countries enjoy "good cooperation" in every field.

This cooperation is expected to lead also to a deposit with the Bank of France by the Saudi Arabian Monetary Agency (SAMA) of some 2,000 million dollars.

Questioned today about this reported deposit, Economy and Finance Minister Jacques Delors declined to comment, stating that the management of the Bank of France's reserves concerned only him.

Mr Delors is due to visit Saudi Arabia from December 20 to 22.

BOTSWANA PRESIDENT MASIRE ENDS VISIT 17 NOV

PM081609 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Nov 82 p 6

[Jean-Claude Pomonti report: "France and Botswana To Sign a Cultural and Technical Cooperation Agreement"]

[Excerpt] This Wednesday, 17 November, Botswana President Quett Masire ended his 3-day "official working visit" to France during which he had a 2-hour meeting at the Elysee with Mr Mitterrand and visited Lyons. France and Botswana are to sign a cultural, scientific and technical cooperation agreement. The cooperation package amounted to Fr 1.3 million in 1982. In June 1982 an agreement worth Fr 140 million was signed for France to equip a thermal power station in Botswana.

COLOMBO REAFFIRMS DECISION TO DEPLOY MISSILES

AU091952 Rome ANSA in English 1946 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Brussels, December 9 -- Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo reconfirmed his nation's decision to deploy medium range nuclear missiles on national territory unless substantial progress is registered in U.S.-Soviet talks in Geneva and affirmed that it is too soon to interpret the signals from Moscow following the change of leadership in his statement to the NATO foreign ministers meeting here today.

The Atlantic alliance foreign ministers, meeting here today and tomorrow, are expected to confirm the 1979 [word indistinct] to install 572 cruise and Pershing II medium range missiles in five European NATO countries if the Soviets fail to reduce the number of their SS-20's targeted on Western European countries.

In his statement to the meeting, the Italian foreign minister said that the alliance must avoid "strengthening those factions in Moscow least inclined towards a policy of real detente in the complex and often prolonged process" following a change of leadership.

Colombo said that it was too early to attempt an interpretation of the developments underway in the Soviet Union. "There may be, and there have been, signals of changes in tone and presentation, but the indications are not sufficient to predict substantial changes in Soviet foreign and military policy," the diplomatic chief added. USSR, INDIAN DIPLOMATS EXPELLED FOR SPYING

[Text] Rome, Dec 10 (AFP) -- The Italian Government expelled a Soviet and an Indian diplomat on Tuesday after accusing them of spying, a reliable source said here today. The Foreign Ministry declined immediate comment, but denied unconfirmed reports that a second Soviet diplomat had also been expelled.

Italian authorities are already involved in controversy over the "Bulgarian affair," in which one Bulgarian has been arrested and another ordered arrested following the attempt on Pope Paul's life here in May last year.

Investigators have apparently taken the Bulgarian connection in the St. Peter's Square assassination bid for granted, and are reportedly also probing a possible involvement by the Soviet KGB secret police.

The Bulgarian arrested, airline executive Sergey Ivanov Antonov, has been held since November 25. The other Bulgarian is Jelio Kolev Vassiliev, secretary to the Bulgarian military attache before he returned to Sofia six months ago.

TURK TIED TO POPE PLOT ARRESTED IN SOFIA

NC092015 Paris AFP in English 2004 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Rome, Dec 9 (MENA) -- A Turkish drug smuggler wanted for questioning over the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in May 1981 was arrested today by authorities in the Bulgarian capital Sofia, Italian TV reported. The man, Bechir Celenk, was the subject of an international arrest warrant issued two weeks ago by Italian Magistrate Illario Martella, in charge of investigating a conspiracy to kill the pontiff.

Mr Celenk is alleged to have offered three million German marks (more than one million dollars) to Ali Agca, the Turkish terrorist convicted of carrying out the attempt on the pope's life.

Judge Martella today again questioned Sergei Ivanov Antonov, the Bulgarian airline executive arrested on November 25 and charged with organizing the practical details of the assassination bid. Mr Antonov's lawyers said after the interrogation, which took place at a prison north of Rome, that their client again repeated that he was the victim of a plot. The judge again refused to release Mr Antonov on bail saying that the evidence against the Bulgarian was complex and needed further investigation.

Mr Antonov rejects accusations that he was in St Peter's Square when the pope was shot. A photo taken by a Vatican photographer instants after the shooting allegedly shows Mr Antonov not far from Pope John Paul II.

Further questioning of Mr Antonov was expected, his lawyers said.

Observers here believe that Mr Celenk, the man arrested in the Bulgarian capital today, was a key accomplice of Mr Agca. Investigations here alledge that Mr Celenk signed the contract for the pope's assassination with Mr Agca in a Sofia luxury hotel during the summer of 1980.

Italian officials are now wondering if Mr Celenk's arrest was a move by Bulgarian authorities to show their willingness to help with the investigation and to end suspicions, raised in Italy this last week, that Bulgarian secret services were implicated in the plot to kill the pontiff.

According to the Bulgarian news agency BTA, reported by Italian TV, Mr Celenk was being held by Bulgarian police while investigations continued into his part in the attempted assassination,

It is still too early to say whether Bulgarian authorities will agree to Mr Celenk's questioning by the Italian investigating judge and to his eventual extradition.

NORWAY

LABOR PARTY LIKELY TO DEFER MISSILE DECISION

PM091149 Oslo AREBEIDERBADET in Norwegian 6 Dec 82 p 3

[Terje Iversen report: "No Missile Resolution at April Conference"]

[Excerpt] A majority of Labor Party National Executive members support party Chairman Gro Harlem Brundtland's view that the party will not have the necessary foundation on which to make a final decision on the deployment of new NATO missiles by next spring.

This is the result of a straw poll taken by A-PRESSEN's Oslo office among the members of the party's National Executive. Only three of those interviewed are in favor of a "No" to the missiles next spring.

However, a few National Executive members said that they would have liked to see the party's annual conference pass a resolution against deployment, but take the view that the NATO dual decision means that we must wait for the results from the negotiations before reaching a final decision. But there is still a majority on the National Executive taking the view that the party chairman has now drawn up a reasonable program for dealing with the matter.

Gro Harlem Brundtland made her statement that the national conference next April will hardly have enough grounds on which to base a final decision on missile deployment in an interview on Friday [3 December].

"As things seem today, there will probably not be any results from the negotiations to assess when the conference is held next April. In such a situation, a final decision by the national conference would mean a break with the line and the plan of action the Labor Party has adopted on the issue, "Gro Harlem Brundtland said.

GOVERNMENT'S 'DAMAGING' SECURITY POLICY HIT

PM071255 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 25 Nov 82 p 4

[Editorial: "From Scandal to Scandal"]

[Text] We have said it before, and unfortunately, we have been given new confirmation of it: the government is pursuing a security policy which in form and content is enormously damaging for Norway. After the dramatic defense debate in the Storting on Monday [22 November], not many hours passed before we saw a new demonstration of the government's arrogance.

The new conflict which has surfaced in the field of foreign policy and which has to do with Norway's attitude toward the UN resolution calling for a freeze of nuclear arsenals at their present level has two sides -- the position the government decided to adopt on the resolution and the way in which the Storting was "consulted."

As far as the way in which the government dealt with the question is concerned, we had thought in our naivete that Prime Minister Willoch would have learned something from the violent criticism to which his government was subjected in the Storting Monday, which ended as a vote of no confidence against Defense Minister Anders C. Sjaastad.

But No, Willoch has learned nothing at all. Despite the fact that on Monday the opposition expressed its dissatisfaction with the government's attitude toward the Storting on security policy questions, Foreign Minister Svenn Stray only succeeded a few hours later in "running over" the Storting once again on a central security policy issue. The government wasted no time in reaching a decision to vote against the UN resolution calling for a freeze on nuclear arsenals at their present level. Once the decision had been made, Foreign Minister Svenn Stray met the Storting's Foreign Affairs Committee merely to brief them on this decision. There was no consultation with the opposition or with the parties which support the government. Such methods are a new break with the forms of cooperation between the government and the Storting developed to deal with such questions. There is every indication that Foreign Minister Stray and the government orginally had no plans to consult the Storting on this matter, but simply intended to drive on in its well-known conservative fashion. Storting deputies themselves forced a meeting with the government. The fact that the government had no plans to take the issue to the various bodies in the Storting is emphasized by the fact that the meeting took place only 2 hours before the UN vote itself. Thus there was no real exchange of views, the meeting was merely a show to provide formal cover in relations with the Storting.

After what has happened, we are forced to note that the government's relationship toward the Storting is not the product of accidents. It is a systematic and conscious game which aims at making the people's elected deputies "superfluous."

Under the Labor Party governments in the last few years, Norway has played an active role within the UN framework for disarmament. On many occasions our country has been a driving force behind this work. Through the 'No' vote adopted by the conservative government on the proposed resolution calling for a ban on the testing, production and deployment of new nuclear arms, we have taken a step backward in time. Voting 'No' to such a proposal is an expression of an aggressive stance of confrontation in the detente process.

When the Labor Party, the Socialist Left Party and the Liberals -- with half-hearted support from the Christian People's Party and the Center Party -- take the view that it would have been correct to abstain on this issue, this also reveals the political isolation into which the Conservative Party and the Willoch government are moving on security policy. The broad political agreement in this field has been broken. We have been given new confirmation of this.

If the government had chosen to abstain in the UN vote, it would not have found itself in conflict with the Geneva negotiations. An abstention could not have been taken as support for either of the negotiating parties. At the same time, it would have been an unmistakeable signal of a desire for disarmament.

The conservative government's choice of line is support for those forces fighting hardest for the deployment of new nuclear missiles in Europe. It is also a clear indication that the Norwegian Government is dissociating itself from a growing peace movement, both national and international.

SWEDEN

GOVERNMENT HIT FOR DEFENSE POLICY INCONSISTENCY

PM071303 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 23 Nov 82 p 2

[Editorial: "The Party of Self-Contradiction"]

[Text] The fact that people in various parts of the world question Sweden's ability to protect its territory against uninvited guests makes for extraordinary difficulties for Swedish security and foreign policy.

The Palme government has not yet been in office 2 months and people -- both here in Sweden and in the rest of the world -- are asking themselves whether Swedish disarmament policy and the Swedish view of a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic area have changed radically or not. It is a long time since such self-contradictory statements have been served to the general public on a conveyor belt by prominent spokesmen of the same government and administration.

Of course it is not a good thing that our neighbors are uncertain about some of the fundamental parts of Swedish security and foreign policy. However, what is worse is that this uncertainty is more likely to have grown as a result of Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom's statement during Riksdag question time on Monday [22 November].

Not only the two moderate coalition party deputies, Carl Bildt and Ingrid Sundberg, who tabled the questions, directed pointed criticism at the foreign minister's 11-page answer. Center Party Deputy Gunnel Jonang seemed almost shocked by the contradictory phrases. And members of other governments will probably attach importance to the harsh words from Bodstrom's predecessor, [Liberal Party leader] Ola Ullsten.

And why should Social Democratic foreign and security policy be spared contradictions and changes of direction? The Foreign Ministry disarmament delegation chariman, Ambassador Maj-Britt Theorim, has always been at odds with the party leadership's policies. Her statements in an increasingly notorious SVENSKA DABGLADET interview were also at odds with what up to now have been the traditional methods and objectives relating to the zone issue. Both Bodstrom and Theorin asserted that the disarmament ambassador was a victim of the press, a common counterargument discussed elsewhere in today's SVENSKA DAGBLADET.

However, as Bildt carefully pointed out, accidents never happen in isolation. Mrs Theorin was contradicted by Mr Palme and Mr Palme was contradicted in Helsinki by Mr Bodstrom, and so on. And no one was made the wiser by the answers the foreign minister gave to the Riksdag -- when he simply did not bother to answer the questions he had been asked.

There are many subtle elements in the zone debate, and the complicated problems involved are not easy for the layman to follow. Mr Bildt has taken on himself an important pedagogical task when with his cool analysis he does not shrink from presenting a clear account of the difficulties and risks. Is the government moving toward the notion of a shrunken zone which will actually result in a shrunken zone -- when the very point of the zone must be that it embrace a larger area than the already de facto nuclear-free Nordic countries?

Can such a zone really come into being (of course not) without simultaneous superpower guarantees?

And -- perhaps the most important question -- must the zone in whatever form it takes not also cover the whole of the Baltic? On this point, the Liberal Party leader -- who yesterday was really on the alert -- launched a tough and effective attack on the foreign minister.

As far as both the zone issue and international disarmament work are concerned, the Social Democrats seem to find verbal effects more important that getting to grips with the difficult and uncomfortable real facts. It seems as if they believe that they are able to make the obstacles disappear through incantations -- even though Bodstrom talked of patience and time. We cannot get away from the real facts -- or, as Ullsten pointed out: How are we to create a zone without the involvement of the superpowers, when Denmark and Norway in NATO have a special nuclear option?

Disarmament work with its European dimension is no less subtle than the zone complex. The foreign minister found it remarkably difficult to answer Mrs Sundberg's simple question about the role of military defense in Swedish security policy -- and when he finally decided to do so, the answer showed the usual nonchalance toward the Swedish Armed Forces and contained the customary reverence for the notion that it is possible to gnaw away at the resources placed at their disposal to benefit civil defense.

Neither Bildt nor Sundberg recieved any real answers to their questions about whether the government has totally abandoned the old line of total balance in disarmament measures -- affecting nuclear and conventional arms.

But then Bodstrom did receive the highest praise from Communist EVA HJELMSTROM!

PYM SPEAKS ON NATO, MX, RELATIONS WITH USSR

LD092152 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2128 GMT 9 Dec 82

[By Geoff Mead, PA staff reporter in Brussels]

[Text] Foreign Secretary Francis Pym tonight warned it would require "quite a change" by the new Soviet leadership before NATO would cancel its planned deployment of cruise and Pershing missiles in Europe. Russia has claimed that the alliance's new weapons, due to be in position by the end of next year, would pose an increased threat to world peace. But Mr Pym emphasised that only positive signs of arms reduction by the Soviets could affect the West's nuclear plans.

"The only circumstances in which we would review the decision is if there was positive evidence that the Soviet leadership is changing strategy in a favourable direction," the foreign secretary said after a meeting in Brussels of the 16-nation NATO Council.

Mr Pym sounded pessimistic about immediate prospects. "We are keeping our minds open, which they most genuinely are, because we all long for this reduction in the level of armaments. To get a favourable response requires quite a change on the part of the Soviet leadership and I don't want to raise peoples' hopes of a change."

Mr Pym stressed Europe's need to remain firm, but hoped that a more "constructive" relationship could be achieved with Russia under Mr Andropov. He said closer links would have to be based on a policy of "firmness and dialogue."

Mr Pym admitted that President Reagan's failure in the U.S. Congress over the MX missile programme had been a setback and a defeat, but he said he hoped the Russians would recognize the determination of Europe to carry through its Pershing and cruise programme, if there were no favourable signs from Russia.

Mr Pym said he had been assured by President Reagan that the MX missile programme would go through in the end.

Nevertheless, the NATO allies were aware of some concern over the deployment of a total of 572 cruise and Pershing intermediate range missiles throughout Europe next year. He cited the recent Danish Parliament decision against further financial support for the cost of placing the new missiles in Europe.

S. AFRICAN RAID INTO LESOTHO PUBLICLY CONDEMNED

LD091456 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1435 GMT 9 Dec 82

[By Tom McMullan, PA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain today publicly condemned the South African raid into Lesotho as "a flagrant violation" of sovereignty. A Foreign Office statement said: "We are still awaiting a full account of this incident, but we condemn this flagrant violation of Lesotho sovereignty and greatly regret the loss of life involved. We deplore violence from any quarter in the search for solutions to the problems of southern Africa. We appeal to all countries in the region to show restraint."

The spokesman said it had been widely reported that South African forces were involved in the raid and the statement should be seen in that context. "We will be making our views known to South Africa," the spokesman said.

South African officials have claimed the raid was against guerrilla bases.

HURD COMMENTS ON ARAB-BRITISH RELATIONS

GF100607 Jidda Domestic Service in Arabic 0500 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Douglas Hurd, British minister of state for the foreign and commonwealth office, noted yesterday that the only means for averting a crisis in Arab-British relations is to hold continuous contacts and dialogue between the two sides. He added that the next few weeks will witness meetings on various levels between the Arab and the British sides in order to brush aside the misunderstanding on the visit of the Arab seven-member committee to Britain.

In an interview with Saudi Arabian television, Hurd expressed optimism at the possibility of overcoming the misunderstanding. Hurd indicated that the visit of the Arab delegation to Britain has been postponed, not cancelled. He added that Britain supports the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination. He also pointed out that Britain realizes the importance of the PLO and holds contacts with the latter, but at a certain level, according to him.

VISITING LEBANESE FOREIGN MINISTER ON TALKS

PM091649 London ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT in Arabic 9 Dec 82 p 1

[Wafa'i Diyab report: "Salim Says After Talks in London: If Lebanese Solution Fails, Solution of the Major Problem Will Fail"]

[Text] London -- Lebanese Foreign Minister Elie Salim had talks yesterday with British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and British Foreign Secretary Francis Pym. This took place on the first day of his 3-day official visit to Britain as part of a tour which includes the United States and France.

At the end of the meeting, Salim said in his first statement to journalists since he became foreign minister that the talks with Pym centered on political principles in general because the problem is political and is the basis upon which we build everything. Any economic aid or support for the internal [security] forces first depends on liberating Lebanon and enabling the Lebanese Government to assume its responsibilities on every inch of its territory.

Regarding Britain's participation in the multinational force, he said: We have realized from the beginning that Britain has many commitments abroad and that it is not easy for it to make a major contribution to the multinational force. What I can say is that Britain understands the Lebanese situation fully, and I believe that it will do all it can to ensure its participation in one way or another in the multinational force.

Concluding, he said: From the beginning of the talks to the end, we concentrated on the importance of liberating Lebanon and restoring its sovereignty because solving the Lebanese problem is the key to solving the Middle East problem. If the initiative to solve the problem in Lebanon fails, the initiative to solve the major problem will not succeed. For this reason, the Lebanese problem is top priority not only on the Lebanese level but actually on the Arab level as a whole as well.

Lebanese Ambassador in London Dr Khalil Makkawi, who took part in the talks, said that the foreign minister particularly emphasized the need for Britain and the EC to do all they can in order to end all occupation and to evacuate all the non-Lebanese armies from Lebanese territories. The British side has shown full understanding of the Lebanese situation and is sparing no effort within its means in order to give the necessary help in political and other fields.

TELEGRAPH: TRIDENT 'VIABLE ALTERNATIVE' TO MX

PM091405 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 9 Dec 82 p 18

[Editorial: "Few Tears for MX"]

[Text] It is possible to have mixed feelings about the rebuff President Reagan has received from the House of Representatives over the MX missile. It is undoubtedly galling that there should be such rejoicing in Moscow over the vote to deny funds for the missile's production. It is also a pity to discard a bargaining chip without obtaining any Russian concession in return. That apart, the Reagan administration should not shed too many tears.

Congressional doubts about MX stem not from any reservation about the capability of the missile itself, but rather from the closely spaced basing or "dense-pack" system with which the Pentagon proposed to protect the 100 new missiles. Ever since the decision to build a new generation of land-based missiles was taken, because of fears that the existing Minuteman force has become vulnerable to a Soviet first strike, military experts have been seeking a credible basing system. At least 30 different systems have been suggested, including the inordinately complicated and expensive "shell-game" advocated by President Carter. The fact is that none, including dense-pack, has looked particularly convincing. The argument against MX is not that a new, highly accurate silo-busting weapon is unnecessary, but that the efficiency of modern missile technology may now be so great that no land-based system could withstand a determined first-strike.

However, even allowing for the inherently inconclusive technical debate, it would have been wrong of the House of Representatives to reject the MX, warts and all, if no viable alternative existed. Fortunately, one does. By the time the MX would have come into service in 1989, the Trident 11 D-5 submarine-launched missile (SLBM) will also be ready for deployment. In the past, the objection to relying on SLMB's was that they did not have the pin-point accuracy to hit Soviet missile silos. Also, submarines have traditionally presented command and control problems. Neither objection retains its validity. Communications with submarines have improved immensely, as was demonstrated recently in the South Atlantic, and the accuracy of the D-5 will be a match for the land-based MX. Rather than fight a possible losing battle to spend $30 billion on the unconvincing MX, the Reagan administration should build more Trident submarines. That would quickly dampen the celebrations in Moscow.

UN ENVOY INSTRUCTED TO PROTEST SEA VIOLATIONS

KIPRIANOU, ARCHBISHOP EXCHANGE VIEWS 9 DEC

NC100924 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 10 Dec 82 p 12

[Text] President of the Republic Kiprianou met with His Beatitude Archbishop of Cyprus Khrisostomos yesterday at the presidential mansion. A brief communique which was released on the meeting -- the first such private meeting to be held for a long time -- says they discussed questions of cooperation between the government and the church and exchanged views on the national issue.

Archbishop Khrisostomos, whom we have contacted, stated: "During the meeting, we exchanged views on the political issue. In any case, we did not deal with the question of elections [for the office of president] because as a matter of principle, the church does not involve itself in partisan affairs."

The meeting lasted for more than 1 hour. Although no details regarding the meeting are avilable, the public has been impressed and has interpreted this meeting as a positive point in the country's political atmosphere. Favorable comment by political circles expressed in general the wish for more frequent meetings between the president of the republic and the primate of the church of Cyprus.

On the other hand, different appraisals say that during the meeting, each man expressed his own views and assessments regarding the national issue. There has been no rapprochement of views. No new meeting between Kiprianou and Khrisostomos has been fixed.

We are informed that the initiative for the meeting came from a third party.

TAHSIN REPLIES TO GREEK CYPRIOT ALLEGATIONS

TA100618 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0500 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Health and Labor Minister Ozel Tahsin has called on the Greek Cypriots to give up their inhuman pressures on the Turkish Cypriot community in the event they want to live in a federation and under equal rights. Tahsin was replying to Greek Cypriot allegations that the high birth rate in the Turkish community could become a threat to them.

The minister recalled that the high rate of birth in the Turkish community was a development which began with the Turkish peace operation in Cyprus following the end of Greek Cypriot aggression and the return of the Turkish Cypriots who fled from the island due to the Greek Cypriot oppression and cruelty. Noting that the Turks never acted unless they were attacked, Tahsin said that the TFSC never discriminates against the Greek Cypriots.

TURKISH CYPRIOT REPLY TO CENTRAL BANK CRITICISM

TA100756 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1930 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] Turkish Cypriot representative in New York Nail Atalay has said that the establishment of a central and development bank in the TFSC and the introduction of the Turkish lira in the north were strictly the internal affair of the Federated State.

Atalay made this statement in a letter sent to UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar which was circulated as an official document among the UN General Assembly and Security Council members. The letter says that in their representations, the Greek Cypriots have completely distorted reality. Recalling that the TFSC was exercising its rights emanating from its responsibility to improve its economy and improve the living standards of its citizens, the letter adds that in order to achieve these goals, an efficient financial apparatus had to be set up.

The letter goes on to explain that the central bank to be established will be an important institution that will be responsible for determining the credit and flow of money policies of the Federated State, with acquiring the necessary funds, regulating the interest rates and with supervising foreign exchange activities and the proper functioning of the commercial banks in a bid to ensure a balanced economy.

The letter adds that this central bank would function with limited authority as a branch of a federal central bank, whose establishment would be possible in accordance with a solution to be attained through future negotiations. The letter concludes by saying that Greek Cypriot allegations to the effect that the establishment of such an institution would provide the Turkish Cypriot community with a new politcial status were unfounded.

BRIEFS

ACCORD WITH EEC -- Cyprus and the EEC today signed an agreement in Brussels for the financing of projects in Cyprus. The total cost of the projects is estimated at $12 million. The agreement covers the construction of the sewage system and the improvement of the water supply system of Nicosia. A statement by the EEC Executive Committee says that these projects are for the benefit of all the people of Cyprus. With these projects, the financing of the construction of projects in Cyprus is completed. These projects include the first phase of the expansion of the electrification and water supply systems of Nicosia, Larnaca and Famagusta. All these plans have been carried out on the basis of the protocol between Cyprus and the EEC with a total value of $33 million. [Text] [Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 9 Dec 82 NC]

KHARALAMBOPOULOS ADDRESSES NATO MEETING 9 DEC

[Text] The autumn session of the NATO foreign ministers opened in Brussels today. The first day of the meeting was held in camera. According to press reports, the main speaker was Danish Foreign Minister Ellemann-Jensen, who now chairs the NATO Ministerial Council.

Addressing the meeting, Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos put forward strong reservations and repeated the permanent Greek positions which, according to our Brussels correspondent, Nikos Avraam, will be included in tomorrow's joint communique and will refer to the question of deployment of new nuclear missiles on European territory. On this question, Kharalambopoulos stressed that every effort must be exhausted at the negotiating table for the limitation of strategic arms and for disarmament, questions which are being discussed in Geneva. The Greek foreign minister also stressed that it will only be possible through negotiations to achieve a de-escalation and preserve detente in order to bring about positive results.

Kharalambopoulos also expressed reservations on East-West relations in connection with certain economic measures that some member states are considering against the Soviet Union. The Greek foreign minister stated that our country will not be bound by any decision at which some studies could arrive in connection with this question.

Kharalambopoulos also stressed the role that public opinion and peace movements are playing in the crucial issues of our era, pointing out that public opinion must be seriously taken into consideration. He also noted the situation prevailing in the Third World and the significance of the dialogue between North and South in relation to the aid that must be given to Third World states.

MILLIYET ON DRAFT LAW FOR POLITICAL PARTIES

[Excerpts] Ankara (Special) -- The Constitutional Commission Subcommittee of the Consultative Assembly has worked out the main principles of the prospective political parties law. According to the views expressed in the subcommittee reports, which have not yet been amalgamated, such matters as the establishment of democracy within the party, the settlement of financial issues and interparty relations will be extensively dealt with in the law.

According to the draft law, political parties can be founded without prior permission. The chief prosecutor of the republic will check on the parties' programs and regulations as well as on the legal aspects of the question in light of the Constitution and the laws. Meanwhile, the activities of the political parties will be watched over by the office of the chief prosecutor.

Fellow countrymen who have attained the age of 21 will be entitled to become members of political parties. In accordance with the binding provisions of the Constitution, the programs and regulations of the political parties shall not run counter to the indivisible integrity of the state and nation, to human rights, to national sovereignty and to the democratic and secular principles of the republic. No political party shall be founded which would aim at the establishment of sovereignty of a class or group or which would advocate the establishment of a dictatorship.

The principles governing the organization of political parties will be regulated in accordance with the principles embodied in the Constitution. Accordingly, the parties will not be permitted to organize and operate outside the fatherland nor will they be permitted to form such ancillary organizations as a women's branch or youth branch. Moreover, political parties will not be allowed to maintain political relations or to cooperate with associations, trade unions, religious trusts, cooperative societies or other professional organizations for the purpose of furthering and strengthening their policies. Political parties will also be prohibited from exchanging material aid with such organizations.

The draft law will also dwell on the responsibility of political party members. Party members will share the responsibility for the party's administrative organ. A party member who realizes that the program and regulations of the party are violated by the administration will be entitled to press charges against his party.

It has been learned that interparty relations will also be given due consideration in the draft law.

COMPULSORY VISAS FOR POLISH CITIZENS EXTENDED

AU091039 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 9 Dec 82 p 1

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "Ewi"]

[Summary] The temporary regulation providing for compulsory visas for Polish citizens, which was issued a year ago -- 1 week before the proclamation of martial law in Poland -- will be extended. "This was declared by Interior Minister Erwin Lanc. He stressed that 'Austria will wait and see how things develop in Poland,' and explained the motives of this Austiran policy by saying "we cannot be the only country to pursue a policy totally different from all others.' rather, he said it is necessary to take guidance from similar entry restrictions of other European countries, for example, Sweden.

"In the minister's opinion, the abolition of martial law in Poland, which is expected in the next few days, is no reason for Austria to return to the policy of unrestricted entry. 'This is not merely a question of martial law, which can be nominally abolished without any other changes,' Lanc declared in reply to a question by DIE PRESSE."

He added, however, that Austria has been issuing visas even following the introduction of the visa regulations. In the year since the issuance of the visa regulations, a total of 1,600 Poles have been recognized as applicants for political asylum. At present, more than 9,000 refugees are registered in Austria, two-thirds being Polish. Austria has spent 1.5 billion schillings on care for refugees during the past 12 months.

PRIME MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON NATO STAND

DW101103 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Interview with Spanish Prime Minister Philipe Gonzalez by Karl-Heinz Wilsing in Madrid, in Spanish with superimposed German translation -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Prime Minister, why will Spain decline to sign the final communique in Brussels?

[Answer] We will not sign the communique. I am told that it contains a paragraph on medium-range missiles. Spain must now first review its own interests in all calmness. In so doing, we do not intend to pursue a policy of not talking. We are receptive to talks in every area, but we must, of course, abstain from voting because of a commitment in the communique which we cannot and must not approve. This is in keeping with the new policy which I announced in my government program.

OFFICIAL GROMYKO VISIT SCHEDULED FOR 16-18 JAN

LD121232 Hamburg DPA in German 1019 GMT 12 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 12 Dec (DPA) -- Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko will come to Bonn from 16 to 18 January for an official visit. This was announced by the foreign office in Bonn today.

Gromyko was invited by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher. Genscher met Gromyko on the periphery of the UN General Assembly in New York in October and extended the invitation at that time.

BUNDESTAG TO BE DISSOLVED IF 17 DEC VOTE FAILS'

LD111400 Hamburg DPA in German 1219 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 11 Dec (DPA) -- On Monday, Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl will explain for the first time to a broader audience the method he has chosen to bring about new elections, before also making a written application on Monday, to the Bundestag president for a vote of no confidence in accordance with Article 68 of the Basic Law. Kohl is to address the CDU/CSU Bundestag group on Monday afternoon. Then he will chair a cabinet meeting where he will also explain his precedure.

Kohl intends to ask President Karl Carstens to dissolve the Bundestag if, as is his intention, he does not receive majority support for the vote of confidence on Friday.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON DUAL DECISION, GENEVA TALKS

LD101242 Hamburg DPA in German 1130 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- In a strongly-worded appeal to the opposition, Defense Minister Manfred Woerner called upon the SPD to keep to "joint principles" in adherence to the NATO dual decision because in that case "there will be a real and serious chance." In a disarmament debate on Friday, at the end of which the Bundestag unanimously ratified the two worldwide treaties on the total ban on bacteriological weapons and warfare affecting the environment, the dual decision and the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles were the focus of Woerner's speech.

Woerner pointed to "the great common responsibility of all parties" to adopt an unequivocal attitude. "Only if the Soviet Union does not for 1 second doubt our readiness to counterarm in the event that it does not dismantle its missiles can things go well," the minister said. Such a clear pressure to negotiate, together with the economic strains which Moscow also has to bear, strengthens his belief in the chances of success in Geneva, Woerner said. One has to repeatedly speak to the Soviets "of our justified security interests also." The USSR knows perfectly well that there is no threat of war from the FRG, which can afford the appropriate defense capability only "with the greatest of effort." The Federal Government also has to make this clear to the peace movement.

Woerner rejected opposition doubts about the U.S. will to negotiate and said that the comprehensive U.S. information on the course of the Geneva talks leaves "no room for doubt about the supreme U.S. interest in a successful negotiation."

SPD thoughts about a security partnership with the Soviet Union were rejected by Woerner under the present circumstances. One can talk about this when Moscow has also taken Bonn's security interests into account. The most important step in this will be the removal of the Soviet SS-20 medium-range missiles, which threaten the FRG above all.

KOHL, WEIZSAECKER ATTEND BERLIN CONFERENCE

[Excerpts] Berlin, 10 Dec (DPA) -- Welcoming the participants at a 2-day economic conference, Governing Mayor of West Berlin Richard von Weizsaecker emphasized the "national task" of Berlin for all Germans. During a dinner at Schloss Bellevue, at which Chancellor Hulmut Kohl also participated, Weizsaecker said this is not only a question of balancing out West Berlin's location disadvantages, as is often believed in the remaining federal area. The most important part of this task lies in relations between the two German states and the contribution which "Berlin makes for 75 million people".

At the dinner in Schloss Bellevue on the occasion of the Berlin economics conference, Chancellor Helmut Kohl called on leading representatives of German industry and leading trade unionists to give a new impetus to Berlin. "I am asking you quite simply for solidarity with this city. I believe we should be capable as patriots, and while looking at our own concerns, of not forgetting the whole". Kohl emphasized that strengthening Berlin's economic power is urgently called for because in the last 12 years, 35 percent of industrial jobs have been lost. He expressed satisfaction that the allies had emphatically recognized the significance of Berlin as an industrial location.

Economic Viability, TASS Criticism

LD111452 Hamburg DPA in German 1327 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Berlin, 11 Dec (DPA) — Chancellor Helmut Kohl has stressed the national significance of the preservation of Berlin's economic viability. At the end of a conference in Berlin on the investigation of economic measures for the city, which was attended by top representatives of the economy and politics, Kohl told journalists on Saturday that Berlin has to "get away from its gloom about the future."

It is vitally important not to lose sight for a second of the overall responsibility of the nation for Berlin, Kohl said. The FRG's free existence also stands or falls by Berlin. On Friday evening, the chancellor called on top industrialists and trade unionists to give fresh impetus to Berlin. The strengthening of the city's economic capacity is urgently necessary.

Kohl said that another economic conference is to take place in Berlin in a year's time.

The chancellor strongly rejected criticism of the conference by the Soviet TASS news agency. The conference is a "work of peace" and not a provocation, Kohl said.

GENSCHER ANALYZES BRUSSELS NATO MEETING

LD101938 Hamburg DPA in German 1752 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- At the NATO meeting in Brussels, the Bonn formula of the "politics of the outstretched hand" toward the East had been reaffirmed, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher noted on Friday. In five different interviews with German radio and television organizations, which the Foreign Ministry published together, Genscher analyzed the conference in Brussels, which had brought "real encouragement" for NATO.

Genscher affirmed that this Ospolitik meant showing "openness to positive developments on the basis of firmness in the matter." He could only hope that this stance would be correctly assessed by the new leadership in Moscow.

CDU/CSU Spokesman Welcomes Results

LD101734 Hamburg DPA in German 1627 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- The CDU/CSU welcomes the results of the Brussels meeting of NATO foreign ministers. In Bonn today, foreign policy spokesman of the CDU/CSU parliamentary group Volker Ruehe said that the meeting showed NATO is united, predictable [berechenbar], capable of acting and prepared to hold a dialogue. It is now up to the Soviet Union to reply to the Western offer to improve East-West relations in all means with tangible proof of good will. Ruehe emphasized the "clear declaration of support for the NATO dual decision in both its part". He sees this as a unique chance to reach true disarmament and to banish far-reaching land-based medium-range missiles from the arsenals of East and West.

Commentator Views NATO Conference

[Commentary signed Ein.]

[Text] A NATO council meeting is like a session of a gentlemen's club. The careful formulation of difficult questions is a part of the alliance's unwritten laws. The new Spanish foregin minister was able to exploit this climate. He explained his country's hesitation to immediately fully cooperate with the alliance without experiencing any serious doubts. Everyone believed him when he said that his government, just a few days old, hadn't yet had the time to thoroughly consider the issue of the Atlantic alliance. The ministers also didn't consider it extraordinary when he requested that this reluctance be contained in a footnote to the communique.

Noble action doesn't mean, however, that NATO is basically evading current problems. It is expected, for example, that the great moderator, Secretary General Luns, will speak firmly if necessary. Luns considers himself a link between the "soft" Europeans and the "hard" Americans in forming a united front. The debacle over the pipe deal and the dispute over the natural gas pipeline shouldn't happen again. Not least of all, NATO dual decision is also involved. The desire to negotiate has been sufficiently demonstrated by the alliance. The West has often enough repeated that it will counterarm only if Soviet inflexibility forces it to.

Now the military part of the 1979 decision should be approached with similar zeal. The Americans ought to pressure the Pershing II producers to move ahead regarding technical production. The Europeans, on the other hand, should prepare the deployment areas in such a way that they can be used immediately if need be. They should also resolve the financial problem involving counterarmament. The Danish example is horrifying, but the way Holland and Belgium are delaying the decision is also slowly becoming embarrassing. All the foreign ministers must now tell their governments what Genscher had to say about the dual decision -- that its implementation must also be considered a test of the alliance. There is no doubt that if the alliance were to yield to the pressure of the Soviet Union by not unanimously supporting the deployment of the new weapons systems, the American partner would be forced to undergo a painful reexamination of its strategy.

COMMITTEE APPROVES GRANTS TO TURKEY, GREECE

LD102024 Hamburg DPA in German 1531 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA) -- The Bundestag's Budget Committee has approved a grant of DM130 million to Turkey within the framework of NATO defense aid. The SPD opposed the grant. A further grant of DM170 million to Greece was unanimously approved by all three Bundestag groups.

Thus, according to the Parliamentary Press Office today, the Budget Committee has complied with the recommendations of the Bundestag Foreign Affairs Committee. While the CDU/CSU Bundestag group said developments in Turkey provide "grounds for hope," the SPD Bundestag group will only agree when the human rights situation in Turkey has improved.

LATE REPORT: KOHL BEGINS ELECTION PROCEEDINGS

Lebanon's Salim Makes Statement

NC111946 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 1900 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Dr Elie Salim met in Paris this afternoon with his French counterpart, Claude Cheysson. Following the meeting, Minister Salim said it was a good opportunity for him to meet with his excellency, Minister of External Relations Claude Cheysson and to directly feel the deep and cordial friendship between France and Lebanon. He added that Lebanon has many international friendships. However, Lebanon's friendship with France is of a special character. I have no doubt that this friendship will be translated into action and policies that reflect well on Lebanon and to France. I am very optimistic about this meeting. I have no doubt that Lebanon is receiving the required and deserved support from France. Lebanon is expecting much from France, and it is full of hope that France will be by its side during the decisive phase of its history. All these hopes are sound and deserve all the Lebanese' awareness that France is actually with them and is always with them in service to fairness, not only to Lebanon, but in service to fairness and justice for all the peoples who are in need of the implementation of fairness in their territories and countries. France has been and is still aligned with the just issues in the world, and Lebanon's issue is a just one. France's support for Lebanon stems from the fact that Lebanon is undergong a just phase and deserves a just stance from the large states that believe in freedom. France is not only heralding freedoms and rights; it actually follows up these freedoms and rights and secures their implementation.

DEFENSE MINISTRY COMMUNIQUE ON MILITARY DEBATE

[Unattributed report: "An Explanation From the Defense Ministry"]

[Text] In a communqiue issued this Monday morning, 6 December, the Defense Ministry gives the following details: "In the context of the preparation of the forthcoming military programming law, the general staffs, the General Directorate of the Gendarmerie, and the General Commission for Armaments are being regularly consulted by the Armed Forces General Staff at the minister's request and have been since early July. The document published [Footnote: a reference to General Delaunay's letter] is one of many working documents whose assessments and conclusions cannot be regarded as final. Moreover, new studies have been requested. During a recent meeting with some junior officers' representatives, [presidents] the army chief of staff himself has expressed different opinions [Footnote: Speaking in Agen, General Delaunay called on the officers to remain cool, calm and confident because the Army "will continue to have an important place in our security system"]. In any case, these various documents and viewpoints cannot bind the Defense Ministry nor prejudice the decisions which will ultimately be taken at the appropriate time."

Hernu on Secret Documents Issue

He pointed out that as yet, the inquiry has not been able to determine the source of the leak.

Paper Cites 'Confidential' Letter

PM091607 Paris LE MATIN in French 6 Dec 82 p 4

[Extracts from confidential letter sent by French Army Chief of Staff Gen Jean Delaunay to Armed Forces Chief of Staff Gen Jeannou Lacaze on 9 October 1982: "Very Heavy Sacrifices"]

[Text] Army Chief of Staff General Delaunay to Armed Forces Chief of Staff General Lacaze.

Subject: 1984-1988 planning.

Paris, 9 October 1982.

In sending you the documents required by your planning directive of 10 February 1982, I expressed my acute anxiety at the sacrifices being asked of the Army and the serious consequences they would have for it. That anxiety is seriously aggravated by the basic facts adopted by the 30 July 1982 directive for the preparation of the 1984-1988 military plan. It prescribes for me a reduction of more than 30,000 men and a new deduction of Fr 11 billion from the resources allocated to equipment for the 1984-1988 period. Coming in addition to the Fr 3.7 billion canceled in the 1982 budget, and my anxieties for funds at the beginning of the period inspired by the 1983 budget's inadequate program authorization and payment appropriations, this new reduction in resources forces me to draw your attention to the seriousness of the situation being created.

I have already sent a personal letter to the defense minister informing him of my concern and requesting that the Army not suffer the cuts with which it is threatened. However, I have carried out the study required by the 30 July directive in a complete spirit of discipline. It led first to a proposal for a new way of organizing the Army and second to the updating of former planning work on the basis of the financial hypotheses adoped. I am presenting my personal conclusions here.

Operational organization:

...However, the constraints imposed are such that if the basic hypotheses are accepted, they will lead not to a mere change, but rather to a fundamental transformation of the Army. The study of the new model has been based on a size of around 280,000 men, corresponding to the reduction of 30,000 men plus the transfer of conscripts to the gendarmerie in 1983. In fact, the reduction imposed will take the form of a reorganization relating to even higher numbers, since the Army must also absorb the recent measures taken in the sphere of manning (creation of posts for ensuring the security of installations, new missions on behalf of bodies outside the Army, staff corresponding to the entry into service of new equipment).

Thus, compared with the present structures, the Army loses its III Army Corps, its 2d Armored Division and an infantry division.

The future divisions would probably be larger than the existing ones, but that development would have the effect of reducing both the overall operational capability and the flexibility of use. The elimination of the III Army Corps would in particular irremediably fix action on the initial directions of engagement. The consequences of this abandonment should be carefully considered.

In these very severe cutbacks, the "environment" is naturally required to contribute to the effort demanded. But since it was already considerably cut back during the previous reorganization, it could only tolerate limited reductions. Thus, the forces would take the bulk of the manning cuts imposed.

Staff:

...The restructuring, which would take the form of the dissolution of around 30 regiments, would, at the present stage of the studies, lead to the abandonmnet of around 20 garrisons and a reduction in the miltiary presence in around 12 others (these forecasts do not take account of the barrack accommodations which would be transferred to the National Gendarmerie).

Financial Prospects:

... The 1984-1988 planning, based on very severe financial hypotheses for defense (maintenance of the 3.895 percent of the gross commercial domestic product), constitutes a real departure from the 1977-1982 programming. Indeed, the Army's share falls from 27.9 percent (forecasts in the 1976 law) or 27.23 percent (implementation of the law) to 26.57 percent (1984-1988 planning). Within that overall package the ratio between Section 3 and Section 5 [Footnote: Section 3 comprises administrative spending and Section 5 equipment spending] (administration and equipment) is certainly improved, but the necessary means are not provided for improving the content and conditions of service, implementing a differentiated service, including a plan for the security of installations, and executing possible rapid assistance operations. However, experience has taught me that it is always the Section 5 funds which make up for shortages in Section 3.

Equipment:

... All these sacrifices are a heavy burden. Far from preparing forces which are "more compact and better equipped," the July hypotheses lead to an Army with reduced numbers, weaker structures, older equipment and undermined morale. Although the 1st Army, in the event of conflict in Europe, is still the main fighting force this side of the nuclear threshold, it is the force which will inevitably suffer the main cutbacks.

Conclusion: ...Once again I request that such sacrifices not be imposed on the Army. I have tried to show you, on the one hand, the disproportion between the savings obtained by the reduction in manning levels and the resulting loss of efficiency and, on the other hand, the intolerable nature of the combination of this measure and the cancelation of equipment.... Finally, I suggest that the Army's future should not be irremediably decided on merely on the basis of medium-term financial hypotheses. Indeed, it seems to me that the profound change to which they lead should be placed in the politcial and strategic framework of an overall defense consideration.

SENATE PASSES CONFIDENCE VOTE IN NEW GOVERNMENT

LD112312 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 2300 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Summary] The Senate has passed a vote of confidence in the new Fanfani government with 176 votes in favor and 116 votes against.

Fanfani Government Platform

AU102018 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 10 -- Strengthening Western solidarity and economic recovery at home were named as the two major policy aims of the Italian Government sworn in on December 1 in the platform statement read out to the Senate today by Premier Amintore Fanfani to begin confidence debate in Parliament.

The Christian Democrat premier, who leads a coalition of his own party of relative majority, the third ranking Socialists and the small Social Democrat and Liberal Parties, declared that his government intends to work for European unity, for reforging Europe's relations with the United States and for the development of an East-West dialogue.

Italy's identity as a Mediterranean nation and strengthening relations of friendship and cooperation with the countries of the region for the achievement of "stable conditions of peace" were also singled out by the premier as major foreign policy objectives.

In this connection, Fanfani said that priority will be given in this area to the search for a global settlement of the Middle East crisis. "To include recognition of the right of existence of Israel and the Palestinian people," and for restoring Lebanese independence and sovereignty. Referring to the Italian contingent in the multinational peace-keeping force in Beirut, the premier said the Rome government "would consider a limited increase" of its troop strength in Lebanon.

Turning to domestic policy, the premier said that economic policy will be based on the requirement to contain the soaring national debt of over 50 billion dollars for the current year and restore health to the economy afflicted by the worldwide economic downturn.

The goal of the executive, Fanfani said, will be to hold state spending down under the level of 50 billion dollars. He described the finance bills prepared by the preceding government as "no longer sufficient" and said they would be modified through the application of "immediate measures" for the reduction of spending and increasing state income.

The spending cuts outlined in the platform were mainly in the areas of health care and pension benefits and included proposed legislation for reducing public health services, eliminating wasteful expenditures in the sector, a revision of the payments to public health doctors and hospitals and a clampdown on those eligible for pension benefits. Further cuts will be applied in the fields of defense, education and in the Finance Ministry.

The premier announced new taxes on income from real estate, to be turned over to the municipalities, and confirmed plans for legislation to prepare the way for new municipal taxes in 1984.

On the same front, business and industry, professionals, farmers and others not on a fixed income will be hit by a "one shot" tax next year.

Future taxation, the premier pointed out, will depend on the outcome of the ongoing battle against tax evasion and on credit policy.

Wages, according to the document, must remain under the ceilings laid down for inflation in the coming years, 13 percent for 1983 and 10 percent for the following year. In this connection, the government will promote negotiations for agreements on national labor contracts and changes for the automatic indexation mechanism linking wages to the rising cost of living. These agreements should be forged before January 20, and to facilitate the bargaining, the government will revamp the tax brackets for salaried workers to lighten the increasing load on inflation-swollen income and will continue taking on a part of the employers burden of health and pension benefits.

Referring to institutional reforms, one of the major planks in the platform of the government replaced by Fanfani's coalition, the premier recommended a "rereading" of the Constitution by Parliament and the government to prepare for restructuring institutions to make them more respond to their purposes and to "upgrade the principles of participation" behind the democratic system.

Other areas of the platform contained a commitment to follow through on the battle against terrorism and organized crime in the form of the mafia and the camorra in Naples, and will adopt drug control measures.

It was learned that the Republican Party, whose secretary, Giovanni Spadolini, led two governments between June last year and November this year, will abstain in the confidence vote.

Economic Proposals Outlined

LD102048 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Gian Battista Fenu report from Italian Senate]

[Excerpt] The debate on Prime Minister Fanfani's policy speech opened with a speech by opposition Senator Claudio Napoleoni of the independent left, who was followed by Socialist Paolo Barsacchi and Araldo Crollalanza of the Italian Social Movement. The debate is expected to end tomorrow evening after Fanfani's speech in reply and the passing of a vote of confidence.

In his speech this morning after a meeting of the government to give his ministers a preview of the policy speech, Fanfani especially emphasized economic matters without neglecting foreign policy. This will remain the same as previous governments with particular attention paid to the Mediterranean, institutional reforms, and the fight against terrorism, organized crime and drugs.

Outlining his economic policy, which in principle remains that of the preceding Spadolini government and the five-party majority, Fanfani stressed the gravity of the situation which, he said, does not allow for any postponements.

He then reiterated the fundamental urgency of reducing the public deficit, which this year reached 70 trillion lire, and reducing inflation to 13 percent in 1983 and 10 percent in 1984.

He then confirmed the taxation proposals already indicated in the financial law. Among these measures will be the recovery of 7 trillion lire by means of a once-and-for-all tax on self-employed people and an additional tax on income from property, [words indistinct], increased charges for public services, and others. Other measures include investments to defend jobs and increase production and to implement energy, communications, transportation, and housing construction projects.

With regard to the latter, Fanfani announced in advance the construction of 235,000 new dwellings within 4 years, giving work to approximately 250,000 workers.

In the social security sector, pensions paid to former civil servants will be equalized within 2 years and there will be no ceiling on measures aimed at maintaining minimum pensions. Management and trade unions are urged to reach agreement by 20 January on the cost-of-living index and the cost of labor. For its part, the government pledges to reduce the fiscal burden on workers and to help businesses through the fiscalization of social security contributions. Speeches made so far in the debate have confirmed expected positions.

SHULTZ ARRIVES; TO MEET PERTINI, FANFANI, POPE

BULGARIAN AMBASSADOR LEAVES FOR 'CONSULTATIONS'

NC101800 Paris AFP in English 1735 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Rome, Dec 10 (AFP) -- The Bulgarian ambassador here, Venelin Kotsev, returned to Sofia yesterday for "routine consultations", an embassy spokesman said today. The spokesman denied that Mr Kotsev had been recalled by his country's authorities and said he would be back within the week.

Yesterday a Turkish drug smuggler wanted for questioning over the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II in May 1981 was arrested in the Bulgarian capital. The man, Bechir Celenk, was the subject of an international arrest warrant issued two weeks ago by Italian Magistrate Illario Martella investigating a conspiracy to kill the pontiff.

Italian Ambassador Called Home

AU111927 Rome ANSA in English 1916 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 11 -- Italy's ambassador in the Bulgarian capital of Sofia Carlo Rossi Arnaud was called home, today for consultations by Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, according to Foreign Ministry sources.

The sources gave no explanation of the move, but observers presumed it was related to the Italo-Bulgarian tensions after charges against Bulgarian officials for complicity in the attempt on Pope John Paul II's life in May last year.

The Bulgarian officials hit by arrest warrants from Roman Judge Ilario Martella are Balkan air functionary Sergey Antonov, Embassy official Vasiliyev Kolev, who has returned home, and another Embassy official Teodorov Ayvazov, who enjoys diplomatic immunity, but has also returned home. The Bulgarian ambassador in Rome Venelin Kotsev left Rome for Sofia Thursday, officially for consultations.

More on 'Bulgarian Connection'

AU101550 Rome ANSA in English 1537 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 10 -- The Bulgarian connection turned up by Italian magistrates investigating the shooting of Pope John Paul II last year took over the front pages of the nation's dailies today in reports and editorial comment on the fast pace of developments in the case.

The respected Milan daily, CORRIERE DELLA SERA, under the headline, "The Bulgarian Case' Is Red Hot", reported that "the two lines of the investigation appear to be converging", the one based on statements made by Mehmet Ali' Agca, the self-styled Turkish terrorist serving a life sentence for the assassination attempt, and the one based on revelations made by Luigi Scricciolo, jailed on charges of aiding and abetting the Red Brigades kidnapping of U.S. General James Lee Dozier, "The network of plots apparently has one center, one command center, the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome."

In its editorial on the developments, the paper said that "the investigation into the attempt on the pope's life" of May 13 last year is unlike that into any other act of terrorism. "If behind the Turkish would-be assassin the Bulgarian secret services were acting, this must have a precise meaning. It means that the attempt was authorized, if not inspired, by the Soviet Union".

The comment went on to conclude that, "this, in turn, means the danger to the empire of the East represented by the person of Pope John Paul appears so great that there was a reason to attempt to assassinate him".

The left-of-center Rome paper, LA REPUBBLICA, said in straight-forward comment: "The big news is this, the secret services of the Soviet Union commissioned the Bulgarians to kill the Polish pope. Stalin is dead and mummified but confidence in terror and violence as a way to resolve political problems persists. This is also implied by the fact that the world's leading socialist nation has two political police chiefs at its summit, that is, men from the apparatus for repression and terrorism."

LA STAMPA of Turin referred to the case of the union official, Luigi Scricciolo, imprisoned since February and now reportedly turning states evidence in discussing his ties with the Bulgarian secret services with the investigators.

"The magistrates are convinced that Scricciolo used his contacts with the leader of the Polish Solidarnosc free trade union movement, Lech Walesa, to gather information and pass it on to Bulgaria... One of the working hypothesis is that Scricciolo helped push Solidarnosc towards a more radical position to give legitimacy to harsher repression. Also Walesa's trip to Italy, organized by Scricciolo himself, fit into this tactic," according to the STAMPA editorial.

From a different angle, the leader of the UIL Trades Union Federation, Giorgio Benvenuto, said that he was "shocked" to learn that he had worked for years with a man who turns out to be a spy in an interview appearing in LA REPUBBLICA.

The union leader said that for months after Scricciolo was arrested he fully believed that the case against him was based only on a "series of dramatic coincidences".

"He certainly had contact with Sofia before coming into the UIL in 1979" Benvenuto said and added, "but as regards his relations with the Bulgarians and his alleged ties to the Red Brigades, I am not in a position to add one word... As a union, we would like to know what role the Eastern countries played in the tense period between 1976 and 1979 and whether they financed ultraleft groups (in Italy)".

The UIL leader concluded by asking for the direct intervention in the matter by an "Italian Government which can no longer sit at the window and look out".

Referred to the alleged Bulgarian connection to the big arms and drug traffic network uncovered in the north of Italy, Benvenuto said, "the investigation into the attempt on the pope's life and into the arms and drug traffic are all revolving around Sofia. We would like the government to declare all the Bulgarian diplomats in the country persona non grata and take up the problem of an embassy which is a spy center and a source of destabilization".

Further Press Coverage

AU111941 Rome ANSA in English 1925 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 11 -- Numerous new revelations appeared in the Italian press today asserting that the international conspiracy behind last year's assassination attempt against the Polish-born pope was directed at undermining the Solidarnosc independent trade union in Poland. The latest revelations came amid a mounting furor over the Bulgarian connection in the shooting in St. Peter's Square and speculation that the Bulgarian secret services organized and planned the attack but that the master-mind was the Soviet KGB.

Turin's daily "LA STAMPA" said today that destabilization of Poland -- for the ultimate return into the Soviet orbit -- as the real purpose of the papal assassination attempts was revealed by jailed Italian trade union leader Luigi Scricciolo, arrested on charges of aiding and abetting the Red Brigades who kidnapped U.S. General James Lee Dozier.

Turk Mehmet Ali Agca, caught minutes after the shooting and serving a life sentence in an Italian jail, is said to have begun revealing the names of Bulgarian diplomats who allegedly gave him logistical support in Rome and were to have provided him with a safe getaway. One Bulgarian, Balkan Airlines employee Ivanov Antonov, is in jail in Rome. Arrest warrants have been issued against two Bulgarian diplomats, believed to have returned to the homeland, and against five Turks, one of whom, Bechir Celenk, has been arrested in Sofia.

According to the reports appearing in the press today, by killing the Polish pope and by spying on and discrediting the first independent trade union in an East bloc nation with help from Scricciolo, the Bulgarian secret services hoped to level a fatal blow on Polish hopes for democratication.

Articles in "LA STAMPA" and Milan daily "IL GIORNO" contain a great deal of speculation based on anonymous sources and not confirmed by officials investigating both the papal shooting and the Scricciolo affair.

"LA STAMPA" said that "magistrates are working on the theory that Scricciolo played a key role in the attack against Solidarnosc". In reference to the arrest of all major leaders of the Polish union on December 13 last year with the imposition of martial law, the paper went on to say that "it is believed that Bulgarian agents sent Scricciolo to Warsaw in December 1980 to spy" on Lech Walesa and the union. The paper went on to observe that it is not a coincidence that Scricciolo was the first Western trade union leader to gain access to Poland in that period.

No one seemed surprised, starting with the secretary of Scricciolo's union, the UIL, Giorgio Benvenuto, who a few days ago asserted he is "overwhelmed" that he worked side by side with a spy without ever suspecting anything.

Scricciolo successfully won the trust of Polish union leaders, Walesa in particular and he personally organized Walesa's trip to Italy in January 1981.

According to "LA STAMPA", one of the theories gaining ground is that Walesa was to have been killed in Italy. Investigators suspect, according to the paper, that the Bulgarian entrusted Scricciolo with a complicated task, half-way between a spy and "agent provocateur": the information the Soviet secret services particularly wanted was the source of Solidarnoc's international financing with the aim of waging a campaign to discredit the union and justify repression.

The Rome daily "IL MESSAGGERO" carried an article, headlined "How He Betrayed Solidarnosc Just a Few Hours After the End of its First Congress", which said that "Luigi Scricciolo probably presented his last complete report to Eastern secret services on September 7 last year", before he returned to Italy after attending the first Solidarnosc Congress in Gdansk.

According to the paper, Scricciolo was held at the airport for more than one hour by Polish police but he was very vague with the other members of the union delegation about the questions he had been asked.

"Italian investigators believe that the interrogation was a pretext to get Scricciolo away from the other members of the delegation so that he could collaborate without waiting to return to Italy".

Turkey's HURRIYET Comments

[Excerpt] (ANSA)-- Ankara December 12 -- One of the five Turkish nationals hit with Italian and Interpol arrest warrants signed by Rome magistrates investigating the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II is in the Bulgarian capital of Sofia enjoying the protection of the secret police and, as opposed to what Bulgaria has announced, "is not under arrest", according to the big Turkish daily, HURRIYET.

A story filed by the Sofia correspondent and carried in the Sunday edition of the nation's largest circulation newspaper affirmed that the man described by Italian magistrates as a member of the Turkish "mafia", Bechir Celenk, "is boldly going about his business in his headquarters in the Vituscia Hotel in Sofia under secret police protection and, despite the official Bulgarian declaration, he is not under arrest".

Celenk has been on the Turkish police and Interpol wanted list for years as an alleged arms trafficker. He is now wanted in Italy to face the charge of complicity in planning and carrying out the attempt on the life of the pope on May 13 last year.

The self-styled Turkish terrorist, Mehmet Ali Agca, was captured at the scene of the shooting in Saint Peter's Square and is now serving a life sentence here. The would-be assassin has recently begun cooperating with magistrates and has reportedly provided them with a detailed account of Bulgarian diplomats in Rome who allegedly gave him logistical support and were to have secured his escape route.

The HURRIYET, further challenging the Bulgarian note to the Italian Government reporting that the Turkish gun runner had been "stopped", insisted that Celenk "is treated as a guest of honor with speical attention from the Bulgarian information services.... He is living in a villa near Sofia the whereabouts of which has not been disclosed".

The Turkish daily went on to report that, "so that he will not suffer from solitude, his wife, Nilufer Kocyigit, is now living in a luxurious suite in the Vituscia Hotel, worthy of a king, and the apartment belongs to her husband.... She only goes there to sleep or for a change of clothing, however. During the day she is with her husband.

"The woman's movements are right out of a spy novel", the account continued. "Even the Bodyguards Bechir Celenk has in his personal service do not know how and when she comes and goes from the hotel. The men of the Buglarian secret service have, in fact, prohibited (these bodyguards) access to the sixth floor of the hotel and to the special lift which goes there".

Plot Against Walesa Denied

[Text] Rome, Dec 12 (AFP) -- Reports of a plot to kill Polish Solidarity leader Lech Walesa during his visit to Italy in January 1981 are "pure fantasy," an Italian anti-terrorist official said today.

The English-language Rome DAILY AMERICAN published here claimed Italian unionist Luigi Scricciolo had told police that he had discussed with Bulgarian intelligence a plan to use the Italian leftist Red Brigades to kill Mr Walesa in Rome. Mr Scricciolo is alleged by authorities here to have been the contact man between Bulgarian intelligence and the Red Brigades.

INDIAN EMBASSY DENIES CHARGES OF SPYING

[Excerpts] Rome, Dec 10 (AFP) -- The Indian Embassy here today formally denied reports that one of its employees had been expelled by the Italian Government on charges of spying. Several daily newspapers here reported that a member of the administrative staff at the Indian Embassy and an employee at the Soviet diplomatic mission had been asked to leave the country on Tuesday after being caught in the act of espionage. The Italian Foreign Ministry, however, has not denied the reports.

A communique from the Indian Embassy said the press accounts "are baseless." It continued: "The Indian Embassy is not aware of any demand from the Italian authorities about the expulsion of any of its personnel nor has any complaint been received against a member of its services for having committed any activities prejudicial to the security of Italy."

In its communique, the Indian Embassy charged that it was "calumnious and absurd to link, however obliquely, its name with the current judicial investigations into arms and drug traffic (in Italy) or into the attempt on the life of his holiness the pope, who is hailed with universal respect by the Indian people and in particular by the 12 million Roman Catholics in India."

TV PROJECTS OVERALL RESULTS OF LOCAL ELECTIONS

LD130148 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Summary] On the basis of the votes counted so far, Portuguese television has just given a computer projection of the final overall distribution of votes among the various political forces contesting today's local elections. It shows the Democratic Alliance polling approximately 42.5 percent as opposed to the 47.3 percent it won in the 1979 local elections; the Socialist Party 32.1 percent as opposed to the 27.2 percent it polled in 1979; and the United People's Alliance 19.8 percent compared with the 20.9 percent it won in 1979.

Progress Report

LD130520 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0500 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Here is a progress report on overall election figures with the votes having been counted in 3,333 of the 4,050 parishes. The Democratic Alliance — or its component parties running alone -- has an overall 44.2 percent of the vote. The Socialist Party has 30 percent and the United People's Alliance 19.7 percent.

Balsemao Press Conference

LD130428 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0300 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Press conference given by Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao at the headquarters of the Social Democratic Party in Lisbon — live]

[Text] [Balsemao] I wish to state that we in the Social Democratic Party [PSD] do not think that the Socialist Party can interpret these elections as a big victory. For one thing, though the final results are not yet in, the Democratic Alliance will poll approximately 42 to 42.5 percent of the overall vote, which in local elections is a noteworthy and positive result. Secondly, the Democratic Alliance controls many more municipalities than the Socialist Party, and I would like to point out that the PSD has more councils and elected mayors than the Socialist Party. It can be said that at best, the Socialists have merely regained some of the many municipalities they lost in 1979.

More to the point, what we in the PSD believe and the way we interpret the facts is that once more the voters have shown that they know how to choose and to differentiate between local elections and general legislative elections. What was in question here was the choice of representatives in the parishes and councils, and this is what the electorate has done. There were those who tried to turn these elections into a national referendum on the government's policies and a test of the viability of the Democratic Alliance. If you look at the overall percentages, the referendum result is there. If you consider it from the angle of each citizen's choice in his municipality, then the results show that the citizens knew what they were voting about and for whom they were voting.

I would further like to point out that the local elections have come in the wake of the revision of the Constitution and the passing of essential supplementary legislation such as, among others, the law on national defense and the law creating the constitutional tribunal, and that we are now entering a new phase which will demand the total commitment of each and every citizen and of the Democratic Alliance leadership. As far as the PSD is concerned, we are willing to make such a commitment since it was because of this commitment that we were elected to office and it will be on this commitment that we shall be judged in legislative elections in 1984.

In this connection we shall obviously have to talk among ourselves within the Democratic Alliance and also within the PSD itself. This we shall be doing today, Monday. I have already convened a meeting of the National Political Committee which will take place at 1500 and we shall subsequently be talking with our partners in the Democratic Alliance.

For the moment this is all I have to say. Thank you very much.

[Question] Would you care to reply to a few questions?

[Answer] I shall reply to three questions.

[Question] In that case, Dr Balsemao, I would like to ask you if you do not think that these elections will in some way change the political context, the balance of forces, since there have already been calls for the resignation of the prime minister and of the government.

[Answer] The opposition has been making it a practice for quite some time to demand the dismissal of the prime minister and of the government and even the dissolution of Parliament. In my opinion, this demand is no more legitimate now than it was before the elections. Our position is that we must put an end to this habit of turning transience into permanence, this habit of thinking that everything can be changed at any given moment, this habit of making the institutions and the functioning of democracy permanently subject to deadlines for which there is no provision in the Constitution. As we see it, the government has a term of office to serve. The majority is elected by means of legislative elections as was the case in 1980 and will again be the case in 1984. [passage indistinct]

[Question] Can we infer that the possibility of your resignation has been eliminated?

[Answer] When you say "eliminated" you make it sound as though it was there before, which is not the case. Thank you very much.

Soares on Elections

LD130556 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0200 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Press conference given by Mario Soares, secretary general of the Socialist Party, at party headquarters in Lisbon -- live]

[Excerpts] [Soares] To begin with, I would like to emphasize that this victory, these elections, in such bad weather as we had today, represents first and foremost a victory for democracy and for the civic spirit of the Portuguese people. Thankfully, the degree of abstention was not as high as was expected in view of the conditions, and such a high turnout is, in our opinion and before all else, a victory for the multiparty democracy that we have in Portugal.

Secondly, as far as we can judge on the basis of the results so far -- and we do not know all the results yet, but considering the projections and forecasts -- we can say that these elections represent a fundamental defeat for the Democratic Alliance [AD], for it has lost its majority. These elections have signaled the defeat of the AD, the defeat of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and especially the defeat of Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao.

I emphasize that -- as we pointed out during the election campaign -- the current prime minister never had to submit himself to an election as leader of the AD, and now, the first time that this has happened -- and as we expected -- he has lost.

The targets that the Socialist Party [PS] set itself have been hugely surpassed. The PS has seen a rise in its support. Indeed, we are the only political force with gains in these elections, since the AD has fallen significantly and the United People's Alliance has remained static, or even shown a slight tendency towards a small loss.

This victory of the PS is bascially the victory of a clear political line, the clear political line adopted by the PS following our fourth congress. It is also a victory that the PS embraces with the utmost sense of responsibility and the greatest serenity.

Ours was the only political force to fight alone, as a single party, against two coalitions, and even so it has emerged as the sole winner, be it with regard to the number of municipal councils and parishes gained, the number of seats gained or the overall percentage of the vote. We are, we have again become, Portugal's largest political party. This is now undeniable.

In conclusion: We shall now reflect on these results, taking heed of the national interest before anything else. This is a moment of great joy for us all, for it marks the party's greatest electoral gain since 1975. It does not stop us, however, from reflecting on the importance of this moment to the nation, nor from considering that above all a solution must be found to our great national problems. It is because of these national problems, of the situation of the Portuguese people, of the difficulties confronted by the Portuguese people, of the AD goverment's inability to resolve the national problems, that a replacement formula must be found. It will appear in due course.

[Question] Dr Mario Soares, do you think that the results already known and the projections made, which point to 42 percent for the AD and 32.4 percent for the PS, warrant the dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic and the holding of an interim parliamentary election? Or do you take the view that, should the projections be confirmed, that is to say, if the AD's poll does not fall below 41 percent, there might still exist, so to speak, a margin of alternatives with regard to interpreting the election results?

[Answer] First I wish to listen to what the prime minister has to say. And I appeal to the prime minister, to his sense of patriotism and democracy, in the hope that he will be the first to draw the conclusion made inevitable by these elections -- which he himself and the deputy prime minister described as a national political test, a test of the credibility of a government and a policy -- and act accordingly. The results are conclusive and I hope, first and foremost, that they may be the first to draw the respective conclusions.

Only should this fail to happen would the PS take a stand. And I would not wish to anticipate any conclusions. Obviously, we are standing by everything we said during the election campaign, but I wish first to hold a meeting of the party's Political Committee and possibly even of the National Committee so as to decide the course of action to take in the next few days.

[Question] Would you consider the possibility of talks, of an understanding between the country's two main parties, that is to say, the PS and the PSD?

[Answer] As we have always stated -- and this is the line laid down by our congress -- we shall not consider accepting any responsibilities of office without a new mandate from the electorate -- that is to say, without general legislative elections. We therefore take the view that any solution must entail new elections, a fresh consultation with the electorate. The Portuguese had their say today. I believe that such a say would be even more decisive in new legislative elections.

Cunhal Press Conference

LD130730 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0214 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Press conference held by Alvaro Cunhal, secretary general of the Portuguese Communist Party, at headquarters in Lisbon -- live]

[Excerpts] [Cunhal] Basically we believe that local democratic power will emerge strengthened from these elections, that a step has been taken in that direction in order to better ensure the defense of the interests of the people and the solution of their basic problems at the local government level, and we also regard them as a contribution -- a major contribution -- to bringing to an end the policy that the Democratic Alliance [AP] governments have been pursuing and to paving the way to a democratic solution, a democratic alternative.

Such are our views at this moment on the election results, which we believe serve to confirm two basic facts: namely, the loss of the AD's influence, the reduction of its basis of support; and, on the other hand, the rise in the influence of the democratic forces, namely, the United People's Alliance [APU].

[Question] [Words indistinct] does the APU regard the victory of the Socialist Party [PS] -- which the APU throughout its election campaign called PS Mario Soares as signaling the defeat of its own -- the APU's, that is -- electoral strategy? And considering that the second component of the APU's electoral strategy was (?turned against) the PS Mario Soares, and that this second component has been defeated at the polls, does this compromise any chances of leftwing unity, since the APU will be bound to find it difficult to achieve unity with the PS Mario Soares? And thirdly, what position does the APU think the president of the republic will adopt with regard to these election results?

[Answer] I think that there are two different things to consider: One is the significance of a vote cast; the other, the use that the recipient can make of that vote. With regard to the significance, the votes cast for the PS are very disparate. The PS received votes from people with very different ideas. What we stated often was that an increased vote for the PS might be seen by its leaders, more specifically by its secretary general, as a vindication -- which the votes in themselves are not -- of the policy he has been pursuing of alliances with the right. If the PS leadership regards the votes it has received as a vindication of the line it has pursued to date, and, if in the end, it uses them as justification for continuing the alliance it has forged with the AD, then in the final analysis it will be betraying the thousands of Portuguese who voted for it to take a stand against the right and will confirm apprehensions and warnings of such a danger, the danger of a voting intention being exploited in aid of a policy at odds with the said intention.

As to the unity of the left, this is an expression that has become somewhat worn out, especially in light of the experience of the last few years when we have seen a traditionally leftwing party, concretely the PS Mario Soares, pursuing a policy of alliances with the right. The expression unity of the left ceased to be adequate, and surely those who follow the activity of my party will recall that at a certain stage we stopped talking of unity of the left and started speaking of the need for unity of all democrats in defense of the gains of the April revolution and of the democratic regime.

Obviously, we continue to defend -- as we have always done -- the unity of all democrats. In the light of the new situation brought about by these elections, we shall be considering, in the party leadership and possibly even in a wider context, with our friends and allies, with all those who participated in our campaign -- not only our MDP-CDE [Portuguese Democratic Movement Democratic Electoral Commission] comrades, but the many independent democrats, for it is public knowledge that of the 60,000-odd APU candidates, some 30,000 were independents, which in itself is a huge mass of democrats -- we shall be considering, looking into, the new possibilities, the new prospects raised by these results.

With regard to the stand that the president of the republic may eventually adopt, it is a known fact that we regard it as a serious omission that the four steps we have long been demanding should not have been taken. These steps are the dismissal of the government, the dissolution of Parliament, the setting up of a caretaker government and the holding of early general elections within the constitutional 90-day deadline. We regard it as a big mistake that these steps were not taken as soon as the AD government took an unconstitutional, an illegal course of action, a violent course of action, a line of confrontation with the institutions themselves and of destruction of the democratic gains that are an integral part of the Portuguese democratic regime as enshrined in the Constitution of the republic, even after the revision to which it was subjected. We regard the president's failure to take these steps as a mistake, especially his failure to do so before a revision of the Constitution that has seriously endangered the Portuguese democracy. He still has the power to do it, however, and it is to be devoutedly wished that he does it while there still is time.

MORAN ON GIBRALTAR TALKS WITH PYM, NATO DECISION

LC111130 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 0700 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Excerpts] In Brussels yesterday, Minister of Foreign Affairs Fernando Moran and his British counterpart, Francis Pym, discussed the subject of Gibraltar. They agreed that talks will resume next spring. Here is a report from Angel Gomez Fuentes in Brussels:

[Gomez Fuentes] The decision to begin negotiations on Gibraltar next spring has been received with much satisfaction not only by the British and Spanish delegations, but also by other circles in the Altantic alliance. A few hours after his meeting with his British counterpart, Francis Pym, Spanish Foreign Minister Fernando Moran expressed his optimism in Brussels on observing the favorable response which has greeted the opening of the Gibraltar border to pedestrians.

The Spanish decision not to sign the final communique on the summit meeting of the Altantic alliance, which confirms the installation of Euromissiles, was accepted with an understanding of the position of the Socialist government of Felipe Gonzalez. The Spanish abstention was linked to an important measure which Foreign Minister Fernando Moran announced as follows at the NATO summit:

[Begin Moran recording] My government believes that it is in Spain's interest to halt the process of integration into the military structure with the aim of closely examining national interests from the viewpoint of defense. [end recording]

Some delegation spokesmen at the Atlantic summit described the Spanish position as honorable, firm and responsible. At the end of the press conference, Fernando Moran left the door wide open for the establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel if peace is achieved in the Near East.

In view of the reception which the Spanish foreign minister has been given at the NATO summit and of the initiatives which have been made, it can be said without any air of triumph that the results of this first appearance at an international meeting by the Socialist government have been completely positive.

AL-MAJALLAH INTERVIEWS MORAN ON FOREIGN POLICY

PM130801 London AL-MAJALLAH in Arabic 11-17 Dec pp 20-22

[Spanish Foreign Minister Fernando Moran interview with Shawqi Ar-Rayyis in Madrid -- date not given]

[Excerpt] [Question] I would like you to give us an idea of how the Spanish socialists, as a party, evaluate Spanish foreign policy during the past era and to tell us what new elements socialist rule will bring to this policy.

[Answer] We must first admit that for a long time Spanish foreign policy was influenced by a very negative factor with regard to international relations, namely a lack of confidence. The Spaniard suffers from an international inferiority complex that dates back to the middle of the last century. The isolation of General Franco's regime contributed to increasing this complex and to widening the chasm between Spain and the outside world. The isolation inherited from Franco's regime compelled the regime that has ruled for the past 5 years to confine its attention to achieving openness toward the international community, and consequently, it did not practice a foreign policy based on national interests as every foreign policy is supposed to do.

Moreover, there is a general weakness in the structure and activities of the bodies that are supposed to enhance Spanish presence abroad and develop relations with friendly and allied peoples and countries. With regard to what new elements the Socialist government will bring to this field, we will try, from the premise of our historical membership of the Western world, to acquire an identity that will prevent our being a "satellite" and whereby we can devote our resources to primarily serving the national interests. First among these interests will be strengthening and bolstering democracy in Spain, seeking to consolidate world peace and detente, and supporting a new world economic order. In addition to these general lines, there are, of course, specific issues and matters that are dictated by the geography and history of every state by virtue of its position, historical relations and political definition.

[Answer] Our policy with regard to the NATO alliance has always been clear and consistent. We are not against this alliance and we realize that world balance today is based on bloc policy. However, we do not support this policy, because it is national interests that are usually sacrificed in favor of the general and comprehensive strategy. We do not think it necessary for Spain to join NATO's military structure. Moreover, we do not believe it necessary to join because this will not increase our defense capabilities; rather, it could increase our risks. Moreover, it is possible for Spain to give the West what it needs within this framework without the need to be a member of the alliance. This can be done through bilateral relations and agreements, as in the case of France, for example. But, of course, we have come to power during certain and specific conditions; that is, after Spain became a NATO alliance member without yet joining its military structure. In principle, we will adhere to our stand and we will take no step toward joining the military machinery. Also, we will fulfill our promise that the Spanish people will give their view in a referendum to be held on this matter. As for when such a referendum takes place, the question requires some kind of political wisdom, if you wish, or political caution, since we cannot cause an international crisis and we do not want to add another factor that would threaten our internal stability. Therefore, I believe that a referendum will take place after a year or two, when conditions for holding it are suitable. During this time we will not enter the military part of the alliance, but will participate in its ministerial meetings in Brussels, without consolidating the policy of blocs in the world.

[Question] Can we expect a Spanish presence in NATO in the French or the Greek manner, or is there another type of link with the Western defense system that you wish to adopt?

[Answer] As you know, there are several types of links within the Atlantic organization, including, for instance, that followed by France, which is not included in the military structure and does not belong to the unified command. I believe that France's position is the nearest to what we want for Spain, but we may be able to achieve a special position for ourselves.

[Question] The question of Gibraltar is also one of those imposed by Spain's geographical position and history for more than 200 years. You promised to open the borders with the colony if you came to power, but it appears that negotiations with Britain have entered a difficult stage following the Falklands war.

[Answer] There is no doubt that the Falklands war was bad and negative for Argentina as well as for Britain, which sees things otherwise. Of course, Britain's position after this crisis became critical and complex with regard to the future of negotiations on lifting colonialism from Gibraltar in that Britain's stand became more inflexible. But I am personally convinced that this British position will tend toward more flexibility because it is difficult for Britain to maintain its military presence in places like Gibraltar, the Falklands and Hong Kong for long. We as a Socialist government will insist on demanding the restoration of sovereignty over Gibraltar to Spain, and we will step up this demand, but without punishing the inhabitants as a way to securing this demand. This is for human and moral reasons. This does not mean that the reopening of borders between Spain and Gibraltar will immediately lead to positive results, but we believe that continuing the dialogue with Britain is possible, and the Socialist government is prepared to begin negotiations at the first opportunity on the basis of the "Madrid Declaration."

[Question] Relations with France are also one of the sensitive and critical questions for Spain's foreign policy and one which has an immediate and sometimes dangerous influence on the internal situation, as for example in relation to cooperation in combating Basque terror, which is organized, launched and finds a safe haven in southern France. How do you view these relations now that socialists are simultaneously ruling in Paris and Madrid for the first time?

[Answer] Relations with France cannot be considered bad, but they have reached the lowest level of cooperation. There is the problem of Spanish agricultural exports to Europe, which are the target of attack by French farmers; this generates an atmosphere fraught with hostility toward France on various levels. There is also the question of terror, which in fact is the greatest and only danger to our democracy, and there is the question of our joining the Common Market, which French opposition is playing a major role in delaying. Previously, the prevailing belief was that Franco was the stumbling block to Spain's entry into the EC and that this entry would take place after Franco's death, and it was thought that economic issues were not of much importance. However, we observe today that matters are more complicated and difficult -- including, for example, the acute crisis from which the EEC is suffering internally. We know that France, because of the agricultural problems, cannot accept Spain's entry into the Common Market without the introduction of certain amendments, particularly in agricultural policy. We believe, however, that problems with France can be and are on their way to being solved. The French Government's recent attitude -- when it announced a radical change in its policy with regard to evaluating terrorist actions in Spain and extraditing wanted terrorists -- is one indication of this. But Spanish-French relations must not be confined to this framework only, for they are more comprehensive than that. There are areas of cooperation in Mediterranean policy, for example, so that stability in the Mediterranean will not be the monopoly of the two superpowers only, and also cooperation in order to find a solution to the Middle East crisis, in which both countries can play an important role.

[Question] We come to the Middle East problem and, therefore, to the question of Spanish-Arab relations. At the beginning of the interview, you criticized the Spanish foreign policy of past years, but no doubt you agree that Spain's Arab policy was successful. To what do you attribute the success of this foreign policy in the field of relations with the Arab countries and its failure in other fields?

[Answer] Spain's policy during the Francoist era, regardless of the historical and cultural relations between the Arabs and Spain, was primarily dictated -- which is logical and legitimate -- by the need to escape the diplomatic isolation that was imposed on Franco's regime in the forties. It happened that in 1948 Israel refused to recognize Franco's regime, which led to a similar Spanish reaction afterward. This helped to consolidate political ties between Spain and the Arab world. These relations continued and were strengthened after Franco.

The previous government showed interest in consolidating and continuing these relations. In fact this policy was successful in that some of the Spanish stands toward Arab issues, such as the Palestinian problem, were followed by similar stands by other European countries to the extent that the West European stands on this issue became closer to the traditional Spanish stand and not the other way around. The best evidence of this is the "Venice Declaration," which is very close to the Spanish position with regard to the future of the Palestinian people. Spain was one of the first countries to consider the Palestinian problem not as a refugee problem, but as that of a people with national and historical rights. As far as we are concerned as socialists, we will continue to strengthen relations with the Arab countries regardless of their moderate or progressive character. We will also continue to insist on the need to find a solution to the Palestinian problem on the basis of recognizing the Palestinian people's national and legitimate rights. Of course, we will have our own method of pursuing our good relations with the Arab world and seeking to improve them.

[Question] Does this mean that the socialists will preserve what they have inherited from the Spanish-Arab relations and seek to make changes in the method of these relations?

[Answer] Certainly, we will seek to change our foreign policy's method in general and with the Arab countries in particular. There is no doubt that the revolutionary tide that brought us to power will give us greater confidence and boldness in supporting just causes such as peace, disarmament and the new world economic order. With regard to the Arab world, we will try to have our policy based on deeds and facts and not words and stands. We observe that there is an important motive for us today to strengthen and deepen our relations with the Arab world, namely, the increasing interest shown by Spanish society in everything Arab and in the Arab factor in Spanish civilization, after the failure of the view by some Spanish historians toward the end of the last century and this century that only what is Western and Christian is worthy of interest in Spanish civilization. There is today an increasing appreciation in Spain of the Islamic and Andalusian elements in Spain's civilization and culture after a long period of suppression of these elements and their importance.

[Question] What are the aspects about which you are not satisfied in Spanish-Arab relations?

[Answer] We are not satisfied with considering them merely a matter of visits and outward appearances. We are not pleased with the method with which this policy is being pursued. King Juan Carlos, for example, made several visits to Arab countries which were extremely successful, but the followup to this success was not effective. It can be said that what we are proposing today is not change in the political objectives but, as I have just said, a new method that will increase the effectiveness of our relations with the Arab world.

[Question] Do you believe that the poor followup or the lack of followup were the reasons for the complaint by Arab and Spanish parties that economic relations between Spain and the Arab world are not on the same level as political relations?

[Answer] The lack of followup is one of the reasons. Arab investments usually find it easy to flow toward larger markets or markets in better condition than the Spanish market. Moreover, Spain's information and trade presence in the Arab world is weak, as I personally observed during my tour of Arab countries.

[Question] There is no doubt that the most distinctive element in Spanish-Arab relations is Spain's nonrecognition of Israel. It is a subject that is always under dicussion and constantly surrounded by speculation and rumor. Can we exploit your frankness, Senor Moran or Mr Minister, to give us an idea about the future of this subject within the framework of your Middle East policy?

[Answer] First we must make it clear that Spain adopts what is known as the "estrada" theory in its international relations. That is, it follows the policy not of recognition or of nonrecognition, but rather the establishment or nonestablishment of relations. This is what is happening with regard to its position toward Israel. As I have already said, it is an old question and goes back to the time when Ben Gurion refused to establish relations with Franco and Franco's reaction was reciprocal. But after that, wars occurred which resulted in Israeli annexation of Arab lands. We follow with great interest developments in Arab policy regarding the Palestinian problem. And, despite the fact that in our view Spain must establish relations with all world countries, we cannot accept the results of aggressive policies, and therefore do not accept that Israel should consider the lands it has occupied since 1967 as lands belonging to it. There is no doubt that the nonexistence of relations between us and Israel narrows the areas of our mediation in this conflict, and if we notice that the Arab-Israeli conflict has reached a positive stage with regard to the question of peace in the Middle East and the Palestinian people's rights, requiring that we establish relations with Israel, we will not do so before knowing exactly what the Arab countries' attitude will be. Within this framework, we find in King Fahd's plan and the Fes summit resolution an important path to peace.

[Question] It was recently rumored that Lebanon had asked Spain to send forces to participate in strengthening the multinational force. What will be the Socialist government's stand if such a request is made?

[Answer] The question is indeed no more than a rumor, but there is nothing to stop it from happening, in which case we are always ready both as socialists and Spaniards to help the achievement of peace in Lebanon. If the Lebanese Government officially asks for such help, the Israeli Government will most likely object to the presence of Spanish forces in Lebanon, but this is not Israel's problem alone. We are prepared to study the subject with great care, and if indeed we find that sending Spanish forces to Lebanon will contribute to preserving and maintaining stability, then we will welcome it.

LA VANGUARDIA INTERVIEWS NEW DEFENSE MINISTER

PM091609 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 2 Dec 82 pp 10-11

[Interview with Spanish Defense Minister Narcis Serra by Margarita Saenz-Diez Trias and Ramon Gonzalez Cabezas in Barcelona -- date not given]

[Excerpts] [Question] You are the third civilian defense minister in over 40 years and the first socialist, which raises two key aspects in the Spanish context of the relationship between the Army and society in a democratic system: the supremacy of the civil power and alternation in power. How do you view this relationship and, specifically, relations between the Army and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE]

[Answer] I would be replying rashly if I said that I have been able to detect what kind of relations exist between the armed forces and the PSOE, because we are still talking in this mayor's office and I have not taken over the post. As regards the two principles cited, both things are very clearly enshrined in the Constitution: The supremacy of the civil power and the democratic machinery which can give us alternation. I am absolutely confident about this, and I do not believe that the constitutional injunctions can ever be a problem between the armed forces and anybody. I do not believe it; why, I am certain that they cannot.

Defense and Foreign Policy

[Question] What, in broad outline, is the concept of defense in a modern state, as far as you are concerned?

[Answer] In the first place, we must give the concept of defense a dimension of capability for defense of Spain's sovereignty, but above all a deterrence capability which will make it possible for that sovereignty to be safeguarded by other means and for direct use of force not to be necessary. I attach great importance to having efficient and well equipped services, with trained personnel, because I know that this could be the strongest guarantee that they need never be used. In our case, we have a number of problems which we must resolve, some of which have already been put on the right track.

In any event, the concept of defense must be closely linked to a comprehensive foreign policy and must therefore not be defined solely by the Ministry of Defense. Spanish laws give the prime minister responsibility for defense, because it should be integrated precisely into the context of a comprehensive concept of foreign policy as well as of the constitutional injunction concerning domestic policy. The armed forces' role is to "guarantee Spain's sovereignty and independence and defend its territorial integrity and constitutional order," and this causes defense policy to be a far more complex matter. For instance, in the external sphere there are a number of outstanding issues which are interlinked: the final stance on joining NATO, relations with the United States, the issue of Gibraltar, the possible problems with Ceuta and Melilla, the Canary Islands... It is clear that the defense policy followed henceforth could be crucial for ensuring that the solution achieved is the one which the country demands and needs at a given moment. Hence the great responsibility of defense. A purchase of equipment at a given moment could be a highly important factor in future years as regards matters crucial for the country's stability.

Rational Increase in Military Expenditure

[Question] Does the current expenditure on defense meet its needs in proportion to the overall state budget and the expenditures in other departments?

[Answer] Spain ranks among the lowest in defense expenditures in relation to its GNP; well below the leaders. The correction of this situation is hampered by the economic crisis we are suffering, but for that very reason there is much to be done in the field of investment, which could have multiplying effects in industry. So the answer is not that there can be no increase, but that the increase can be effected while also considering the possibility of cooperating in resolving the economic crisis, in improving our industry's level of technology and in supplying ourselves with defense equipment and so forth. So I have no simple reply to this question. It is obvious that the level of expenditure on defense is not high and that it is difficult in the current situation to increase it, but we must strive to ensure that the increase is as rational and as integrated into the production system as possible.

Constitutional Loyalty

[Question] Does the Socialist leader Narcis Serra deem it desirable that the promotion policy in the Army be directly connected with constitutional loyalty?

[Answer] I am undertaking the defense portfolio with the idea that it is a state responsibility and that it must be managed not with a party outlook, but with an overall view; my view is really that of adopting a stance with very broad criteria of service to the Spanish people. Obviously, I have a choice of model of society for the country, but that does not mean that I must be sectarian or partisan in the exercise of a responsibility. I will avoid that absolutely, as I have already attempted to do in city hall. In order to explain what I am going to do, the best thing is to read you Article 11 of the Royal Ordinances on Armed Forces: "Discipline, a factor of cohesion which is equally binding on everybody, will be practiced and required as a rule of conduct. It has its collective expression in observance of the Constitution, to which the armed forces are subordinate."

GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS SOUTH AFRICAN 'INVASION'

LD101839 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1700 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] The South African envoy to Finland was called to the Foreign Ministry today and presented with the Finnish Government's strong condemnation of the South African invasion of Lesotho and of the massacre committed there. The Finnish Government condemns the deed that, according to the government, once again has shown the indifference of South Africa to the most basic obligations of international justice. Finland and the other Nordic countries expressed their consternation about the incident yesterday at the UN General Assembly.

LAST MILITARY GROUP LEAVES FOR LEBANON 10 DEC

BRIEFS

PROTOCOL WITH CEMA -- The 10th meeting of the Finland-CEMA Joint Commission ended with the signing of a protocol in Helsinki today. The protocol endorsed the recommendations of the working groups of the commission on the development of cooperation in different fields, including the designing of electrical power stations, transportation, the forestry industry and the chemical industry. In addition, approval was given to the standardization of the foreign trade documents, which aims at easing trade. The chairman of the three-day meeting was Foreign Trade Minister Esko Rekola. He noted that during this year the recommendations of the joint commission have led to 12 new agreements between Finland and CEMA. During the existence of the joint commission, 50 agreements have been concluded. [Text] [Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 10 Dec 82 LD]

CONTACT WITH 'EUROPEAN POLITICAL SYSTEM' USEFUL

PM101657 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 9 Dec 82 p 4

[NORSK TELEGRAMBYRA dispatch: "Berg: EPS Is Useful for Norway"]

[Text] Copenhagen, 8 Dec -- "Norway has found taking part in the EEC's Political Cooperation System (EPS), through the arrangement which it has had for almost a year, very satisfactory," Norwegian Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Eivinn Berg said after a meeting with Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen in Copenhagen on Wednesday.

Berg stressed that Norway has particularly benefited from its contacts with three working groups within the EEC. These are the working groups dealing with the Middle East, the CSCE Conference in Madrid, and East-West relations.

Contacts between Norway and the EPS began when Belgium was chairing the Council of Ministers. Denmark now hold this post, which rotates on a 6-monthly basis, and will do so until the end of the year.

"I am very satisfied with cooperation under Denmark's chairmanship. This has given us access to useful information in an organized way," Berg said. He also stressed the cooperation with the EPS has also given Norway the opportunity to inform the EEC of its views.

OLOF PALME OUTLINES FOREIGN POLICY APPROACH

PM091653 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 6 Dec 82 p 6

[Swedish Prime Minister Olof Palme undated interview with TIDINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA: "We Will Establish New Contacts With Cuba"]

[Text] "There is no so-called Bodstrom doctrine. It is an invention of the rightwing press and certain others," Olof Palme said in an interview with TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA." Palme also said that Sweden should reestablish contacts with Fidel Castro's Cuba. The nonsocialist government withdrew Swedish aid to Cuba. The term 'Bodstrom doctrine' arose after Foreign Minister Bodstrom said in a SVENSKA DAGBLADET interview that Sweden will only criticize events and not other countries' political systems. According to reports in A-PRESSEN [Social Democratic news bureau] Palme and the prime minister's office have issued orders that the Bodstrom doctrine be laid to rest as soon as possible.

"The point of departure for our assessments of other social systems is our democratic ideology," Olof Palme said. "Only a very small number of states have the same social system we do. As a state, we cannot constantly be at variance with other states through our rejection of their government systems." Palme went on: "We must therefore concentrate our criticism on the expressions of these systems. This naturally must also contain some criticism of the system. We have condemned invasions which violate international law, repression and torture regardless of which social systems were the attackers or the oppressors. We have condemned Israeli settlements on the West Bank without attacking Zionism."

TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRA then asked: If there is forced labor in connection with Swedish aid projects in Vietnam, should Sweden react, or is that an internal Vietnamese affair?

"As far as I know, there is no evidence to support that claim," Palme said. "Forests must be cleared in areas where there were no settlements in the past, so people have to go there to clear the bamboo forests. And we Swedes should be a little careful. I believe it was in 1943 that a whole class of Swedish school children were sent out into the forest by the fuel committee to chop wood. Typical forced clearance."

Direct aid to Cuba ceased when the nonosocialists were in government. It totaled around 30 million kronor per year. Does Olof Palme think that Sweden should resume this aid?

"We intend to resume contacts with Cuba again for many reasons, but there have been no direct proposals for the reintroduction of direct aid. Contacts with Cuba are desirable, partly because Cuba is an important market for Swedish companies," Olof Palme said. "Even though you may be critical of that country's social system, you have to admit that the leadership has done a great deal in the social field," Olof Palme said.

PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE DENIES NATO HQS MOVE

[By David Healy, PA political staff]

[Excerpt] Downing Street today firmly denied a report that the Pentagon has been ordered by the Reagan administration to move its European Command Headquarters from Stuttgart in Western Germany to Britain within four years.

A statement from No. 10 said it was "fundamentally incorrect." The Statement said: "You would not expect us to comment in any detail about NATO's contingency military command and control arrangements which remain classified. "But we can say that the central theme of the Harold Jackson story in today's GUARDIAN as set out in the first sentence in his article is fundamentally incorrect. "Moreover forward defence remains, as always, at the heart of NATO defence strategy." The Foreign Office in London is due shortly also to deny the story in similar terms.

SINDERMANN DISCUSSES DISARMAMENT ISSUES

LD092236 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1830 GMT 9 Dec 82

[Text] London, 9 Dec (ADN) -- During the visit to Britain by the GDR parliamentary delegation the president of the People's Chamber, Horst Sindermann, today had meetings with the foreign and defense policy spokesman of the Social Democratic Party [SDP] Dr David Owen, and with the deputy leader of the Labor Party, Denis Healey.

GDR Ambassador Martin Bierbach gave a reception in honor of the delegation, which was attended by representatives of British political and economic life, including the parliamentary under secretary of state in the Foreign Office, Malcolm Rifkind. Earlier, Horst Sindermann had visited in Westminster Abbey the grave of the composer George Friedrich Handel, who worked in England for almost 50 years. In the afternoon the GDR parliamentarians travelled from London to Manchester.

At the meeting between the president of the People's Chamber and the SDP politician, both sides were in agreement in stating that effective measures must be taken against the further escalation of the arms race. Horst Sindermann called the meeting a contribution to political dialogue in a difficult international situation and spoke in favor of the continuation of the CSCE process. He said it was necessary to calm the situation and to find a new starting point for a balancing of interests and for confidence-building through serious-minded and predictable behavior. The averting of the danger of a nuclear war was in the interests of both sides.

Dr David Owen explained proposals for the creation of a nuclear weapon-free zone in central Europe and on NATO's northern and southern flanks. There should be a suitable control mechanism to prevent the deployment of nuclear warheads in these regions, he said. Horst Sindermann assessed this as an interesting proposal which could become the basis of a discussion on these vital questions and could be enriched with further proposals.

In the meeting with Denis Healey, the president of the People's Chamber conveyed greetings from the general secretary of the SED Central Committee, Erich Honecker, to party leader Michael Foot. He also stressed the joint interest of the SED and the Labor Party and the working people of both states in the preservation of peace and in measures for arms limitation and disarmament.

The existence of ideological differences should not stand in the way of clarifying questions of common interest. He said the SED supported as a matter of principle relations with social democratic parties for the benefit of peace and endorsed the exchange of experience and views as a means to get better acquainted and for mutual understanding.

Denis Healey, the opposition party's foreign policy spokesman, also supported in the talk the idea of a nuclear weapons-free zone in Central Europe and on NATO's northern and southern flanks. He reaffirmed his belief that the British and the French nuclear weapons should also be included in the disarmament negotiations between the United States and the USSR.

BRITAIN DENIES CHANGE IN STAND ON ARAB COMMITTEE

JN101210 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1150 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] London, 10 Dec (INA) -- In a statement to the INA correspondent here today, (Michael Elliot), British Foreign Office spokesman, has dismissed reports that the British Government has changed its position on receiving the PLO representative within the seven-member Arab committee. The spokesman further added that the talks being held by Lord (Galvond) and Foreign Office Under Secretary (Steven Ikordon) with Moroccan officials deal with the British Government's arrangements to receive next month the Moroccan monarch and his delegation, excluding the PLO representative. He affirmed that the British Government insists on not receiving or meeting with any PLO official unless the latter recognizes Israel.

SALIM HOLDS LONDON NEWS CONFERENCE 10 DEC

NC101811 Cairo MENA in English 1500 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] London, Dec 10 (MENA) -- Lebanese Foreign Minister Elie Salim said here he was deeply satisfied with the results of his meeting today with Prime Minister Mrs Margaret Thatcher. He told a press conference that the British Government has expressed its readiness to do all it can to support Lebanon's independence, unity and territorial integrity, the immediate withdrawal of all foreign forces from the country, the restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial unity, and the establishment of a strong Lebanese Government.

At the end of his three-day visit to London, Elie Salim said Britain was still studying the question of dispatching a British contingent to join the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon. The British decision in this respect has not yet been taken, but the British Government has given no negative reply.

He pointed out that he had not come to London to request British participation in the multi-national force, but to obtain British political support for Lebanon. He added that if Britain took part in the multi-national force, this would be considered as an expression of the British Government's interest in Lebanon's political future.

Dr Salim cautioned that unless the current efforts, designed to secure the withdrawal of all foreign troops from every inch of Lebanese territory as soon as possible succeed, there was a possibility of another flare-up even bigger than that of 1975.

Elaborating, Dr Salim said that the present local situation in Lebanon was very serious, therefore, the future of Middle East peace would be primarily contingent on the resolution of the Lebanese problem as quickly as possible.

Lebanon is prepared to provide security guarantees for all its neighbours, the Lebanese foreign minister said, adding that his country would not (not) allow any procedural matters to obstruct any substantial matters.

He affirmed in this connection that Lebanon is ready to do anything reasonable that would be conducive to the pullout of all foreign troops from Lebanon, provided that that deed (on Lebanon's part) would not jeopardise its interests or its territory or that of its neighbours.

Salim categorically denied that Lebanon was responsible for the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps' massacre, holding, all the same Israel as responsible, whether directly or indirectly, for that crime. He condemned that crime, labelling it as hideous, pointing out that Lebanon does not want to be the scene of such crimes any more, and that those responsible for the savage Shatila crime should be severely punished.

He said that persons were arrested by the Lebanese Army over the past period. He denied, however, that anyone was tortured by the Lebanese forces inside gaols.

He added that no one (non-Lebanese) would be allowed to have more freedoms than those allowed to Lebanese nationals as it had been the case in the past decade.

Salim said the Lebanese Army controls only Beirut, which has become a peaceful and united city.

About Syrian forces in Lebanon, Salim said that President Hafiz al-Asad has affirmed his country's readiness to withdraw these forces "at the request of the Lebanese Government as soon as Israel decides to withdraw". He stressed the importance of close relations with Syria in the interest of the two countries. He said there are seven thousand Palestinian commandos inside Lebanon, and they would withdraw at the conclusion of a direct agreement on the withdrawal of all foreign forces.

Salim was leaving London later today for Paris for a similar visit.

Lebanese Ambassador Comments on Talks

NC111328 Beirut Domestic Service in Arabic 1130 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] A statement made this morning by Lebanon's Ambassador in London Dr Khalil Makkawi includes more than one indication of the rise in the temperature of the British stand on the sufferings of Lebanon. The question of Britain's participation in the multinational force will be studied again from a new positive basis. Britain will never allow, Mrs Thatcher affirmed, any outside force to detach any part of Lebanon.

In a telephone statement from London to the national news agency this morning, Ambassador Makkawi said: the meeting [between Lebanese Foreign Minister Elie Salim and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher] was originally scheduled to last 20 minutes but lasted 50 minutes. All aspects of the Lebanese question were discussed. It can be said the meeting was constructive and very successful. Minister Salim explained to the British prime minister the reality of the Lebanese situation from all aspects and President Amin al-Jumayyil's views on Lebanese policy in the coming period. He also explained the extent of the Lebanese national unanimity around President al-Jumayyil and the Lebanese Government. He further explained to her that Lebanon expects from Britain, in its capacity as an venerable democratic country and a great power, effective political support to help it secure the withdrawal of all the non-Lebanese forces from all Lebanon as soon as possible. He added that Lebanon views Britain's participation, even if in a symbolic way, in the multinational force as an act of political support, which Lebanon needs very badly.

Ambassador Makkawi further said Mrs Thatcher has again explained to Minister Salim, Britain's firm and clear policy of supporting Lebanon, its independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity. She affirmed that her government will also support Lebanon's continuing demand for the withdrawal of all non-Lebanese forces from its territory as soon as possible. She also promised to study the possibility of Britain's participation in the multinational force from a new and positive basis with the British foreign and defense minister. Mrs Thatcher assured Minister Salim that Britain will never permit any outside force to detach any part of Lebanon, divide it or place it under any guardianship or protection.

Minister Salim fully explained the situation to the foreign public opinion at a crowded press conference. After explaining that the incidents taking place in Lebanon are fabricated, Minister Salim said: There is no reason for any foreign forces to stay in Lebanon for one single day. In referring to the incidents which are taking place, Salim said: When some try to play with Lebanese society, which has a complex structure, they are actually contributing to the instability of the whole Middle East.

Regarding what is being demanded from Lebanon in return for starting the negotiations on the withdrawal, Minister Salim said: Lebanon is ready for this on three bases. In a London dispatch from our correspondent in London, Ibrahim al-Barjawi, Minister Salim defined and explained these three bases. Quoting Minister Salim, our correspondent in London says:

[Begin recording] 1. Lebanon's independence and its sovereignty on all its territory.

2. Lebanon's adherence to its national unity, which is being splendidly manifested. All the Lebanese are united behind their president and government.

3. Lebanon is a member of the Arab League. It will not set itself apart from the Arab world because Lebanon considers as right whatever the Arab world considers as right. If there is any misunderstanding, and I don't believe there is, Lebanon has done nothng to harm the Arab world's interests.

Lebanon has no problems with Syria. The Syrian forces will withdraw from Lebanon. The Syrian president has adopted a decision to this effect upon Lebanon's request. He said his forces will withdraw simultaneously with the Israeli forces. We intend to establish very strong and close relations with Syria. We have common interests, one language and an affiliation. It is in both our interests to establish strong relations. Lebanon will not permit itself to be a starting point for any attack against Syria, and it expects that Syria will not be a starting point for any attack against it. Lebanon and the PLO have agreed on the withdrawal of the Palestinian forces. We have provided the PLO with all resources to practice certain tactics but these tactics have failed. The result is that the PLO has lost and so has Lebanon. We have learned a lesson and this matter will not be repeated. We have agreed on the Palestinian withdrawal. There are only 7,000 Palestinian fighters in Lebanon now. They will withdraw together will all the other forces.

Israel has not entered Lebanon to impose a peace treaty [mu'ahadat sulh], but to destroy the PLO. I admit that Lebanon has been weak and it has erred because it did not preserve order within its boundaries. I am sorry for this but we will not err again. Nobody has any right to demand anything from us other than not to allow the use of Lebanese territory against him. Lebanon is one of the world's nations and each applies its laws on its land. We too have the right to apply our laws on our land. We will never be anybody's satellite. Lebanon belongs to the Lebanese and it is a member of the Arab world, in which we have interests. Lebanon is also a member of the world's human society in which it has interests. Lebanon has lost tens of thousands of dead. Its capital has been destroyed. There are thousands of Lebanese who are without shelter and who cannot return to their villages. It is their right to enjoy security and mankind should support them to achieve this. [end recording]

KLIRIDHIS SEES 1983 CRISIS IN CYPRUS, AEGEAN

NC131053 Nicosia ALITHIA in Greek 13 Dec 82 pp 1, 10

[Excerpt] "The year 1983 will be a difficult year for Cyprus. It is obvious that the [intercommunal] talks will be led to a deadlock because there is no indication that Turkey will allow the Turkish side to come close to our own positions. On the other hand, for us it is impossible to approach the unacceptable Turkish positions. Therefore, it is obvious that by September 1983 there will be a deadlock in the Cyprus problem."

This statement was made by Mr Glavkos Kliridhis, candidate for the office of president of the republic and Democratic Rally chairman, during his address to the second district congress ofthe Democratic Rally Youth [NEDISI].

Mr Kliridhis added: Following this deadlock there will be another one; that of the Aegean because appraisals indicate that Turkey does not intend to come closer to the Greek positions nor should it be expected that Greece willapproach the Turkish positions.

Thus, during 1983 we will steadily head toward a crisis in relations between Greece and Cyprus [as published]. This is why I went to Athens to meet President Karamanlis, Prime Minister Papandreou and official opposition leader Averof. I wanted to find out whether their appraisals were like mine. And indeed, they all view 1983 as a difficult and dangerous year. And this is why I took it upon myself to suggest the convocation of a national conference in Athens to examine these dangers beforehand and to determine whether our precautionary measures can be effective -- whether from the defense point of view we are ready to face outside threats, and whether we are psychologically prepared and united to fight for our homes and altars.

The other danger that our country will be facing is the domestic danger which stems from a profane and unnatural alliance. The sole reason for Kiprianou accepting this alliance is AKEL support for his reelection to the office of president, while AKEL's reason for its support is the implementation of Soviet policy through Kiprianou.

I believe that the February elections will be a historical milestone for Cyprus. This is so because we will not be voting for one or the other social system, but rather whether there will be a radical change that will allow the Cyprus Government to approach the Western quarters -- the only ones that can promote a Cyprus solution and influence Turkey -- or whether Mr Kiprianou will be reelected and then be under AKEL's patronage, in which case there is the risk of the West ceasing to have any interest in the Cyprus problem or its solution, thus given Turkey a free hand.

KIPRIANOU HAILS UN RESOLUTION ON MISSING PERSONS

NC111159 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] President Kiprianou hailed with special satisfaction the resolution of the UN General Assembly's third committee on the question of missing persons and stressed that the adoption of the resolution by such an overwhelming majority reflects the international community's lively interest in the need to fully investigate and trace the cases of missing persons.

The president voiced the hope that this time the Turkish side will show respect for the UN verdict and positively respond to the provisions of the resolution outlining the correct framework for opening a practical and effective investigation.

He also stressed that it is a supreme duty to the tragic missing persons and the thousands of their relatives to exert every effort to solve this humanitarian question and gave the assurance that the government, as always, will work in every direction for investigating all the cases of missing persons without exception.

DENKTAS SCORES PAPANDREOU FOR UNDERMINING TALKS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the only reason the Cyprus problem cannot be solved is the unwillingness of Greece and the pressure it applies on the Greek Cypriot leadership. Noting that the statement made by Greek Prime Minister Papandreou at the recent EEC summit in Copenhagen stressed the fact that he did not wish to solve the Cyprus problem through the intercommunal talks, Denktas added that the deadlock at the intercommunal talks will be solved if Papandreou renounces his attacks against the talks.

Noting the fact that the UN secretary general, the United States and the Soviet Union state that the intercommunal talks are the only path to a solution of the problem renders invalid Papandreou's view that a solution cannot be reached through the talks, Denktas said that these talks are the only path to an agreement based on the partnership of two ethnic communities, Denktas said: The UN secretary general must have felt it necessary to express his regret over Papandreou's destructive attacks aimed at the talks at a time when the two parties concerned were continuing to behave in a responsible and courageous manner. Denktas said that Papandreou had appropriated the Cyprus problem as one belonging to Greece, had put forward preconditions that had nothing to do with the solution of the problem, and had adopted an attitude excluding the Greek Cypriot leadership from the issue.

Noting that the decision to take the Cyprus problem to the UN General Assembly had been made in Athens and that it had been imposed on the Greek Cypriot leadership, Denktas added that Papandreou was exploiting issues such as territory, compensation, [word indistinct] freedom and disarmament. Noting that Papandreou should renounce his demagogy on the Cyprus issue and give the Greek Cypriots a chance to find a solution, Denktas said: The agreement we have reached on principle with Makarios is the foundation of peace. It is impossible to drag the problem outside this framework and to eliminate the equality of the Turkish Cypriot community by referring the problem to the United Nations.

Covers Missing Persons Issue

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriots are waiting for the Greek Cypriots at the negotiating table in a bid to activate the autonomous committee set up in connection with the missing persons issue. He added that the activation of the committee did not depend on outside interference.

In a statement on referring the missing persons issue to the third committee of the United Nations, Denktas said that a nonbeneficial decision has been made at the third committee which might create an obstacle to the activities of the autonomous committee. Reiterating the view that the autonomous committee can resume its activities from where it left off, Denktas said that this can be achieved if the obstacles hindering the reactivation of the committee are eliminated. Stressing the fact that the aim of referring the issue to the third committee was propaganda, Denktas added that the result has been detrimental and not beneficial.

FURTHER DENKTAS COMMENTS ON INTERCOMMUNAL ISSUES

On Allegations of Violations

TA101236 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has described as comic the Greek Cypriot protests to the United Nations against an alleged violation of Cyprus territorial waters by Turkish naval vessels in the Morphou Bay area. The president pointed out that the area in question was within the territorial waters of the TFSC and that the Greek Cypriot administration has no authority over it. He said that the territorial waters, airspace and borders of the TFSC were being and would continue to be defended by the Turkish Navy, Air Force and land forces, which were the only guarantors of the existence, security and freedom of the Turkish Cypriot community.

Cites Anti-Turkey Campaign

TA101239 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has portrayed the commemoration by the Greek Cypriots after 60 years of an action which depicts the wild attacks against the Turkish homeland as a new example of the anti-Turkish campaign initiated by the chauvinist Greek Prime Minister Mr Papandreou.

President Denktas was referring to the commemoration ceremonies in northern Cyprus under the name Asia Minor Disaster. He said that the chauvinist policies of Greek Prime Minister Papandreou did not conform with goodneighborly relations with Turkey and were aimed at creating a confrontation between the two communities in Cyprus.

President Denktas said that the opening of a new page based on anti-Turkish feelings by a nation which had sentenced to a capital punishment those who had involved the Greek nation in the wild attacks against the Turkish homeland in Izmir after World War I was an incident which should be viewed with great attention by all the peace-loving nations.

Commitments Termed 'Not Binding'

TA101334 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that responsibility for the territory, sea and air of the TFSC lay with the Turkish Cypriot community and their elected government. President Denktas was referring to a statement made by the Greek Cypriot delegate, Mr Andreas Iakovidhis, at the UN Law of the Sea Conference in Jamaica. The president said that this statement by a Greek Cypriot was not binding on the Turkish Cypriot community. He reiterated that all statements by the administration of southern Cyprus were invalid for the northern part of the island, which is being administered by the TFSC.

President Denktas said that any decision or action taken by any Greek Cypriot authority without the participation and consent of the Turkish Cypriots was not binding on the Turkish Federated State. He recalled that this is provided for in the 1960 Constitution of Cyprus, and the Greek Cypriots who tried to destroy this Constitution with their attacks against the Turkish Cypriots in 1964 should know that the developments and realities since then have not changed the situation.

President Denktas reiterated that the resolutions adopted without the participation of the Turkish Cypriots were not binding on the TFSC.

PAPER NAMES MEMBERS OF AKEL-DIKO 'DIRECTORATE'

NC120754 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 12 Dec 82 pp 1, 16

[Excerpts] According to reports received by I SIMERINI, the directorate of the AKEL-Democratic Party [DIKO] consortium is headed by Interior and Defense Minister Khristodhoulos Veniamin, and two high-ranking AKEL cadres are members. The reports say that the directorate comprises seven members, four of whom are DIKO cadres and three are AKEL cadres, and that it is headed by Mr Veniamin.

Specifically, the members of the directorate are: Khristodhoulos Veniamin, minister of interior and defense; Stavros Poskotis, DIKO secretary general; Polivios Kolokos, DIKO deputy secretary general; and Petros Voskaridhis, DIKO cadre in charge of propaganda. On the part of AKEL, the members of the directorate are: Yiannis Katsouridhis, member of the AKEL Central Secretariat and in charge of the watchdog committee; Dinos Konstandinou, member of the Central Secretariat; and Y. Savvidhis, house member and director of KHARAVYI. The decision to establish the directorate, which the consortium calls the special survelliance committee, was made last April when the AKEL leadership and Kiprianou concluded their agreement.

Although 7 months have passed since the announcement of the establishment of the directorate, its composition has remained secret and it has not yet been officially announced by the AKEL-DIKO consortium for reasons which have not become known.

According to some reports, the decision of the consortium to keep the composition of the directorate secret is due -- among other things -- to disagreements within DIKO's ranks on the persons who comprise it and the way it has been set up. Specifically, a high-ranking DIKO cadre has voiced disagreement over the composition of the directorate and the fact that it is headed by Mr Veniamin and that Katsouridhis, who is in charge of the AKEL information services, is included in the directorate.

'Directorate' Formation Denied

NC131000 Nicosia I ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 13 Dec 82 p 10

[Text] The cooperating parties, Democratic Party [DIKO]-AKEL, and Interior and Defense Minister Veniamin have described as unfounded the report carried by the Democratic Rally paper claiming that a "directorate" is functioning.

A statement by the office of democratic cooperation says: "Today's I SIMERINI report to the effect that a 'directorate' is functioning under the chairmanship of Interior and Defense Minister Khristodhoulos Veniamin with the participation of DIKO-AKEL cadres is totally untrue and unfounded. This becomes even more obvious given the fact that there is no 'directorate' nor are there plans for its establishment."

Interior and Defense Minister Khristodhoulos Veniamin stated that the report is totally unfounded and groundless.

PAPANDREOU SPEAKS AT DENUCLEARIZATION CONFERENCE

NC101632 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 10 Dec 82

[By Aris Xipolitidhis]

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou has expressed his sincere concern that the world is proceeding toward a nuclear confrontation. He made this statement at this morning's opening session of the international conference for the denuclearization of Europe at the Pandeios School [in Athens].

At the same time, he called on the European people to move toward denuclearization while there is still time. He also assured those attending the conference that the Greek Government will support the struggle of the European peace movements.

Today's session was attended by many ministers, delegations from West European and Balkan peace movements, representatives of political parties, cultural figures and observers from amny European and Mediterranean countries. The prime minister was addressed by Eurodeputy Khristos Markopoulos, chairman of the Movement for National Independence, International Peace and Disarmament [KEADEA], who stressed that Papandreou's presence at the conference was a moral justification of the peace movement's struggle.

In his lengthy address, the prime minister first referred to the huge expenditures allocated for nuclear armaments, to the problems which these sums could solve in other peaceful areas and to the dangers facing humanity as a result of the proliferation of nuclear weapons. He then spoke about the possibilities of creating nuclear-free zones in various parts of the world and, referring specifically to the Balkans, said:

[Begin recording] As you know, we have already started negotiations with Bulgarian Chairman Zhivkov, Romanian President Ceausescu and Yugoslav Prime Minister Planinc. The basic concept is a joint agreement, an agreement that would incorporate the Balkan countries and that would be signed by their governments. Naturally, this is not simple, because each of these countries has its own alliances and its own obligations, or, if you like, its own problems. We will begin from this, however.

Greece believes, knows, sees and accepts that it has no problem from the North. It has good relations with all its northern neighbors and, as a result, has absolutely no reservations in proceeding with an agreement for a nuclear-free Balkan area, for a denuclearized Balkan peninsula.

I would like to stress here that the negotiations which Greece is now conducting with the United States on the bases in Greece do not include and do not incorporate the question of U.S. nuclear weapons in Greece, because these weapons have nothing to do with the bases. This concerns a bilateral agreement. In any eventuality, while we are prepared to proceed with a dialogue within a certain framework on these bases and on the time schedule for their withdrawal, in respect to nuclear weapons we consider it to be exclusively and unilaterally our own right to consider when and how these nuclear weapons will be withdrawn from Greece. [prolonged applause]

We have, naturally, repeatedly stated that we desire relations of good neighborliness with Turkey and that we have absolutely no claims over and beyond the demand for a just solution to the Cyprus issue. We hope that the crisis which truly exists in our relations will be peacefully overcome within the framework of logic and understanding on the part of Turkey.

My own impression is that Bulgaria, Yugoslavia and Romania are in a position to move forward. In the last discussion I had with President Ceasescu, we reached the conclusion that approximately 6 months are needed for preparations at the deputy foreign ministers level and a similar period at the foreign ministers level; in other words, about 1 year before a summit conference can be held for the final agreement.

Naturally, however, a question arises: What will happen if all the Balkan countries fail to agree? Perhaps Turkey will not agree, even though Ceausescu believes that he can convince them, and he is due to go there in January. Let us hope for this. There is also Albania, even though I do not think that it faces such a problem at this moment because it has other problems.

My impression, in any case, is that a Balkan agreement is feasible. We will strive toward this end in every possible way, and I would also like to stress -- perhaps I am not a good negotiator when I say this -- we are not going to enter into any bargaining. Here the question is whether we can all agree to preserve the Balkans from a future war. I feel that any government has a responsibility toward the people of a small country -- we do not play any strategic role on the world chess board -- as well as a duty, and this government does, to protect the people from the repercussions of a nuclear war.

As long as we have nuclear weapons in our country, we must realize than in the eventuality of a general nuclear war we would also become a target. Our government, like the Labor Party in Britain -- PASOK here and the Labor Party in Britain -- believe in unilateral disarmament if a more general agreement does not become possible. [applause].

The work of the conference will continue this afternoon through tomorrow and will be concluded on Sunday. Tomorrow there will be a separate meeting of Greek representatives from various sections of the country and of mass organizations in order to discuss various methods of action by the Movement for National Independence, International Peace and Disarmament and to discuss the various problems of interest to the movement.

Conference Resolutions Cited

NC122117 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 12 Dec 82

[Text] Peace movements in Western Europe will continue their struggle against the development of Pershing and cruise missiles in Europe. This was decided upon at the conference organized in Athens by the Movement for National Independence, International Peace and Disarmament [KEADEA] on the issue of nuclear-free zones in Europe. Hellenic radio-television reporter Eva Nikolaidhou reports in this connection.

[Begin recording] The message for Europe's denuclearization has been passed to the European peoples. This dominated the work of the conference organized by KEADEA on the issue of nuclear-free zones in Europe. The conference's basic conclusions were stated to us very summarily by KEADEA Secretary General Thalis Milonas, international lawyer.

[Milonas] We can say that the results of the conference were successful and can be summarized in the following points:

-- The need for closer relations among the West European movements and for cooperation between these movements and their governments for the establishment of nuclear-free zones.

-- The need for the peace movements to express their strong protest at the plans for the deployment of new missiles and nuclear weapons in Europe.

-- The fact that the peace movements along with their governments must not and will not predicate their positions and political activity on the Geneva talks, which are mainly being held between the two superpowers and for which we can say that they may end in agreements that may not be beneficial for Europe and consequently for the viewpoints of the peace movements.

-- The lively desire that peace movements activate themselves and work together for the denuclearization of Europe, that is, northern, central, Mediterranean and southern Europe, especially the Balkans, for the implementation of the goal which Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou has so favorably spoken of. The implementation of this goal requires adequate time if one takes into consideration the fact that at least 1-1/2 years is needed prior to convening this conference.

Finally, the conference noted and expressed its opposition to NATO's preoccupation with affairs that are beyond its scope, something that quite dangerously increases international tension. We also discussed the need for the development of a dialogue between the peace movements of Western Europe and the Eastern countries and the peace movements in the United States and Canada. For this reason, we resolved that a new conference be held next year in which the peace committees of the International Peace Council will be called upon to participate; we also resolved to convene conferences in West Berlin and Palermo next year and, finally, in the autumn of 1983 all European peace movements will convene together in an international conference with peace movements from Europe, the United States and Canada in a common effort for peace and disarmament. KHARALAMBOPOULOS COMMENTS ON NATO COMMUNIQUE

[Text] The 2-day meeting of the NATO foreign ministers concluded in Brussels today. The Hellenic radio-television correspondent in the Belgian capital, Yeoryios Dharatos, had an exclusive interview with Greek Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos on the conference.

[Begin recording] [Question] Mr Minister, what is your view of the results of today's NATO meeting?

[Answer] At this meeting our interventions were of substantive content and were accepted on many points. Once again the other partners understood that our country has positions which it supports consistently and continuously and that these positions are in agreement with the more general framework of our foreign policy.

I shall be more specific. Regarding the deployment of the Euromissiles, we have always opposed this. As you know, we support the continuation of the negotiations in Geneva which require an atmosphere of detente to produce results. For this reason, we support these positions in all organizations, that is, positions which presuppose detente, and work by all so that detente may become a reality and acquire real and substantive content. We oppose every escalation of the arms race.

Also, as you know, another basic issue for us is that in order to have this atmosphere of detente, we cannot adopt the implementation of economic sanctions. We, Greece as a country, would look strange, and allow me to say funny, if we imposed sanctions on a superpower like the Soviet Union.

As regards the fact that he should first start building by beginning with credibility, which should exist when we present such issues, it means that we cannot use two sets of standards. Consequently, we who have bitter experiences from the violation of human rights certainly support human rights.

In conclusion, I would like to note, as I said at the beginning, that our interventions changed many points of the common communique. I will especially refer to one of its last points which concerns international terrorism. We insisted very strongly on this point, and our proposal was accepted. We insisted because due to the manner in which the original texts were drafted, many things could be misinterpreted. For instance, a person fighting for freedom, human dignity and democracy could be considered a terrorist. [end recording]

GOVERNMENT SOURCE ON U.S. MILITARY AID TO TURKEY

NC131028 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 12 Dec 82 p 3

[Text] The intensive drive to maintain the highest possible standard of military defense capability and readiness of the Greek Armed Forces will continue, following recent reports of large-scale arming by Turkey. This was learned yesterday from a well-informed government source which specifically disclosed that more than 10 Turkish airfields are being modernized with installations for war usage, the expenditure for which is being borne by the United States.

According to the same reports, these airfields are for use by the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force in case of a crisis in countries of the Middle East and Southeast Asia.

As a result of these facilities, it is considered certain that the U.S. military aid to Turkey will be increased and consequently upset the aid based on the "7 to 10 ratio" and the balance of power in the region in general. This might create a serious threat to our country's security.

Thus, the Greek Government is obliged to continue the arming of our armed forces with the necessary advanced technology weapons so that they may be able to respond to their mission, that is, to safeguard the security of our borders.

PAPANDREOU EXPRESSES 'OPTIMISM' ON ECONOMY

NC111349 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] The ministerial council which met yesterday under Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou approved a series of measures to cope with Athens air pollution. The measures will be announced Monday by Minister of Town Planning Andonios Tritsis.

At the beginning of the meeting, the prime minister briefed the ministers on results of this visits to Brussels and Copenhagen. Papandreou then referred to the budget and the government's income policy, expressing optimism that as long as the announced measures are strictly implemented, there will be economic improvement and a 2 to 3 percent rise in the national income. This will contribute to limiting deficits in the public sector and to a decline in the balance of payments deficit.

Papandreou added: In 1983 we will have better results. We will control inflation, check unemployment and enter 1984 with better results.

PRESIDENT EVREN LEAVES ANKARA ON FAR EAST TOUR

TA121101 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 12 Dec 82

[Text] President Kenan Evren has left Turkey aboard a special plane for official visits to the PRC, Indonesia, South Korea and Bangladesh. In a written statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport before his departure, Evren expressed the belief that his visits will create good understanding between Turkey and those countries and will yield results that will further strengthen the cooperation and solidarity with those countries.

At Esenboga Airport, Evren was seen off with a ceremony by acting president, National Security Council member and Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin. National Security Council members, namely, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya and Gendarmerie Commander Gen Sedat Celasun, were also present at the airport ceremony. Consultative Assembly Speaker Sadi Irmak, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, Minister of State and Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara, Minister of State Ilhan Oztrak, other military and civilian officials and officials from the PRC, Indonesian, South Korean and Bangladesh representations in Ankara were also present at the ceremony.

In his written statement at the airport, Evren said that bilateral visits and contacts contribute positively to relations and understanding among countries. He continued: Therefore, when the opportunities present themselves, we hold these contacts at the highest level. We have good and friendly relations with all the countries we are going to visit. Furthermore, we have close cooperation and solidarity ties with Indonesia and Bangladesh because they are Islamic Conference members. We have joint (?aspects) and historic ties with all four countries. We are all developing countries and we favor the establishment of world peace and stability and of an atmosphere conducive to achieving our development goals. Our countries are at different levels of the development process. Therefore, there is a potential for cooperation among us. Our visits will give us the opportunity to exchange views on these issues and international problems. I believe that our visits will create a better understanding among our countries and that they will yield results which will further the cooperation and solidarity among us. We are very happy to extend the love and best wishes of the Turkish people to the peoples of the PRC, the Indonesian Republic, the Korean Republic and the Bangladesh People's Republic.

National Security Council member and Naval Forces Commander Adm Nejat Tumer will join Evren for part of the tour. Admiral Tumer, who will visit Tokyo as the official guest of the Japanese naval forces commander, will leave the PRC for Japan. Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen and the representatives of various establishments will be accompanying Evren on his tour.

Evren, who will spend the night in Karachi, Pakistan and proceed to Beijing tomorrow, will head the Turkish delegation to the Turkish-PRC talks to be held on Tuesday. Evren will also visit and hold talks in Shanghai. Evren's visit to Indonesia will begin on 17 December and he will meet with President Suharto in Jakarta. He will also visit the island of Bali. The Turkish-Indonesian official talks will be held on 18 December.

Evren will go to Seoul, the capital of South Korea, on 20 December. The Turkish-Korean official talks will be held on 21 December. Evren will also visit the Turkish military cemetery in South Korea. Evren's Bangladesh visit will begin on 23 December, where he will participate in the Turkish-Bangladesh official talks to be held in Dacca on 24 and 25 December and visit the Ataturk high school there. After completing his visit to Bangladesh on 25 December, Evren will stop over in Pakistan on his way back to Turkey. Evren is expected to hold a meeting with President Ziaul Haq in Karachi and return to Turkey on 26 December.

Arrives in Beijing

TA131040 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Text] President Kenan Evren and the delegation accompanying him arrived in Beijing, the PRC capital, today. The special aircraft carrying the official Turkish delegation landed at Beijing airport at 1100 Turkish time coming from Karachi. Turkish Radio and Television reporters Ercan San, Ali Kirca and Serdar Dimli report that the Turkish delegation was received at the airport by the deputy director of West Asia and North Africa Affairs, (Huan Yesan).

According to the PRC protocol, the official welcome ceremony for President Evren will take place at the People's Congress Palace, where the visiting Turkish delegation will be received by the PRC State Council Premier Zhao Ziyang with a military ceremony. Later, President Evren and Zhao will meet for talks. This evening Zhao will give a dinner in honor of the Turkish president.

Official talks between the Turkish and the PRC delegations will begin tomorrow. President Evren is expected to visit the Chinese Great Wall, the monument of the people's heroes and attend a show of national Chinese folklore tomorrow after the talks.

FRG RESUMES ECONOMIC, MILITARY AID TO TURKEY

TA101140 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] It has been announced that economic aid to Turkey, pledged by the FRG within the framework of the OECD and amounting to DM 413,500,000, has been ratified by another Bundestag committee after it was adopted by the government. The FRG Government's resolution to resume economic aid to Turkey was ratified yesterday by the Budget Committee of the parliament after it had already passed the Bundestag Foreign Relations and Economic Cooperation Committees.

Turkish Radio and Television correspondent Turhan Dikkaya reports that this resolution adopted by the relevant parliamentary committees does not need to be voted on in the Council of Ministers again unless a demand is made to the contrary.

The FRG aid package, which contains DM 130 million to be used as project loan, DM 264,500,000 as urgent economic aid and DM 19 million as aid to Turkish guest workers that will return to their country, is expected to be released at the beginning of 1983 due to the lack of time.

The two Bundestag committees also ratified military aid to Turkey amounting to DM 130 million.

TURKMEN COMMENTS ON NATO CONTACTS IN BRUSSELS

TA101741 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in Brussels, has said that the NATO Ministerial Council meetings and his bilateral contacts have been very positive. Selma Berksoy and Bulent Seydi Alioglu from the Turkish radio and television news center report that Turkmen met with FRG Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher this morning. Noting that the free circulation of Turkish workers in Europe was discussed at the meeting, Turkmen added that Turkey favors a solution which will ensure that none of the parties involved are adversely affected on the issue. Turkmen said that while addressing the NATO Ministerial Council meeting, he referred to the Middle East issue as well as East-West relations, noting the necessity of reflecting in the economic field the solidarity on defense and political issues among the members. He added that he briefed the Ministerial Council meeting on his impressions during his recent Soviet visit.

In answer to a question, Turkmen said that he met several times with Greek Foreign Minister Kharalamboupoulos. He added: Turkey is always ready to discuss its problems.

COUNCIL IMPOSES NEW TAX ON IMPORTS FROM EEC

TA130808 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 0800 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Text] A surcharge of 15 percent will be imposed on certain goods imported from the EEC countries. A directive by the Finance and Loans Council went into effect on Sunday after it was published in the second edition of the Official Gazette. The directive stipulates that goods paid for in one of the 10 EEC countries will be subject to the additional tax even if the goods were not produced by them.

EEC Stand Criticized

TA130832 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0820 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 13 Dec (AA) -- President of the Turkish Chamber of Trade and Industry Mehmet Yazar expressed concern over the persistent violation by EEC members of its association accords with Turkey. In a press release, Yazar noted in particular the restrictions placed by members of the Community on Turkish exports, notably textiles and ready-to-wear. These restrictions, clearly contradictory to existing agreements, could not be justified in terms of oversupply as importation from third sources went on, he pointed out.

The private sector would stand by the government if it felt compelled to resort to counter-measures, including reduction of imports from EEC, Yazar added.

Politics Seen in EEC Decision

TA111522 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1515 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 11 (AA) -- Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin said the EEC was withholding from Turkey the 600,000 EEC project credit provided for in the 4th financial protocol between Turkey and the Community for political reasons.

In an interview with A.A., Pasin said that the motives for the delay in the release of the credit were thus different from the purely economic reasons which caused difficulties in the exportation of Turkish textiles to the Community.

He added, however, he would contact EEC officials early in 1983 in order to initiate the 9 month preparatory period for the implementation of the protocol as they had agreed upon during his September visit to Brussels.

Turkey, as an associate of the EEC, cannot accept being treated like any other third country, Pasin said.

The state minister did not foresee any difficulties in Turkey paying back capital or interest on her international loans in the next 2 years; the schedule for repayment required the payment of 750 million U.S. dollars in 1983, 950 million dollars in 1984, and the larger figure of 1.6 billion dollars in 1985.

GREECE'S PAPANDREOU CRITICIZED ON EEC MANEUVERS

NC130908 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 7 Dec 82 p 3

[Ziya Akcapar report]

[Text] Athens, (HURRIYET) -- Having realized that he would be unable to use NATO as a means of squeezing the United States into a corner, Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou has seized on the Cyprus issue as his chance. At the [EEC] -- summit conference in Copenhagen, he directly referred to the Cyprus problem without first talking about Turkey or the other pending issues. He requested the active help of the EEC countries to end the presence of the Turkish troops on the island, and he made new disclosures when he returned to his country.

Papandreou has stated that he is going to viist Paris as the guest of French head of state Francois Mitterrand in the middle of January when he will attend the "meeting of the leaders of the European Socialist Parties." He added that he would take up the Cyprus question at this meeting, which would be a "fate-determining meeting."

Stating that the leadership of Federal German Social Democrats has shown close concern and support, Papandreou added: "The most basic rules of international law and the principles of the United Nations have been trodden underfoot in Cyprus by Turkey for the past 8 years with 36.4 percent of the independent Republic of Cyprus under Turkey's military occupation. No one can turn a blind eye to this situation."

Papandreou further stated that the EEC and the European Socialist Parties have thus far pursued a dignified policy, fearing "they would be interfering with the intercommunal talks," but he contended that the talks were being conducted for show alone. Papandreou persistently maintains that the dialogue is being conducted between Turkey and Nicosia and not between the two communities and that it is common knowledge that Denktas is a leader who does only what Ankara imposes on him.

Papandreou concluded by saying that the Cyprus issue, which Greece is tackling as a "national problem" has been successfully converted into an international issue thanks to the support of the EEC and the Socialist Parties, and that concrete steps would be taken in this matter at the meeting to be held in Paris in the middle of January.

GUNES RAPS PAPANDREOU BEHAVIOR AT NATO MEETINGS

NC130950 Istanbul GUNES in Turkish 7 Dec 82 pp 1, 8

[Hadi Uluengin report from Brussels]

[Text] It is reported that Greek Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou has lost prestige at the NATO defense ministers meeting held in Brussels. It is reported that in his capacity as defense minister, Papandreou has spared no efforts in bringing up all his disputes with Turkey at the meeting, but that none of the other members approved of his behavior. It is stated that with National Defense Minister Haluk Bayulken's appropriate answers to all Greek charges, all the allegations put forward by the Greek side were refuted one by one and that, as a result, Papandreou lost his temper at the meeting.

Papandreou, who had gone to Brussels with great hopes, tried hard to explain his allegations that Turkish fighter planes had violated Aegean airspace, that Turkey was pursuing an expansionist policy in the region and that Greece considered Turkey a source of danger. However, NATO member countries attached no credibility to Papandreou's disclosures, which were in the form of complaints.

In the course of the meeting, NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns warned Papandreou a few times, urging him to restrain himself. NATO members who attended the meeting were surprised to hear Papandreou tell journalists after the meeting "They have apologized to me." Some laughed at this statement.

Dissatisfaction was expressed at the NATO meetings over harbor facilities made available to the Soviet Union by Greece. Despite Greece's statement that only Soviet merchant ships would be repaired and maintained, it is argued that warships could also use the facilities. It is considered strange that Greece, a NATO member, should sign such an agreement with the Soviet Union.

Another factor that led to the loss of prestige for Greece is its persistent claim that the Aegean islands should be militarized and included in NATO exercises. NATO circles in Brussels are not happy to see that Greece interprets the Lausanne and Montreux treaties in a manner that suits its own interests.

GOVERNMENT WILL NOT SIGN LAW OF SEA CONVENTION

TA101545 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1525 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 10 Dec (A.A.) -- Turkey does not intend to sign the final act or the convention drafted by the conference on the law of the sea, Foreign Ministry spokesman Nzami Akiman said Friday.

Asked if Greece might attempt to extend its territorial waters beyong 6 miles after signing the convention, Akiman said any extension of territorial waters in the Aegean beyond 6 miles was unacceptable to Turkey. As Turkey would not be a signatory because she objects to several of its provisions, Article 3 of the convention setting a maximum limit to territorial waters could not be used against the interests of Turkey, he added, explaining different rules of law would apply to signatory and non-signatory states.

MINISTER FAVORS MORE ECONOMIC LIBERALIZATION

TA110920 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0900 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 11 Dec (AA) -- Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin said foreign investment in Turkey during the year 1982 was more than the total of foreign capital invested over the past decade. In an interview with AA, Pasin noted foreign investment totalled 175 million U.S. dollars in 1982, while the total for 1980 was 53 million dollars and for 1981 60 million dollars.

Minister of State Pasin considered the government's economic policy since 1980 a "big stride forward," despite the current economic recession in most parts of the world.

The goal of the post-1980 policy was to open up an economy closed to the outside world until now by promoting exportation and reducing government control over the economy. He believed the economic system should be "liberalized" even further.

The reduction of the inflation rate from three-digit figures to slightly over 30 percent, and stepping up of exports by 62 percent in 1982 and an expected 30 percent this year were concrete aspects of the government's achievements, Pasin noted.

He believed measures intended to facilitate the inflow of foreign capital by decreasing red tape, such as setting up a single department at the state planning organization to authorize foreign investment, would ensure an increasing flow of foreign capital in future. Potential investors, who seek security as well as profit, were now assured that Turkey was a safe place for investment, Pasin said.

PRICE DIFFERENCES HALT POLISH GRAIN TALKS

AU101102 Vienna KURIER in German 10 Dec 82 p 6

[Text] The talks with Poland on the delivery of 120,000 tons of Austrian grains have been broken off. According to section chief Robert Steiner of the Austrian Ministry of Agriculture, the negotiations failed because of the different views on prices held by the two sides. He added that this quantity of grain could undoubtedly be sold elsewhere, and that Yugoslavia and the GDR had already expressed interest in buying it.

MILITARY, DEVELOPMENT AID TO SURINAME SUSPENDED

NC102024 Paris AFP in English 2019 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] The Hague, Dec 10 (AFP) -- The Dutch Government today suspended all military and development aid to Suriname, a former colony, over the execution there of political opponents following a military coup there Wednesday.

The announcement was made by Dutch Premier Ruud Lubbers at the end of a cabinet meeting. He said the Netherlands was also asking non-governmental aid agencies to suspend all assistance to Suriname at this point, "to bring maximum pressure to bear". "Development aid cannot come in support of repressive regimes or infringements on human rights", Mr Lubbers stated.

News of the execution early yesterday of 17 political opponents by the military, now reported in complete control of the Latin American country, was received with shock by the 200,000-strong Surinamese colony established in Holland. Reports here said that 17 people had been executed in the wake of the coup including -- the head of Suriname's main trade union, Cyril Daal, a former cabinet minister in charge of a radio station, three lawyers, four newsmen and a man convicted of subversion last week.

The Surinamese Army had in fact been in control of the country for the past two years, but decided to tighten its grip following student demonstrations with calls for "a return to democracy" early in the week, according to the Dutch press.

According to official reports received here, Suriname's strongman Colonel Aysi Bouterse has closed the university at Paramaribo, the capital, as well as all private radio stations and five newspapers.

The Surinamese ambassador here, Henk Herrenberg, informed Dutch authorities today he had closed his embassy as well as the consulate in Amsterdam following death threats received by his staff, and had himself gone into hiding. Premier Lubbers disclosed that the diplomat, whose whereabouts were known to the Dutch Government, had asked for reinforced protection.

MUBARAK PLANS STOPOVER EN ROUTE TO ROMANIA

AU150945 Vienna Domestic Service in German 0900 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Egyptian President Mubarak will meet with Chancellor Kreisky today at Vienna-Schwechat Airport for a brief exchange of views. The main topic of their talks will probably be the Middle East question. Mubarak has just paid visits to Bonn and Rome. After his stopover in Vienna, he will proceed to Romania, where he will meet with President Ceausescu.

KREISKY COMMENTS ON TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER CHARGES

AU142055 Vienna Domestic Television Service in German 1830 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Report on press conference given by Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky on 14 Dec after cabinet meeting that day, with Kreisky statement recorded]

[Text] After the cabinet session today the chancellor stated his views about accusations made against Austria in the most recent issue of the U.S. economic magazine, BUSINESS WEEK and affirmed by U.S. Defense Department Undersecretary Fred Ikle in an interview with the Vienna daily DIE PRESSE. Allegedly, there are some 120 Austrian firms which have access to U.S. data banks and to the development of microprocessor plants. Austria -- and this is the specific charge -- is not checking carefully enough the illegal transfer of these details to the Eastern bloc which, for military reasons, are almost always secret, and is also selling the results of its own highly developed metallurgical research which serves military purposes to Moscow. Kreisky, who will meet President Reagan in Washington on 3 February during his official visit to the United States, has now stated in this context that the industrial bosses had credible assured him that the firms are strictly adhering to the contracts.

[Begin recording] So the industrial enterprises are assuring me that they are strictly complying with the agreements. Naturally we shall request information from the U.S. authorities as to specifically what they mean by these accusations. We would not like to be given some sort of shot across the bows -- since there is a small one [kleiner -- presumably country] involved. We would not be very pleased with this. We now will examine whether or not the allegations are true. [end recording]

Paper Carries Ikle Interview

AU141103 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 13 December carries on page 1 a 650-word report by its Washington correspondent Georg Possanner on an interview granted to him by U.S. Defense Department Under Secretary Fred Ikle "seven weeks before Chancellor Kreisky's working visit" to the United States -- date of interview not specified. According to the paper, Ikle was the "first high-ranking member of the Reagan administration to publicly threaten curbing technology exports to Austria if it failed to better control the illegal transfer of such technology to the East." Ikle is also quoted as having criticized Austrian banks for having extended credits to the USSR and other East European countries precisely after the proclamation of martial law in Poland -- "thus throwing good money out the window," and European banks in general for their past "repugnant" practice of granting subsidized loans to the East.

Muhri Criticizes 'Pentagon Threats'

AU141105 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 14 Dec 82 pp 1-2

[Unattributed report: "Pentagon Threatens Austria: Muhri: Government Must Sharply Reject Interference"]

[Excerpts] Vienna -- A new massive attempt to influence Austria's economic policy has been undertaken from Washington: U.S. Deputy Defense Minister Fred Ikle has threatened Austria with sanctions on the grounds that electronic and metallurgical technology from here is sold to the socialist countries. And Austria's credit policy vis-a-vis CEMA countries is not to the Pentagon's liking, either. "We ask the Austrian Government to firmly reject the attempts of the U.S. Administration to exert pressure on Austria regarding its economic relations with the socialist countries," Austrian Communist Party [KPOE] Chairman Franz Muhri said in this context.

In a talk with the U.S. correspondent of DIE PRESSE [published 13 Dec], Ikle declared that although Austria could not expect to display an ally's attitude, it was nevertheless part of the "Western World," and for the gentlemen at the Pentagon this probably amounts more or less to the same thing.

Ikle warned that Austria would have to get the "illegal transfer" of technologies under better control -- in reality the issue at stake is probably Austria's quite official economic relations.

"The U.S. Administration's demand that Austria abstain from exporting certain technologies and metals to the socialist countries, as well as Ikle's criticism of Austrian banks which granted loans to finance Eastern orders, contradict Austria's permanent neutrality and also constitute a gross violation of our country's sovereignty. The U.S. Amdinistration is seeking to exert pressure on other countries but has not let itself be prevented from pushing a big grain deal with the Soviet Union," Franze Muhri declared.

"To comply with the American demand would mean jeopardizing more jobs in Austria at the very time when the crisis is becoming exacerbated, and when unemployment is mounting. Through the eonomic relations with the socialist countries, more than 150,000 jobs are safeguarded today in Austria.

"Thus, what is necessary is not to curb but to maintain and further develop the economic relations with the Soviet Union and the other socialist countires, all the more so as the West European NATO states themselves are seeking to obtain orders from the socialist countries, and a sharp competition is being waged in this respect," Muhri said.

Commentary: U.S. 'Blackmailing' Austria

AU141440 Vienna KRONEN ZEITUNG in German 14 Dec 82 p 2

[Kurd Seinitz commentary: "A Case of Blackmail"]

[Text] As is known, the Reagan administration is not really squeamish in dealing with the European allies. Neutral friends, however, are occasionally dealt with even more brutally to bring them to heel. Thus, at present, Austria finds itself exposed to an unprecedented campaign of pressure by the U.S. Department of Defense. This campaign is tantamount to a defamation of character reagarding the Austrian economy, and is already threatening to inflict inestimable business damages on the Voest Corporation in the very tough competition on international markets.

What is behind it: A massive curbing of technology transfer to the East is a heartfelt concern for the Reagan administration. The NATO states and Japan have more or less yielded to U.S. wishes. Neutral countries, however, cannot join in any U.S. trade war against the Soviet Union as they have to take basic political principles into consideration. Nevertheless, the U.S. Department of Commerce has succeeded in concluding treaties with most neutral countries concerned, which free Washington of the fear that the embargo on advanced U.S. technology could be circumvented by the Soviet Union through neutral countries.

Only the U.S. negotiations with Austria have encountered difficulties, because the Austrian Government has been somewhat recalcitrant, the more so since more rigid U.S. conditions are to be dictated to us Austrians than to other neutrals. Austria is getting a tougher treatment because some Reagan people do not regard it as completely reliable. Some of them even believe that Austria is situated somewhere in the East bloc, right next to Romania and Yugoslavia.

And, because Austria has not to date, signed, some "hawks" at the Defense Department have begun to run amok. In newspaper interviews it is asserted that there are leaks to the East in the Austrian economy, so that one has to think twice before entrusting any more investments with advanced U.S. technology to it. Foreign competitors of Austrian industrial companies are already using the sales argument that Austrian products would be "hopelessly inferior in 5-10 years because the U.S. Government is going to stop technology transfers to Austria."

Now we really are in a fix: naturally, Austria wants to obtain U.S. investments to modernize the economy, and thus it will sooner or later yield to the downright blackmail from Reagan's Washington. But the U.S. attitude is certainly not a gentlemanlike way to deal with friends....

TRAINING OF GUATEMALAN OFFICERS PROTESTED

AU131403 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 11 Dec 82 p 4

[Summary] The Austrian solidarity committee for Guatemala has submitted a declaration to the Austrian Government signed by 3,500 Austrians protesting the training of 30 Guatemalan officers at the nationalized Hirtenberg ammunition factory. The committee also protested the delivery of Austrian turning lathes and other equipment to a U.S. concern which is currently building an ammunition factory in Guatemala.

The resolution condemns Austria's support of the Guatemalan military regime particularly in view of the numerous massacres among the civilian population committed by Guatemalan Government forces, and states that the undersigned regard the cooperation with the U.S. concern operating in Guatemala as a contribution to the U.S. policy aimed at smashing the Central American liberation movement. They demand that Austria stop supporting the Guatemalan terror regime through exports of arms and ammunition as well as of military know-how, that it condemn the massacres and violations of human rights committed by the Guatemalan Government forces, and that it support the Guatemalan people's right to self-determination.

ALGERIAN PRESIDENT BENDJEDID ARRIVES FOR VISIT

LD141626 Brussels in French to Africa 1600 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] The president of the Algerian republic, Chadli Bendjedid, arrived in Brussels late in the morning for a 3-day official visit to our country. This is the first visit by the Algerian head of state to a Western European country. The president is being accompanied by the Algerian foreign minister and the minister of energy and planning. The presidential party was met on its arrival by the king and the queen.

Bendjedid Speaks at Banquet

LD150344 Algiers Domestic Service in Arabic 2300 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Chadli Bendjedid, president of the republic and secretary general of the FLN [National Liberation Front], gave a speech this evening at a banquet given by the king of Belgium, Baudouin I, in Brussels.

The president began his speech by expressing the regard of the Algerian people for the Belgian people. He thanked King Baudouin i and the government and people of Belgium for the warm welcome he has been accorded.

President Chadli Bendjedid recalled the development of Algerian-Belgian relations in the recent years and the volume of the increasingly important exchanges. This reflects two sides' will to move forward on the path of cooperation in the interest of both peoples and the fact that the two sides have important capabilities which have enabled them to engage in such cooperation. This falls within the framework of action for the establishment of a new international economic system. In reagard to this, the president explained that the achievement of peace cannot be visualized in isolation from economic prosperity. He added that Belgium and Algeria have a great role and responsibility in safeguarding stability, which serves the interest of peoples and is a basis for their prosperity.

For his part, King Baudouin I gave a speech in which he welcomed President Chadli Bendjedid and the delegation accompanying him. He praised Algerian-Belgian relations and the huge potential of the two countries -- Belgium with industrial goods and Algeria with natural resources. [sentence indistinct].

King Baudouin I praised Algeria's foreign policy, its role in the international arena and its [word indistinct] in defending just causes and effecting changes between the developing and industrial countries. He emphasized the necessity of (?uniting) the two countries' efforts in this regard.

KOHL ON ZERO OPTION, USSR DISARMAMENT STANCE

LD141344 Hamburg DPA in German 1208 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- In the foreign affairs part of his speech in the Bundestag budget debate, Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl confirmed that the NATO dual decision in both its parts remained an instrument for the Federal Government to achieve effective and balanced disarmament. At the Geneva negotiations both the United States and the FRG were intent on concrete results. He demanded that the SPD stop questioning Washington's good will. "If we are doubtful about success in Geneva, then above all it is because of the refusal by the Soviet Union so far to permit progress in the negotiations thus far."

With reference to the latest SPD proposal, which would result in a one-sided zero option against NATO and be an advantage to Moscow, the chancellor said that the Soviet leadership's unwillingness to negotiate could be strengthened even further if it should gain the impression that the SPD wanted to abandon the present common policy of the West.

The chancellor gave the assurance that the Federal Government would continue the policy of dialogue and cooperation with the East on a realistic basis, and by this means sought to achieve constructive East-West relations. With a view to the Soviet negotiating position in Geneva and at the CSCE review conference in Madrid, as well as to the actions of the Soviet Union in Poland and Afghanistan, Kohl said it was up to Moscow to remove obstacles and clear the way for a constructive relationship.

He expressed the hope that the new Soviet leadership would recognize that hegemonistic strivings were a policy which is out of date. Speaking on the visit of Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko to Bonn in mid January, the chancellor announced that he would especially point out the considerable reduction in numbers concerning the reunification of families from the Soviet Union. He hoped that Moscow would solve this problem "in a spirit of good will," as it has reiterated on several occasions.

Concerning intra-German policy, Kohl welcomed the fact that the GDR leadership had also expressed an interest in good-neighborly relations. "We have to live with the fact" that there are two mutually independant states in Germany, he said. But at the same time, the GDR Government has to respect "that we hold fast to the unity of the nation." There is therefore no progress to be achieved in trying to make the establishment of irreconcilable legal positions the object of negotiations. In the foreseeable future the tasks consist of trying to develop relations in such a manner that they serve the people and peace. "We are willing to work for progress which will serve the interest of people," Kohl said.

ADN Reports Speech

LD142328 East Berlin ADN International Service in German 1651 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (ADN) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl today, at the start of a Bundestag debate on the budget which is to last several days, reviewed his government's work to date. By way of introduction, the chancellor said that he had proposed a vote of confidence in the Bundestag so that early Bundestag elections can be held on 6 March 1983. He will give his reasons for this on Friday.

The Federal Republic is undergoing its "worst economic and financial crisis since its founding."

The fact that over 2 million people -- including many young people -- are unemployed and that this figure will probably increase still further is the "biggest and most worrying problem."

In the foreign policy segment of his speech, Kohl repledged support for the NATO missile decision, On this issue, the Federal Government is "in continuity with its predecessor." He opposed views that constantly cast doubts upon the "determination to go through with the siting [of new nuclear missiles] in the event that negotiations fail." In this respect, he repeated the phrase about an alleged "military superiority of the Soviet Union over the West."

The FRG Government wants "to realistically continue the policy of dialogue and cooperation with the East." Kohl, however, added the remark that in economic relations, "security interests" must be taken into consideration. It is obvious that a formula is being adopted in this way for Reagan to continue his embargo policy against the socialist countries.

Nor was there an explanation for why the FRG Government speaks to the "existence of two states in Germany" from time to time while at the same time assuring the GDR that the FRG stands by all the commitments it has undertaken. As you know, the basic treaty does not speak of "two states in Germany," but of "the two German states" which are guided by the principles of sovereign equality and respect for independence, autonomy and territorial integrity.

Woerner Speaks in Debate

[Excerpt] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- In the Bundestag budget debate, Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU) said that despite the general need for thrift, the Bundeswehr can fulfill its mission. In the discussion on the defense budget of DM46.7 million, Woerner said this evening that if the Bundeswehr is to continue to contribute to the prevention of war, it must be equipped in such a way that it can fulfill its task. "This Federal Government will see that this is so." It has to be made clear to the people that peace and freedom are not to be had for free. Woerner conceded that the increase of a nominal 6.1 percent is not too much.

Woerner stated that the new Federal Government has a firm objective: balanced and controlled disarmament with regard to nuclear and conventional weapons in East and West. He said that basically, nuclear weapon-free zones did not offer protection against the use of nuclear weapons.

Woerner again referred to the confusing reports in connection with the U.S. European headquarters in Stuttgart. He said that the headquarters would remain in Stuttgart. The U.S. Administration has also confirmed this. Consideration of alternative locations for the reinforcement side of this headquarters is quite normal. This has nothing to do with the U.S. will to hold Europe in the event of war. This is also indicated by the fact that the Americans have planned adequate troop reinforcements for the European region.

BOMB ATTACKS AGAINST AMERICANS IN FRG REPORTED

LD141630 Hamburg DPA in German 1530 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Frankfurt/Butzbach Wiesbaden, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Unknown persons carried out bomb attacks on the drivers of two American civilian vehicles on Tuesday in Butzbach and Frankfurt.

A U.S. soldier was seriously injured during the morning in Butzbach when a bomb exploded while he was starting his car, but the second attack in Frankfurt was not successful. In the past, bomb attacks were directed against American installations, but this time they were clearly directed at specific persons.

According to the investigating authorities, the detonation of the bomb made from explosives packed into a fire-extinguisher was triggered by a pressure switch in the driver's seat as the American got into his car. According to the 5th U.S. Corps, the man was taken to the Frankfurt military hospital with burns and cuts. The vehicle was destroyed.

According to the Hesse criminal police, the second attack did not succeed because the driver noticed a hard object under his seat. He got out and noticed the explosives-packed fire-extinguisher under his seat, which also had a pressure switch. The Hesse criminal police, who are investigating the attacks on behalf of the prosecutor general, took possession of both explosive devices.

Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government expressed its disgust on Tuesday at the "cowardly, malicious and criminal act." In conjunction with the laender, it will undertake all necessary efforts to clear up the recent attacks on American persons and institutions and to protect American citizens, according to an Interior Ministry statement.

RELOCATION OF U.S. EUROPEAN HEADQUARTERS VIEWED

[Thomas Kielinger editorial]

[Text] While everyone is talking about peace, a psychological war is already taking place. This war basically consists of the creation, activation and direction of fears. Thus, nuclear powerplants, environmental problems and defense measures become subjects of Dante-like feelings. As expected, if not summoned by the directors direction, ideologists and theologians appear before those tormented by fear and provide status to the disese. They teach that fear is noble, helpful and good. They say that whoever doesn't feel, cultivate and nourish fear is a monster.

The most recent purposeful demoralization to cause excitement in the media was the report on a fallback headquarters in Great Britain for the U. S. European Command. The fact is that in case of war, EUCOM is to be moved from Stuttgart-Vaihingen to a location near London, to a hardened base safe from the first strike of the adversary. The U.S. command would have the task there of organizing the movement of supplies and reinforcements to U.S. combat forces, from across the Atlantic to the old continent. Accomplishing this task is one of the elementary prerequisites for a successful defense. If no provisions were made for a fallback headquarters, the American leadership would have neglected its duty to the alliance. Only in such a case would fear be justified.

Part of purposeful demoralization is purposeful misinformation. This is why the false report was served up to the European public that the Americans would retreat to the British backlands and "abandon the Europeans." Commentators, who are competent but not fully informed, pointed their fingers and said that the consequences of European unrealiability and bickering were now evident. This was enough to stimulate the nerve of fear. The United States was thus put in the pillory where the directors of fear want it to be. The United States is placed there often and for any reason -- either because it has become militarily engaged in Europe, or because it has militarily disengaged itself.

It is commendable that the Americans are creating a fallback headquarters, but in the psychological war they are attacking too late: First there came hollow denials and then the experts explained the situation, but these came important fractions of seconds too late because suspicion about the United States had already gained ground as a result of manipulated fear.

OFFICIAL TALKS WITH EGYPT'S MURARAK BEGIN

NC141317 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1300 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (MENA) -- The talks between FRG President Karl Carstens and President Husni Mubarak began at noon today. The session of talks between the two Presidents lasted 45 minutes. The talks dealt with the developments of the situation in the Middle East and Lebanon and the bilateral relations between the two countries.

After the meeting, President Mubarak attended a luncheon which FRG President Carstens held in honor of him and the delegation accompanying him.

Carstens, Mubarak Speak at Luncheon

LD141356 Hamburg DPA in German 1241 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Federal President Karl Carstens has assured the Egyptian head of state, Husni Mubarak, that Bonn holds to the Near East position of the European Community as stated in the EEC Near East declaration of 1980 in Venice. This demands the realization of the rights of the Palestinian people, the existence of Israel and the willingness to negotiate. At a lunch for Mubarak, who has been in Bonn since Monday evening on a working visit, Carstens welcomed the fundamental willingness to find a negotiated solution expressed at the most recent Arab summit conference.

At the lunch, the federal president described the close succession of German-Egyptian meetings -- Mubarak was last in Bonn in February -- as a sign of the growth in trust between both countries. Carstens stressed the consistent attempts by Mubarak to achieve a peaceful solution between Israel and the Arab powers. The federal president said that Bonn, like Egypt, supports the Near East initiative of U.S. President Ronald Reagan.

In a dinner speech, the Egyptian head of state said that the statement issued at the Arab summit at Fes and U.S. President Ronald Reagan's Middle East initiative could form a joint basis for a political settlement of the Middle East problem. Jordan and representatives of the Palestinian people would have to be involved in such Middle East negotiations. Mubarak spoke in favor of the Europeans continuing to take an active role in accordance with the EEC's Middle East statement issued in Venice.

The Egyptian guest underlined the great extent of agreement between Bonn and Cairo and praised the FRG's support for the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Lebanon and for the reestablishment of the full sovereignty of the Lebanese Government. Referring to the speech by the federal president, Mubarak said that Carstens has always been a man of peace and a proponent of international cooperation.

More on Mubarak Speech

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (MENA) -- President Husni Mubarak delivered a speech today in reply to the FRG president's speech at the luncheon which FRG President Karl Carstens held in his excellency's honor.

The text of President Mubarak's speech reads as follows:

Dear Friend President Carstens, Mrs Carstens, dear friends:

I am happy to once again return to your friendly country to cement the ties of friendship and cooperation between our two peoples and countries. These ties could be considered a distinguished example of relations among peace-loving peoples who share a joint belief in the necessity of seeking a better world where peace reigns instead of war and aggression, a world devoid of all aspects of violence, exploitation and hegemony.

It is a good omen that our visit to you should take place close to the Christmas holidays and that this meeting between us should take place on your birthday, something which generates optimism regarding the future of the relations between us and allows us to wish you personally and the friendly German people every happiness and success.

Every time we meet, we exchange views on all the issues of mutual interest and find great agreement of views between us and joint participation in adherence to the basic issues. We have always known you to be a force that calls for peace and for the extension of bridges of creative cooperation among all nations and peoples. Your position of support for a comprehensive peace in the Middle East has been principled and unshakable, because it is built on a wise and penetrating outlook and a deep understanding of the reality of the struggle that we are waging to achieve a comprehensive peace, whose good effects will extend to all parts of the area, which has been weakened by wounds, exhausted by wars and in which tension has increased. This is at a time in which we direly need to devote our efforts and energies to building peace and progress.

As you mentioned, your excellency, we welcome the active European role, which was crystallized in the Venice declaration and which supported the right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and which called for reciprocal recognition. We also agree with you in welcoming the Fes conference resolutions which laid solid bases for Arab acceptance of peace and coexistence and which can be developed and added to. A common ground could be found between it and President Reagan's initiative, which we consider as an acceptable formula for the start of expanded negotiations with the participation of Jordan and representatives of the fraternal Palestinian people, who must directly participate in the building of peace and in the finding of a formula for full coexistence in the area. We were happy, my friend, to sense your profound interest in following the developments in Lebanon and your support for our call for the immediate withdrawal of the Israeli forces from all Lebanese territory to enable the fraternal Lebanese people to exercise their sovereignty over their territory and enjoy the independence of their will in everything pertaining to their affairs. We are all confident in the ability of this people to give and contribute to the achievement of peace and stability in the area.

Friends, every time we have the chance to visit your country and meet with our friends in this good atmosphere, our faith in the strengthening of the ties of cooperation between our two countries and peoples increases and our realization of the great benefits which we can achieve together for our mutual benefit and for the benefit of Arab-European cooperation and the issue of world peace is also enhanced.

We have offered a good example of cooperation and understanding between the North and South, written bright new pages in the history of the traditional Arab-German friendship, and laid down the solid bases for the meeting of Middle East peoples with European countries, as security and stability in these countries depends on the establishment of peace and security in our area.

We are looking forward to the deepening of cooperation between us in all fields. We hope you will accept our invitation to visit the Arab Republic of Egypt to give our people the opportunity to express the sentiments of love and friendship which they harbor for the FRG and its people.

Allow me, friends, to call on you to stand up as a salute to President Carstens and his wife and to all the friends in the FRG and to close friendship between the two peoples.

Mubarak Urges Industrial Investment

LD141538 Hamburg DPA in German 1444 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec, (DPA) The Egyptian president, Husni Mubarak, called upon German industry to continue to increase investment in Egypt. At a meeting with leading representatives of industry, trade and the banks on Tuesday in Bonn, Mubarak said that Egypt needs German capital and technology. In return, it offers stability and an atmosphere of trusting cooperation. German investment in Egypt reached DM460 million by the middle of 1982 and is thus almost 50 percent higher than at the same time last year.

Mubarak stressed that Cairo is very intent on further developing economic cooperation with the FRG, which has been steadily growing in recent years. Egypt offers enormous potential for investment.

His request for German capital investment does not mean that risks will have to be taken or economic criteria left out of consideration. Foreign investments are protected in Egypt. Cairo has also done much to remove bureaucratic and administrative obstacles.

The president of the German Chamber of Industry and Commerce (DIHT), Otto Wolf von Amerongen, said earlier that by continuing the "open door" policy pursued by his predecessor, Mubarak has been creating good conditions for the continuation and development of mutual relations. Trade between the two countries during the first 9 months of this year has developed almost spectacularly and has reached a new peak in both directions. During this period, the FRG exported goods to Egypt valued at almost DM2 billion, while goods valued at almost DM900 million were imported from Egypt.

Mubarak Statement on Kohl Talks

NC141859 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1800 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (MENA) -- President Husni Mubarak issued a press statement this evening on his talks with FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl. In the statement, President Mubarak expresses his extreme happiness at his meeting with Kohl and the talks he held with him on issues of mutual interest to the two countries and on international issues.

The text of President Mubarak's statement reads as follows:

I am very happy with my meeting with Chancellor Kohl and the talks we held on issues of interest to the two countries, both in the sphere of strengthening relations between Egypt and the FRG and the important international issues, with the Middle East problem in the forefront.

We discussed the developments in the situation in that sensitive area in detail, and it was clear that the FRG shares our interest in these developments and the extreme concern regarding the situation resulting from the continued Israeli occupation of Lebanon. We agreed on the need to work by all methods to end this occupation and thus to enable the Lebanese people to exercise their sovereignty and play their positive role in bolstering the process of peace and progress in the area.

In this regard, I briefed Chancellor Kohl on the results of the talks which I held yesterday afternoon with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz in Rome and on the explosive situation in Lebanon and the steps which can be taken by the United States to speed up the Israeli withdrawal.

Our views agree on the need to provide the suitable atmosphere to continue the peace efforts and to ensure the participation of Jordan and the representative of the Palestinian people in the negotiations with a view to reaching a comprehensive settlement that would end the conflict concretely and achieve reconciliation between Israel and all the Arab peoples.

Our talks also covered the Iran-Iraq war and the need to work to put an end to the fighting to staunch the flow of blood of the two peoples and safeguard their vital interests and to consolidate security and stability in the Gulf area. Egypt always welcomes an active European role in favor of peace and stability in which the FRG will play a major part.

I would like to state that I am completely pleased with the results of the talks with Chancellor Kohl, and I look forward to further meetings with him. I hope he will give us the honor of visiting us in Egypt at the earliest opportunity to continue this work which we have begun and in which we have gone a long way, thanks to the great enthusiasm displayed by our friends in the FRG in strengthening the ties of friendship and cooperation between the two countries.

Kohl, Mubarak Press Conference

LD141812 Hamburg DPA in German 1745 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl today appealed to all parties in the Middle East conflict to make use of the opportunity offered by the American Middle East initiative for negotiations, even if individual points of President Reagan's proposals are still in dispute. At a joint press conference with Egyptian President Husni Mubarak, Kohl also said that both governments agreed that there must be no further delay in finding a "solution to the problem of the Palestinians, which is central."

In his statement to the press, Kohl praised the "constructive attitude of the Arabs" at the summit conference in Fes, promised the Egyptian president an expansion of German-Arab relations in all spheres, and indirectly criticized Israel's behavior in Lebanon. The chancellor said that Egypt's contribution to building trust in the region must not be "called into question through the policy of military options and the creation of accomplished facts." Pointing to the situation in Lebanon, which he said continues to give cause for concern, Kohl stated: "We appreciate the legitimate need for security of all parties concerned, but not, however, for excessive demands at Lebanon's expense."

Kohl said that the war in Lebanon had again proved the senselessness of attempts to solve political problems with violence. It had also dramatically demonstrated the urgent need for a solution to the problem of the Palestinians, which is central. The chancellor said it is encouraging that among the Palestinians themselves a serious discussion (on the way to a peaceful negotiated solution) had begun. In the most extensive statement on the Middle East since taking office on October 1, Kohl refrained from giving an express commital to the entire EEC Middle East declaration issued in Venice in 1980, but he did call for the implementation of its main principles: Israel's right to exist in security, the right of the Palestinians to self-determination and renunciation of violence and the threat of violence.

The chancellor said that he agrees with Mubarak that Reagan's Middle East initiative offers realistic prospects for coming closer to the objective of a comprehensive, just and lasting peace. "We appeal therefore to all parties in the conflict to use this opportunity and overcome the stagnation in the peace process, even if they have doubts about one aspect or another of the concept," Kohl said. "The decisive thing is that they come to the negotiating table."

Kohl's talk with Mubarak, in which Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher also took part, was the political centerpiece of the visit by the Egyptian president, who came to Bonn with a large delegation including three ministers. Earlier, Mubarak met with former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and CSU Chairman Franz-Josef Strauss for separate talks.

Cairo on Press Conference

NC142051 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 2000 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Excerpts] After delivering their press statements, President Mubarak and German Chancellor Helmut Kohl then replied to newsmen's questions. In reply to a question on the dimensions of the Egyptian effort to bring about the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from Lebanon, President Mubarak said that close relations exist between Egypt and all of the European states and the EEC, and that Egypt does not ignore Europe's role in the issues of the area and the U.S. role in particular. He affirmed that Egypt will not consider its close relations with Europe as a substitute to close relations with other countries. Egypt is working with all the countries of the world.

In reply to newsmen's questions on the withdrawal of the Israeli forces from Lebanon and the deadlock reached in the negotiations, President Mubarak said that he is not overly pessimistic and that the United States is currently trying to bring about the withdrawal of the Israeli forces. His excellency affirmed that Egypt is continuing its efforts to bring about the withdrawal fo the foreign forces from Lebanon. Egypt has been playing an important role in the Arab area for the past 30 years, especially with regard to the Palestinian issue.

FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl, when asked whether President Mubarak has invited him to visit Egypt, replied that President Mubarak invited him while he was leader of the opposition and that he had now renewed the invitation. He said that he will visit Egypt in the middle of next year.

Mubarak Meets Lebanese Envoy

[Excerpt] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak ended his working visit to Bonn this morning and flew to Vienna for political talks. Before returning to Cairo, he will also have a stopover in Bucharest. Mubarak, who prior to his departure from Bonn also had meetings with SPD politician and Middle East expert Hans-Juergen Wischnewski, was given a sendoff by a Bundeswehr honor guard.

MITTERRAND, SHULTZ DISCUSS PERSHING MISSILES

LD141740 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] George Shultz, the American secretary of state, had lunch with Francois Mitterrand at the Elysee in Paris today. During more than 3 hours of talks, Francois Mitterrand assured Mr Shultz that France will support the deployment of Pershing II missiles in West Europe because France is of the opinion that the present balance of forces in Europe has been distrubed. It is also necessary to get the Soviets to take the Geneva negotiations seriously.

This morning, Claude Cheysson met with George Shultz and explained that France is in favor of the zero option, that is, France would request the withdrawal of the Soviet SS-20 missiles aimed at Europe, and in exchange would no longer support the deployment of Pershing missiles.

Disputes Seem To Be Settled

LD142150 Paris Domestic Service in French 2100 GMT 12 Dec 82

[Text] Mr Shultz's visit to France seems to have brought about the settlement of disputes between Paris and Washington. The old quarrels are no longer applicable, the American secretary of state said at a press conference after over 3 hours of talks with Francois Mitterrand. According to Mr Shultz, the French Government has discreetly approved a plan aimed at defining a common economic strategy toward the USSR. The Elysee spokesman for his part, stressed the total refusal of France to be dictated to by the United States, but France, on the other hand, is willing to take part in talks on strategic aspects of East-West trade.

Elysee Spokesman on Shultz Visit

PM151051 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Dec 82 pp 1, 4

[Excerpt] France is a "good and strong ally" of the United States, Elysee spokesman Vauzelle said Monday 13 December in commenting on U.S. Secretary of State Shultz's visit to Paris. Mr Vauzelle, describing what the president of the republic wished to convey to the Americans, several times stresses the link between the "strength" of France's alliance and "respect for its sovereignty" and independence. "There is no crisis, nor even any real problems" between France and the United States, he said, but France "is trying to make people understand its concept of the nature of a good ally." Especially in the military and economic spheres.

Being militarily strong, the Elysee spokesman continued, primarily means "showing concern for the balance of forces in Europe." As "there is an imbalance at present, France hopes that the U.S.-Soviet negotiations in Geneva will be successful." But in the absence of an agreement "it firmly supports the deployment of U.S. Pershing missiles in Europe." "It is not in our country," he added, that we are seeing a movement which, "under pacifist colors," would lead to the unilateral disarmament of West Europe "in face of the Eastern bloc's fantastic arsenal." "There is a connection," he said, "between defense effort and decisionmaking autonomy"; elsewhere, "where defense is provided by others, the reactions may be different."

This strength, Mr Vauzelle also said, "also stems from the effort which France is making for its defense in complete independence -- an effort stressed by Mr Mitterrand both as regards the deterrent force and other kinds of armament." Referring to the controversy aroused by the publication of general staff reports on the budget cuts, Mr Vauzelle stressed that French policy will have to be judged when the final texts "for a modern and effective defense system" are examined in the spring.

However, the spokesman continued, "it is impossible to ask for a considerable defense effort if you do not take the necessary economic measures." "It was the scale of the economic effort requested which prompted the U.S. congressmen to vote down the military funds," he remarked, referring to the U.S. Congress' refusal of funds for the new MX missiles.

The allies must therefore "help each other," it is in everybody's interest not to be the accomplice of economic disarray" and, Mr Vauzelle added in substance, it is time the United States adopted "a positive attitude" on monetary and foreign trade problems.

In the economic and military spheres, he concluded, "we agree to discuss, to try to make progress, but we refuse to be integrated into an organization undermining our sovereignty and freedom of choice. There must be no economic NATO. France intends to manage its foreign trade itself." (The spokesman was obviously alluding to references to France's exports to the USSR, which it intends to increase, and to the Euro-Siberian gas pipeline which has prompted U.S. sanctions.) "If there are sectors which worry our allies," he specified, "such as, for instance, exports of technology, it is natural that they should be handled in the control commission (a Western body which has controlled exports to the communist world for around 30 years), the OECD or elsewhere. But there is no question of France allowing its foreign trade to be dictated. France is the strongest and most loyal U.S. ally, but friendship presupposes frankness" and respect "for our concern for independence. We often afgue, but we are reliable."

SOVIET AMBASSADOR CHERVONENKO LEAVING POST

[Excerpt] Paris, Dec 13 (AFP) -- Stepan Chervonenko, Soviet ambassador in Paris since June 1973, said today he will leave that post on December 28 to return to Moscow and head a section of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee.

Mr Chervonenko, 67, who headed the Soviet Embassy here during a decade of tense Franco-Soviet relations, came to France from Prague, where he served as ambassador from 1965 to 1973.

AIR FORCE CHIEF'S LETTER CRITICIZES BUDGET CUTS

PM151109 Paris LE MATIN in French 7 Dec 82 p 3

[Extracts from "confidential" letter sent by French Air Force Chief of Staff General Capillon to Armed Forces Chief of Staff General Lacaze on 6 October; "Three Hundred Aircraft Instead of 450, Two Fewer Bases"]

[Text] Paris, 6 October 1982.

Air Force General Capillon, air force chief of staff, to Army General Lacaze, armed forces chief of staff.

Subject: Preparation of 1984-1988 Military Plan.

In keeping with the Defense Ministry directive of 30 July 1982, I have the honor to send you the Air Force's study on the 1984-1988 military plan. This study, which adheres as closely as possible to the resource packages at present imposed, leads to choices and cuts which would be particularly serious for the Air Force.

As regards section III (administrative budget), two factors should be highlighted: annual flying time limited to 400,000 hours and the reduction of manning levels by 7,000 soldiers at the end of the plan. Flying time has been reduced several times in the past. Measures have again been taken in this connection this year and will be continued until the end of the period.

Nonetheless, it is obvious that it will only be possible to maintain the training of the forces, and more especially the training of fighter pilots at the present minimum level, if the increase in fuel costs in the next few years does not exceed the chosen hypotheses. The reduction in manpower envisaged has consequences which must be stressed. Should the proportion of officers be 25 percent, in other words a reduction of 1,700 officers and noncommissioned officers in 5 years, it would be a number equivalent to the staff of two air bases, including all operational units, which would be affected.

In addition to that cutback there would be one of about 3,000 men from the ranks to be taken from the whole Air Force. As regards the actual implementation of that reduction, especially for the noncommissioned officers, it should be noted that administrative measures already taken -- recruitments, renewal of contracts, extensions of careers -- make it impossible to make the reduction required by the objective set in the first 2 years of the plan. Thus it seems necessary to envisage specific complementary measures for that staff category....

The reinforcement of bases has been reduced considerably, and modern arms requirements will only be met very gradually. The current 20mm twin-barreled gun program stopped back in the first year of the plan and the necessary increase in the number of Crotale missiles has been abandoned.... The arms program studies intended for the fighter plane of the future are behind schedule. The replacement of air defense radars, which are already vulnerable to blows and electronic countermeasurers, has been postponed until the end of next decade. The medium-range surface-to-air antiaircraft missile program, intended to back up the short-range means already in service or planned, has not been adopted....

With regard to the future, i.e. the next decade, the aging of the tactical aircraft fleet makes it necessary to prepare now for its replacement after 1995. The launching of a new tactical combat device on an initially experimental basis is, therefore, an operation which should be undertaken right at the start of the plan. It is also a necessary measure for maintaining our industrial capabilities in the face of foreign development. I should recall here, as I did to the premier recently, that the Air Force is a justification, a support and a guarantor for a large part of our aeronautical and arms industry, necessary to vital exports....

But such cuts -- the package imposed -- make it possible to order at most 22 devices per year, including the nuclear vehicles. That would mean the loss of one-fourth of our squadrons before the end of the nineties. At that rate, the Air Force would eventually move toward an Air Force of 300 fighter planes. The decisive importance of the Air Force element at any stage of a crisis or conflict should not be played down. In particular, large-scale resources should be engaged from the start to gain adequate freedom of action; despite losses, it would subsequently be necessary to still have the means of supporting our forces. At stake here is the capability to fulfill vital missions for our defense, for which the Air Force has always thought that the number of fighter planes should not fall below 450....

Thus an additional Fr 6 billion are needed for the 5 years covered by the plan. That is the only way of avoiding an inevitable weakening of the air forces, whose place and future are at stake.

COLOMBO STATEMENT ON RECALL OF SOFIA ENVOY

PM151033 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 12-13 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] Rome -- [Foreign] Minister Colombo has released the following statement to LA REPUBBLICA: "The recall to Rome of the Italian ambassador to Bulgaria has a precise significance that cannot escape anybody; the Italian Government is fully aware of the serious implications that could derive from the proven involvement of Bulgarian individuals or institutions in criminal and terrorist activities conducted in Italy. This is why, in close cooperation with the judiciary and partly via diplomatic channels, it wants to acquire all the specific information on which to base its political assessment. If it becomes necessary to adopt delicate and grave decisions, they will be resolutely adopted."

GOVERNMENT PARTIES URGE BREAK WITH BULGARIA

AU142009 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 14 -- The spiralling Bulgarian connection is the first thorny problem the new Italian Government of Prime Minister Amintore Fanfani will have to confront.

The Italian ambassador was called back from Sofia and returned to Rome yesterday. Ambassador Carlo Rossi Arnaud will not return to his post until there is a "clarification" of the revelations implicating Bulgaria in last year's attempt on Pope John Paul II's life, in the case of trade union spy Luigi Scricciolo and in a massive arms-drugs ring.

The Bulgarian affair is perhaps potentially the most serious scandal in Italy's recent history and could endanger the precarious Italian political equilibrium.

A polemic has already broken out between the Christian Democrat Party and its Government allies, the Socialists, Social Democrats and Liberals. The latter charge the Christian Democrat Party (DC), which has held the Foreign Ministry for several years, of "over diplomacy" and are urging drastic steps, including a complete break in diplomatic relations with Bulgaria.

Questions have also been raised about the caution of the preceding government of Republican Prime Minister Giovanni Spadolini, accused of having failed to inform his government partners of the allegations implicating Bulgarian agents in the attempted assassination of the pope.

TWO RED BRIGADES TERRORISTS GIVEN LIFE SENTENCES

AU141559 Rome ANSA in English 1540 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Matera, South Italy, December 14 -- Two Red Brigades terrorists were sentenced to life imprisonment today for the killing of State Prosecutor Nicola Giacumbi on March 16, 1980 in Salerno, near Naples.

Raffaele Fenio and Vincenzo de Stefano were given the maximum sentence in Italy and other defendants received sentences ranging from 10 to 20 years in prison at the end of the trial held in Potenze, in south-central Italy. A number of the defendants who got off with lighter sentences were given the benefit of special legislation on terrorist suspects who turn states evidence.

The state prosecutor was slain by the Brigades terrorists in response to the killing in Rome a few days earlier of an ultraleft activist, allegedly shot to death by neofascist terrorists. Giacumbi was picked as the target for the revenge slaying because he was a known rightwing sympathizer.

PINTO BALSEMAO MAKES STATEMENT ON U.S. VISIT

LD142336 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao left this afternoon for an official visit to the United States at President Reagan's invitation which, according to Balsemao, bears witness to the good relations of friendship between the two countries.

[Begin recording] During this visit there is a meeting scheduled with President Reagan and we will have meetings with Vice President Bush, with someone acting [em exercicio] for the secretary of state, with the secretary of defense and other officials, namely members of the Congress and the House of Representatives, at committee levels, and also with the business community. As you know, we are due back on Tuesday.

I believe that the question of the Lajes base will surely be high on the agenda of talks on bilateral matters, this being the reason why I have the pleasure of including the head of the Azores regional government in my delegation. He is coming with me at my invitation, thus demonstrating once more the spirit of cooperation between the central government and the government of the Azores autonomous region. Other matters surely to be discussed will be those concerning the situation in southern Africa, the Middle East and East-West relations. [end recording]

The prime minister is accompanied by Mota Amaral, as he himself said in his predeparture statement, by the foreign minister and by the secretary of state for defense. Virtually all the ministers and secretaries of state in the government went to the airport to see Pinto Balsemao off. Observers note that their presence on his departure could mean the Cabinet's support for the prime minister.

EANES ON PORTUGUESE, MEDITERRANEAN ISSUES

PM150801 Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 6 Dec 82 p 5

[Interview with Portuguese President Antonio Ramalho Eanes by APS special envoy in Lisbon -- date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: Mr President, before your visit to Algeria [6 through 9 December] we would like to have your assessment of Algerian-Portuguese relations and the prospects for developing them?

Answer: The relations established after the installation of the democratic regime in Portugal, which enabled us to develop our diplomatic relations, are based on the sound reasons of a mutual accord. Nonetheless, I think it is important primarily to stress the future prospects in the context of a closer rapprochement between Europe and Africa in which Algeria will probably have a leading role to play. This trend is the necessary response to the obstacles to the evolution of the most developed countries and is also the necessary precondition for the development of other regions characterized by great potential and great human resources which should take place without delay in the framework of solidarity among men and respect among nations. The value of relations between Algeria and Portugal should be analyzed in a framework which makes possible the organization of many forms of collaboration and cooperation.

Question: Mr President, could you talk to us about present-day Portugal, its aspirations and especially its economic and social development?

Answer: Portugal, like every European country, is suffering the effects of the economic crisis and is having to face them by adapting to the new conditions created by that crisis.

Nonetheless, unlike the other European countries, Portugal has also had to effect a political transition from a dictatorship to a democratic regime while making the economic and social adjustments resulting from the obvious decision to decolonize taken during the establishment of democracy after 1974. If the changes which have taken place in Portugal are placed in their historical context, they can be regarded as important. Nonetheless, if we are to take account of the objectives which all the political forces regard as possible and necessary, there is still a new collective effort to be made to enable Portugal's potential to be used either in the framework of its own development or in the service of its possibilities for international cooperation.

Question: Mr President, there is increasing talk of a "constitutional conflict" between your excellency and the Portuguese Government and, in this context, it is even being suggested that the results of the forthcoming municipal elections might prompt you to dissolve Parliament with a view to early parliamentary elections?

Answer: I do not think there is really a conflict between the president of the republic on the one hand and the executive and parliamentary majority supporting it on the other hand. Of course different positions exist on many political, economic and social questions. These differences often lead the government to adopt positions with which the president does not agree and prompt him to show his disagreement through legal mechanisms, including the right of veto.

Moreover the possibility of dissolving Parliament, for which the president of the republic has the constitutional power, requires careful political consideration given the political and economic consequences it would have. That prompts me to say, in principle, that the election results on 12 December will not make me decide to dissolve Parliament. As is always the case, the results of these forthcoming municipal elections will be very important for a political analysis of the Portuguese situation and it is on that basis that they will constitute a major element in the decision-making process. Furthermore, it is not long since I stated that the dissolution of Parliament required there to be alternatives with a minimum of credibility on the political horizon. If alternatives emerge after the municipal elections and because of them the problem of dissolving the assembly may indeed arise.

Question: Mr President, since Portugal is at the gateway to the Mediterranean, what is your analysis of the situation developing in this region which is the meeting point for Africa, Europe and the Arab world -- the increase, in the name of the logic of East-West confrontation, in the number of NATO bases, and in military maneuvers which are a real danger for the peoples with Mediterranean basin coasts?

Answer: Portugal, which is a Mediterranean country by nature and an Atlantic country be vocation, followed Mediterranean problems with special attention and our consideration of the issues in the region leads us to the following conclusions:

The demilitarization of the Mediterranean and the region's security are dependent on what is usually called the "East-West conflict." In addition it seems certain that the bipolarization of the world which stems from this conflict will be maintained in the Mediterranean during the next few years despite the desire of Mediterranean and other countries to considerably reduce if not eliminate that trend.

This is why we think that initiatives in that direction will not make a decisive contribution in the next few years. This also means that we think that the Mediterranean's fate will continue to be linked to that of East-West relations for an indefinite period.

'OFFICIAL FINAL' RESULTS OF LOCAL ELECTIONS

LD142054 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] The following are the official final results of last Sunday's local elections:

Socialist Party (PS): 31.8 percent of the vote, made up of 31.1 percent for PS and 0.7 percent for PS together with the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy (UEDS)
United People's Alliance (APU): 20.7 percent
Popular Democratic Union (UDP): 0.6 percent
Communist Party of Portuguese Workers (PCPT): 0.3 percent
Independent Social Democratic Association (ASDI): 0.1 percent
Workers' Party for Socialist Unity (POUS): 0.1 percent
Democratic Alliance (AD): 42.5 percent, made up of 19.6 percent for the AD, 14.6 percent for the Social Democratic Party (PSD), 7.5 percent for the Social Democratic Center Party (CDS), 0.6 percent for the Democratic Union, and 0.2 percent for the Popular Monarchist Party (PPM).

It can therefore be said that the AD won the local elections with 42.5 percent, with the vote counted in 303 councils.

PSD REAFFIRMS SUPPORT FOR GOVERNMENT, BALSEMAO

PA141705 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1104 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Lisbon, 14 Dec (EFE) -- The Political Commission of the Social Democratic Party (PSD) of Portugal today reaffirmed its support for the government of the center-right "Democratic Alliance" headed by PSD leader Francisco Pinto Balsemao.

The PSD Political Commission met last night in Lisbon to analyze the results of Sunday's municipal elections in Portugal. It stressed that the PSD maintains the relative strength it had within the coalition in power, also made up of the Christian Democratic Party and the People's Monarchist Party.

To the PSD the 43-percent vote obtained by the parties in the "Democratic Alliance" was "satisfactory," "particularly when compared with smaller percentages obtained recently by political forces in power in other countries in the Western world in similar elections."

The PSD Political Commission also noted that the election results lead to the conclusion that the PSD continues to hold "by far the largest number of mayoralties, noticeably larger than the number obtained by the other democratic parties." The PSD normally excludes the Portuguese Communist Party (PCP) from the democratic parties. According to initial figures, the PCP, which is a member of the "United People's Alliance," obtained 53 presidencies of municipal chambers (town councils).

EXPRESSO INTERVIEWS PSP'S MARIO SOARES

PM141401 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 27 Nov 82 pp 39-43 (Review Section)

[Interview with Portuguese Socialist Party (PSP) Secretary General Mario Soares by Jose Antonio Saraiva and Miguel Almeida Fernandes 22 November in Lisbon]

[Excerpt] Jose Antonio Saraiva: I would now like to ask you the following question: Some of the people who at the time fought hardest for maintaining support for General Ramalho Eanes' repeat candidacy have now left the party leadership....

Mario Soares: That is not true. They are all members of the party leadership, and there are even some of them in the current majority, such as Jaime Gama, Sottomayor Cardia, not to mention the regional leaders, the overwhelming majority of whom supported General Eanes' repeat candidacy....

What President of Republic Should (Not) Be

Saraiva: To continue: The departure of some of those figures from prominent posts suggests that the PSP is currently split between "Soarists" and "Eanists"; that is, people who still believe in the PSP and its secretary general, and people who, although they do not say so, believe that the alternative to the Democratic Alliance lies in General Eanes. What is your opinion of this?

Soares: I am surprised that my friend, with the qualities which he has as an historian, should reduce a situation which is complex to superficial outlines and political labels. Are there people in the PSP who believe that General Eanes could be an opposition to the Democratic Alliance? Such a conception of representative democracy is incompatible with the spirit of the Constitution. That is the least that I can say.

The president of the republic is a state body and as such should understand his role. It is reprehensible that the president of the republic should be viewed as an opposition to a government or as an opposition to a party. The president of the republic should be the guarantor of democratic stability and the promotor of agreements, consultation and dialogue among the Portuguese people -- all Portuguese people. He should not be a divider or, much less, a disrupter. He based his campaign, and very well, on a slogan: "To be the president of all Portuguese people." Now the president of all Portuguese people cannot be the leader of a minority against a majority, of one faction against other factions. That would be unacceptable.

Saraiva: That is what you believe he "should be." But is that what is really happening?

Soares: I believe that there are people who for personal reasons are intent on pushing General Ramalho Eanes in order to transform him into the leader of a faction. They are doing him a very great disservice. That is quite grave for the institutions' stability and for the president of the republic's own political future. I have issued some warnings to that end.

"Not Be Fettered to One Man"

Consider the example of foreign party leaders -- Francois Mitterrand, Karamanlis -- who on attaining the highest state office have relinquished their party leaderships to become their nations' mediators. How is it possible for a man who has no political past, who has no political leadership (this is not a criticism but an observation, and who was elected as an independent (since military personnel cannot have a party), to use his term of office to win a party leadership? It would be precisely the opposite path to that followed by all responsible politicians in the stabilized democracies. Are there still some emotional "Eanists" within the PSP? There were more before the Congress, certainly owing to the idea which people sought to disseminate at that time that it would be possible to fetter the PSP as a whole to one man's political career. Some people may have felt afraid at the right's advance and believed that that would be the easiest course.

Following the fourth congress, I believe that the splits in the PSP occurred over very specific issues: The revision of the Constitution and the problem of the military leaderships. Now that those issues have been surmounted, the conditions have been created for the splits to disappear and for the PSP to reunite over a single blueprint. That blueprint is aimed at the PSP becoming in Portugal what the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE] is in Spain, what the PS is in France, what PASOK is in Greece.

Fernandes: But as regards the president of the republic, it is a fact today that he is operating as a counterforce in relation both to the government and to the parties represented in the assembly of the republic.

Moreover, it is a fact that he channels some of the popular dissatisfaction which under normal conditions would inevitably favor the opposition parties -- specifically, the PSP. Is this not due to a mistake made by the PSP in not having known how to take advantage of the 7 December [1980] victory?

Soares: A socialist party cannot operate in terms of subservience to powers unrelated to it. This is an elementary rule for any self-respecting party. In order to be recognized and respected and to have magnetism, especially among young people, a party must not fetter itself to one man -- who, moreover, has a confused, ambiguous and contradictory political thinking, and nobody knows what he really believes in terms of his current political blueprint.

Fernandes: But the point of the question was this; If General Ramalho Eanes currently enjoys a certain prestige and succeeds in channeling a certain dissatisfaction toward himself, it this not due largely to a certain omission on the part of the PSP?

Soares: General Ramalho Eanes' personal prestige is not at issue. The opinion polls show that he remains popular. I believe, however, that he has lost a good deal among the most aware sectors, especially among skilled personnel. It is obvious that the president of the republic should be respected, but to say that he can win over dissatisfied sectors of Portuguese society is not to understand the role and mission resting with a president of the republic.

I Do Not Believe in Eanist Party

Fernandes: But is not the PSP responsible for this happening?

Soares: The PSP has no responsibility in that respect. Those who say so are adding insult to injury.... I do not deny that if the PSP had not had some internal problems, it would be much closer today to the PSOE's situation in Spain. There have been commentators who promote the belief that the PSP is no alternative, that is does not act like the great galvanizer of the opposition. That forms part of a campaign which has something behind it. On the one hand, it is conducted permanently by the Communist Party, for reasons which are well known; on the other, it is encouraged by the right. It has also been conducted within an area which I might term leftwing (it was the festive left in 1975), comprising people such as Jose Carlos de Vasconcelos and other propagandists of the so-called "new party," who never committed themselves politically at the grave and dangerous moments. They have the ambition of securing politically in General Ramalho Eanes' shadow what they have never had so far in Portuguese society. However, it seems clear to me that if what is at issue is the formation of a new party, the president of the republic has missed the opportunity for forming it or allowing it to be formed on his behalf.

Fernandes: So do you not believe in the formation of any Eanist party?

Soares: I have never believed in it, for a very simple reason; If the president of the republic had much stronger and firmer support in 1979, and did not have the courage to take the step, much less will he do so in 1982, when the party appears sponsored by [PCP Secretary General] Dr Alvaro Cunhal. It will have immediately and inevitably the distrust of all democrats in this country.

Failure of Communist Blueprint

Saraiva: You recently (I recall the television debate with Dr Alvaro Cunhal) introduced the expression "new left" into your language. However, the figures who might represent that "new left" have declined in the PSP, and at the same time the people of the "old guard," the people of the "apparatus" have risen. How do you explain this contradiction?

Soares: That question stems from a perfectly stereotyped view of the PSP, which does not correspond to the facts. The so-called right-minded Portuguese press (and within it I classify EXPRESSO) decided to create labels as regards PSP members. It encourages some and systematically criticizes others. We do not accept that kind of manipulation. When I talk about the "new left," I wish to refer basically to the following: There is today a crisis in the world, particularly in the developed countries of Europe, which is a cultural, economic and social crisis affecting simultaneously the Western countries and the communist world. The failure of the communist blueprint is today complete. And at the same time there is a failure of conservatism's solutions which has led the Reagan administration, for instance, to make a complete turnabout in its economic policy. In the light of that new situation, a blueprint has been asserting itself. It is called democratic socialism. For some years and in certain countries it has been theoretically "colonized" by communist ideology in the concepts employed. But democratic socialism is being rethought in terms of pragmatism and realism. It has to do with a stringent analysis and with an effective attack on the economic problems most besetting the workers. It is that new response which won France, Spain and Greece.

In Portugal, despite its much mentioned originality, we do not have much to devise. There is a party, and only one party -- the PSP -- which is involved in that broad current, enjoys prestige in international terms and has a very rich experience and some original theoretical reflection.

Saraiva: It is a good thing that you spoke of the European example. In those countries the left was emerging after a lengthy stay by the right in power, so that it would present itself as a "novelty." However, in Portugal everything is happening exactly the other way around. The PSP has already been in power and been ousted. Now the faces which it shows today are the "old faces" of the governments of 1976 and 1977. So how can it present itself to the electorate as a novelty, as in the case of the French, Greek or Spanish Socialist parties?

Politicians Cannot Be Improvised

Soares: You are right when you say that the PSP was the only socialist party in Europe, and perhaps in the world to succeed, not a rightwing government but a chaotic government of the irresponsible left, and which therefore had to reintroduce the rules of the game to make the economy and society work.

But at the end of 3 years of rightwing government the Portuguese people can make a comparison and have grounds for being able to choose. That is why we are witnessing the restoration of the PSP's prestige while it was in power. I have found that not only at the level of industrialists and employers but also at the level of workers, skilled personnel, professionals and trade unionists, people are beginning to do justice to the socialist government.

As for the renewal of personnel, I am clearly in favor. The PSP should open itself, must open itself to young people and should be a party of young people. It is just that political leaders cannot be improvised. It takes decades to make a politician. Now we have today cadres in the party who have enormous experience which they did not have when we were in power. The overwhelming majority of the leaders within the PSP assert that they wish to spend their political lives within the party and utterly reject the idea of joining other parties, presidential or otherwise.

Become Foremost Party Again

Fernandes: You have spoken both of PASOK's experience in Greece and of the PS' experience and Felipe Gonzalez' experience. However, one notes that there is a different course in the PSP. The PS and the PSOE have always relied on a strategy aimed at bipolarizing society, whereas your party referred only last August on television to the "spirit of tolerance" and appealed to the "central bloc"; it adopted (even in opposition) an anti-bipolarizing strategy.

Soares: Your question is good but is based on presuppositions which are incorrect. For instance, I never used the expression "central bloc..."

Fernandes: I did not say that you used it....

Soares: It was the president of the republic who used that expression. In fact I have always been opposed to bipolarization and remain so. In the countries of southern Europe, that bipolarization necessarily serves the right, not the left. That is the fundamental reason why I am opposed.

Fernandes: But recent history proves the contrary....

Soares: It is not correct, either, that the strategy of the French, Greek and Spanish parties is based on bipolarization. If it is true that in relation to France, it would be said that Mitterrand's tactic was to bring two large blocs into conflict -- left against right -- the truth is that he won the election precisely in 1981 and not 7 years earlier because only then was there a swing of middle class votes toward the PS.

It was the anti-leftwing-unity policy which the PCF always followed in practice since it denounced the joint program agreement which gave Mitterrand victory. As for Gonzalez, his strategy is -- and always has been -- totally antibipolarizing. What he has been saying is that the historic role of the socialist parties in underdeveloped countries of Europe is to secure the modernization of those countries' societies and their complete democratization. Felipe Gonzalez' strategy is similar to that which we have followed. The PSP puts itself forward as the best placed of the Portuguese parties to be the mediator of Portuguese society. We therefore believe that a new election would renew democratic legitimacy, paving the way for new solutions....

Fernandes: We are coming in to that...

Soares: Allow me, please, to finish the answer. Once legitimacy has been renewed and our position as foremost party has been restored -- as I believe will happen -- the PSP will be in a position to perform that role as mediator of Portuguese society, effecting its modernization and democratization at the political, economic, social and cultural levels and decentralizing, reforming and strengthening the regional autonomies.

Saraiva: I believe that in Portugal -- as, moreover, throughout the world -- part of the electorate is prompted to vote for the "expected winner." In 1976, the PSP, which was the winner at the outset, had the votes of much of the right. In 1979, the Democratic Alliance was the beneficiary. Has not the fact that the PSP has never defined a policy of alliances -- being therefore unable to present itself at the outset as a likely winner (alone or in coalition) -- harmed it electorally? To be specific, should not the PSP define its future allies today?

Soares: In the first place I will tell you that in 1976 Dr Sa Carneiro was convinced that he would succeed in achieving a majority. This means that at that time we succeeded in achieving what I regarded as a good result, bearing in mind that the PSP was already identified with the sixth provisional government. We formed a minority government, and today I ask myself whether it was not a mistake. I concede that it was.

The fundamental reason why we did not accept the alliance with the Social Democratic Party [PSD] was because, on the one hand, the PSP grassroots were not prepared to accept it, and, on the other, because we feared that the PCP (which had great strength at the time and was not yet demystified as it is today as regards the people's masses) might in that event polarize the entire left. We, who always regarded ourselves as a leftwing party, feared that they might harm the country. That is why we attemted to govern in a minority for 18 months.

Sa Carneiro Proposed Coalition To Me

In 1979, the situation was different. We had already undergone the experience of the governments formed on the president's initiative, and in fact, before launching the Democratic Alliance, Dr Sa Carneiro made me a proposal of alliance, with a view to fighting the election simultaneously against the PCP and against the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS]. I asked him which party would lead that alliance. In my opinion, it was essential to wait until after the election, in which each party would run on its own. Sa Carneiro replied: "If I go into the election as the PSD alone, you will defeat me again. I must create a new political fact, and if the PSP does not accept the alliance, I must make it with the CDS."

If at that time my priority political ambition had been to become president of the republic -- as some people claim -- I would have had the ideal opportunity then, because Sa Carneiro suggested that I become the future president of the republic and he the prime minister. I did not accept, because I am a politician who has engaged in politics since I was 17 years of age, interests and the interests of the party to which I belong. The results are plain. The Democratic Alliance was set up and today years later, is breaking up. And the PSP? Can the PSP have a majority ambition?

A year ago, the PSOE represented less than we do today. The PSP will make no alliances until the next general election, and will remain within the framework of the democratic left, making arrangements only with the parties associated with it -- the Union of the Left for Socialist Democracy and the Independent Social Democratic Association. But one thing is clear: We will not return to a minority government.

"What Will PSD Be Like?"

Saraiva: All right, the hypothesis of a minority government is ruled out. If it is highly unlikely that the PSP will secure an absolute majority and if a government alliance with the PCP or a return to a coalition with the CDS is also unlikely, then it is to be inferred that you are contemplating an alliance with the PSD. If that is so, and bearing in mind that both are large parties, who would lead that alliance?

Soares: You have taken a logical leap which I do not accept. You tell me that everything is heading toward an agreement with the PSD. This is an unproven presupposition. In the first place, we need to know what the PSD is like today and what it will be like once the Democratic Alliance is over. Its desintegration, which is proceeding every day, is extremely grave for democracy. I believe that the PSD will be severely penalized in the next election.

In addition to knowing what the PSD will be like, however, it is of interest to know also what the PCP and the CDS will be like. We believe that the PCP is also in crisis. I read carefully the interview which Dr Alvaro Cunhal granted you and I was shocked by the inability for innovation which he displays in that interview. So the PCP is going nowhere. Now there are workers in the PCP, and particularly in the Intersindical, who will be prompted to reflect that the line followed by the Communist Party is totally futile. It leads nowhere. Accordingly, the PSP should maintain dialogue with the PCP's electorate, and especially with the Intersindical.

Truth, Stringency and Courage

If there are signs that the Communist Party is tending to break with subservience to the Soviet Union, that it is ceasing to have the PSP as its principal enemy, and that it is renouncing the vanguardist theory of being a revolutionary party (which means taking power by means other than elections), there is no reason why we should not engage in dialogue with the PCP. What is blocking dialogue is the Communist Party's ossified leadership and its sectarianism.

The situation in the CDS is also quite confused and diffuse. I cannot understand why Professor Freitas do Amaral, who has political influence exceeding that of his own party, can continue to tolerate the stances of certain cadres, who frequently do not follow him. That is obvious in the CDS parliamentary group.

So I believe that we should embark on a great national dialogue only after a new election. What the Portuguese people want above all is to see their problems resolved. Fortunately, solutions of a military putschist nature are inconceivable in Portugal. We are destined to live in a pluralist democracy, so we must patriotically create a policy of national consensus. I have asked the president of the republic and the prime minister to adopt a national outlook and then point out to the Portuguese people the best way to extricate ourselves from the crisis. However, they persist in their own quarrels, in their problems of each other's responsibilities and powers, and have so far been unable to adopt that outlook.

In a period in which Portugal is in a deep crisis of existence, we need a clear diagnosis and to define and implement realistic solutions. The PSP will enter into this campaign without making promises because we are in no position to promise anything. It will only speak the language of truth, stringency and courage.

Win and Exceed 30 Percent

Fernandes: What does winning the local elections mean to the PSP?

Soares: It means exceeding 30 percent in the overall percentage, even if it is 30 odd points. It also means some 15 municipal councils and achieving an appreciable increase in its local authority voters. I must tell you that for a divided and declining party such as people say it is, we found it extremely easy to organize our lists. We included about 40 percent independents and new people. We are running in over 283 parishes.

Fernandes: Is there a socialist groundswell?

Soares: Do not pin certain utterances on me to be used against the PSP afterward. Do me that favor. What I will tell you is that I have come from Madeira, and my comrades have insisted that I state that it is perfectly within our grasp to win the councils of Funchal and Porto Santo. If that happened, it would be a memorable event. Dr Alberto Joao Jardim would become the leader of the Madeira countryside, while the urban part would become socialist.

Fernandes: If the PSP achieves good results in the local elections, will it logically continue to insist on the government's dismissal and the calling of an early general election?

"Unprecedented Spectacle"

Soares: If these results are achieved, one thing is obvious: The Democratic Alliance will have lost the majority. And if that is so -- as all the opinion polls indicate (including the one which appeared well concealed on page 2 of the last issue of EXPRESSO, which said that Mr Abecassis will only obtain 35 percent of the votes), the government will be unable to keep going any longer. At this moment, matters in the government are as follows: The ministers do not resign although they do not get along and are at sixes and sevens with each other. It is an unprecedented spectacle. The minister of transport says that the plan for the navigability of the Douro is unprofitable, and 8 days later the prime minister says exactly the opposite.

Minister Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa says that it is necessary to support the Social Democratic deputies' initiative as regards the Camarate enquiry [into the December 1980 air crash in which former Prime Minister sa Carneiro and others died] and the minister of justice says that that is a legal monstrosity. In the meantime, nothing happens and everything remains unchanged. The country remains neglected. You would say that there is no government; indeed, there is sometimes not even a quorum in the Cabinet....

Saraiva: In his latest speech General Eanes violently attacked the PSP. He accused it of this contradiction: First the PSP allied itself with the Democratic Alliance to reduce his powers, and now it is asking him to dismiss the Democratic Alliance government. Do you wish to comment?

Soares: I believe, and I have told the president of the republic this, that this is incorrect. Almeida Santos has already explained -- and with his usual brilliance -- that there was no reduction of powers and that the president of the republic remains fully empowered to dismiss the government. If he does not dismiss the government, it is because he does not have the political courage to do so, or because he refuses to take risks, or because...but let us speak no more about that unfortunate speech. It is a speech to forget. Some days ago I already asked journalists to mercifully forget it.

Fernandes: But the Constitution says that that can only be done in exceptional cases...

Soares: We are confronted with one of those cases. The democratic institutions' regular functioning is at stake. What could be graver than a government which does not function? Moreover, the argument upheld by the president of the republic is in the long run harmful to him. If what he says were true, he would become a kind of queen of England. But that is not the case.The semipresidentialist system is still in force in Portugal.

"Eurocommunism Has Also Failed"

Saraiva: You spoke a short while ago of the democratization of the PCP. But do you not believe that if the PCP liberalized itself, it is the PSP which would be harmed in the final analysis? If the PCP adopted more moderate language and thereby penetrated into other sectors of the leftwing electorate, which currently stand aloof from the party because of its sectarianism, what would become of the PSP? In other words, would not the "Italianization of the PCP" mean the "Italianization of the PSP"?

Soares: As regards Italinization, I must tell you that there has always been a great mistake in the use of the expression. The PSI "Italianized itself," to use your expression, because after the war it moved closer to the PCI to such an extent that in many respects it did not differ from it. Pietro Nenni, a figure whom I knew and admired, won the Lenin Prize and did not wish to join the Socialist International because he regarded it as unorthodox vis-a-vis collectivist Marxism. Following the 20th CPSU Congress, the PSI changed its stance, and today with Bettino Craxi it has a line identical to that of the other European socialist parties.

The danger of "Italianization" does not arise in Portugal. The conditions are different. The communist model has failed, as I told you, just as Eurocommunism -- a desperate attempt to adjust the communist parties to stable democratic societies -- has failed.

If you study the elections in Portugal, you can see that the Communist Party has never greatly increased its modest percentages, except for the 1979 local elections, when it rose to 20 percent on the United People's Alliance ticket. This is the contradiction of the Western communist parties. They cannot support the totalitarian and antidemocratic model applied in the Eastern bloc and at the same time integrate themselves into the West's democratic and pluralist system -- a contradiction which will be increasingly perceived in Portugal.

So far, owing to a tremendous organizational effort, the PCP has succeeded in disguising that contradiction (although Poland has inflicted deep scars on it), attempting to bipolarize Portuguese society. But democracy's functioning poses the communist voters and party members problems which they eventually take within the party. That is why the communist parties in the democratic Western societies are doomed in the long run.

Fernandes: The Democratic Alliance frequently criticizes the PSP on the ground that your party does not constitute a real alternative. What is your opinion?

Soares: It is not only the Democratic Alliance which levels that criticism. I have already heard the same from communists, supporters of the president of the republic and some people who, while claiming to be leftwing, do not hesitate to set themselves above the democratic process of popular choice. It is the electorate -- the people -- who define the alternatives, and not the president of the republic, the so-called right-minded people or the analysts. Otherwise, there would be no need of elections... or they would be mere confirmations of prior choices. As regards the program -- that is, in program terms -- the PSP is indisputably an alternative. Is there any other?

Fernandes: However, the opinion polls indicate 27 percent for the PSP....

Soares: The opinion polls give the PSP 27 percent, while the PSD has 24 percent and the PCP 11 percent. They are opinion polls which do not count the voters who have not yet decided. That only shows that the PSP will rise.

Saraiva: You recently acknowledged that within a year you would cease to be PSP secretary general....

Soares: I did not acknowledge....

Saraiva: But that was reported....

Soares: A report was published in O JORNAL saying that it is known that there are people who believe that it would be advantageous for the PSP to change its rules so that the secretary general would cease to be the leader and become an executive. It is a matter which has never been discussed in the PSP's leadership bodies, but which is obviously not a taboo matter....

Saraiva: The question which I would like to ask you is this: In the German SPD, when the head of government falls for any reason, the party puts forward a new candidate for the next cabinet, although keeping its historical leader. Does or does not the PSP accept that possibility in the next election?

"I Have Never Imposed Myself as Leader"

Soares: The PSP accepts all possibilities. Why not? However, I note that that question is one of your concerns in this interview. To reassure you, I will tell you that I have never imposed myself as PSP leader. I have always been pushed into that post, and I am always at the party's disposal to cease holding it when it sees fit.

Fernandes: What will your stance be if the PSP decides to put forward your name for the presidential election?

With that ritual question you wish to suggest that that is a fundamental concern in my options. It is not. At the personal level that ambition does not exist. If it is required by the party, however, and if national circumstances make it advisable, I do not rule out the hypothesis at the outset. However, I believe that it is destabilizing at this moment, 3 years ahead, to talk about it obsessively. The president of the republic should be helped to carry out his mandate to the end, in terms of being able to perform the lofty national role incumbent on him: the role of supreme arbiter of national life, peacemaker and a man capable of promoting agreements and consultation, while at the same time decisively contributing to the stabilization of the democratic institutions. When I criticize the president of the republic, as I have done in this interview, I always criticize him in a constructive spirit and from this viewpoint.

Fernandes: In any event, you nowadays regard General Eanes as an opponent of the PSP. I cite the instances of the latest presidential address and the veto on the defense law as regards the PSP.

Soares: General Eanes has delivered addresses and acted in ways which objectively have a clear anti-PSP intention. It is strange that he should act in this way, since it is we who always helped him most to become president of the republic.

However, I wish to say, as regards the questions which you are repeatedly asking me, that I would prefer us to talk more about the country's actual issues and less about people, ambitions and petty conflicts. I believe that petty politics have been overemphasized in our news media. Why are the necessary homes not being constructed? Why are development projects not being carried out? How is the balance of payments deficit going to be resolved? What support are we going to give to our exports? What role are we going to play in Africa? How are we going to integrate Portugal into Europe? These are the major problems....

"PSP Is Not a Firefighter"

Fernandes: In connection with the balance of payments, if the PSP came to power again, would it seek another loan from the IMF?

Soares: The country must realize that the PSP is not a volunteer firefighter who is used for extinguishing the fires kindled by others. It cannot be summoned to resolve the crises with obvious costs and then cast aside, as happened in 1978.

I will remind you that in 1981 Minister Joao Salgueiro refused to conclude the negotiations with the IMF which were underway at the time. Why did he do so? What were the consequences of that decision?

First of all, before the PSP even considers forming a government, the PSP must demand that stock be taken publicly of the misdeeds of 3 years of Democratic Alliance government.

Fernandes: In view of this situation, are you in a hurry to form a government?

Soares: From the party viewpoint, not at all. But we adopt a national outlook, and if we continue to allow the situation to deteriorate, we could reach a dangerous point of no return.

Fernandes: Almeida Santos recently put forward the hypothesis of a government of national salvation formed by the PSP, the PSD and the CDS. What is your stance on this matter?

Soares: I believe that the expression "national salvation" is rather ambiguous. In order to emerge from this crisis situation we need a policy of great national consultation and solidarity. How will it be reflected in political terms?

Before answering, we must reach, through the PSP's mediation, (I can see no other political force capable of attempting it) an overall agreement for recovery and development with the social partners. The political agreements will come afterward and will necessarily have to be broadened.

Saraiva: One final question. A crucial issue for the leftwing parties which yearn to be in power throughout the world is to have considerable trade union influence. This applies to the British Labor Party, the German SPD and even the PS. And as regards the last party, a curious thing can be observed: How its influence in the trade unions is less than that of the communists. Mitterrand made an alliance with the PCF, which makes it possible, among other things, to commit the largest trade union federation -- the General Confederation of Labor -- to the government's policy. I ask you: How does the PSP, which wishes to be in power and whose trade union influence is very small, intend to resolve the problem? And moreover: Does the fact that the PCP is the strongest party in the trade unions point towards a PS-PCP government alliance?

Soares: It is mistaken to discuss trade union problems in party terms. We are in favor of independent trade unionism. That being said, I do not believe that the PSP has little influence at the level of the world of labor. There are PSP leaders with influence at the level of trade unions. In all large enterprises there are PSP groups which are active and sizable. Nor does it seem fair to say that the PS has a comparatively stronger position than the PSP in the world of labor. Certainly, the disparity is apparent as regards the Spanish, British and German cases, but in the Latin Countries, except perhaps for Spain, the situation is different. If there are mistakes which we have made, and which I accept, one of them was that the socialists did not set out in 1974 to set up a trade union federation when the Intersindical proved to be a driving belt of the PCP. I mean the socialist trade unionists and obviously not the PSP, because the latter, as a party, must not promote the setting up of trade unions.

Saraiva: Do you not believe that it is contradictory for the PSP (a leftwing party) to be in power and the Intersindical (the largest trade union federation) to be in opposition?

Soares: While we were in power we had no grave industrial disputes. There was always dialogue with the General Confederation of Portuguese Labor [CGTP], even during the most acute periods of crisis between the PSP and the Communist Party. When I now call for consultation among the social partners as an essential condition for surmounting the crisis, I obviously do not exclude the CGTP-national Intersindical. In a situation of acute crisis, social dialogue is advantageous to the workers. However politically sectarian it may be, the Intersindical will be unable to forget this, if it wishes to retain the workers' trust.

EANES RECEIVES AMBASSADORS' CREDENTIALS

SECRETARY OF STATE SHULTZ ARRIVES 15 DECEMBER

LD151200 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] The U.S. secretary of state is now in Madrid. A report from Hector Arenas at Barajas airport:

[Arenas] U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz has arrived here aboard a U.S. Air Force 707 that taxied up to the area near the VIP lounge just 2 or 3 minutes ago. He is accompanied by a sizeable delegation of advisers for this 24-hour visit to Spain. Shultz was met at the foot of the aircraft steps by Spanish Foreign Minister Fernando Moran, who had a couple of minutes earlier informally told a group of journalists that he expected this visit to be a frank exchange of attitudes on a number of subjects, all within a climate of friendship and understanding.

Shultz is now on his way by car toward the center of Madrid. There is heavy security all along the route, especially at bridges and junctions.

Shultz will meet this morning with his Spanish counterpart, Fernando Moran, and this afternoon he will meet Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez followed by the opposition leader, Manuel Fraga. The meetings will end tomorrow with an audience with his majesty the king.

It should also be said that analysts believe that these contacts will deal with the kind of bilateral relations to be expected in the future. These relations will be determined by the new agreement on bilateral military cooperation that must be ratified by parliament, including the possibility that the U.S. base at Rorrejon will be moved -- aircraft from the base (?come close to) to the perimeter of Barajas here -- and by Spanish reservations on its presence in NATO.

That is all from Barajas for the moment.

FOREIGN MINISTER MORAN DISCUSSES NATO MEMBERSHIP

PM150835 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 10 Dec 82 p 2

[Soledad Gallego-Diaz dispatch: "Government Will Study Consequences of Spain's NATO Membership Before Holding Referendum"]

[Excerpt] Brussels -- The Spanish Government will honor the commitments undertaken in joining NATO and will undertake a thorough study of the political and defense consequences this entails, so the Spanish people will have sufficient facts to express their opinion. In the meantime, and since Spain is not integrated militarily into the alliance, it will take no step in that direction. This was spelled out by Foreign Minister Fernando Moran to his 15 Atlantic Council colleagues meeting in Brussels for their fall session.

The Spanish minister explained the political process that has occurred in our country and the stance on the Atlantic alliance adopted by the Socialist Party. "Spain," Fernando Moran said at a news conference, "is a loyal, sound and cooperative member of the alliance, and will fulfill the obligations undertaken in acceding to the Washington treaty. I believe I have maintained the Spanish stance with dignity and that the other Atlantic Council members have understood this will to contribute to Western defense and desire for autonomy."

The foreign minister -- who was making his first statement before an international forum -- stressed that the government had achieved its aim and explained its stance in a "spirit of cooperation and friendship" toward the alliance.

The final communique, which will be published today, will include a paragraph embodying the Spanish representative's statement, despite which our country will not sign the document. "This stance should not be seen as an indication of disagreement with its contents or of hostility toward the alliance," Moran explained.

Asked whether, despite everything, there were disagreements regarding the paragraph on modernization of intermediate range nuclear weapons, the minister stated that he had not begun to discuss any of the points in the final communique. However, he explained, "That and others could be the object of disagreement," although in any event Spain is not affected by the so-called dual decision of December 1979.

Regarding the Spanish defense minister's possible presence at NATO Defense Planning Committee meetings, Fernando Moran pointed out that the only body that figures in the Washington treaty is the Atlantic Council -- foreign ministers -- but that circumstances will determine the Spanish Government's attitude. "Membership of the various alliance committees does not mean military integration," he added, and he emphasized that Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez has explained that Spain's stance will be to make its voice heard, without thereby allowing itself to be carried away by automatic actions of any kind.

"I would not like to be presented as a 'heroic resister,'" Fernando Moran quipped, "because the fact is that I was not subjected to the slightest pressure and that our stance was understood." According to the Spanish minister, none of his counterparts asked how long the "thorough study" to which he had referred might last.

"Definite Dates Not Even To Marry"

Asked whether he had referred before his counterparts to the possibility of a referendum on Spain's membership of NATO, Moran asserted that he had stated that the Spanish people would be consulted "on Spain's forms of contribution to Western defense." As for the possibility of setting a date for this, he explained that the government does not wish to "subject itself" to definite dates, which might subsequently coincide with international or domestic crises. "Definite dates, not even to marry," he asserted. [as published]

The minister summarized Spain's stance: "Neither to be stubborn about a total rejection on principle nor to allow itself to be carried away to unwanted consequences."

Regarding the EEC, Moran stated that Spain's membership does not depend on relations with the Atlantic alliance. Spain has a right to accede to the Treaty of Rome (which estabished the ECC), and there is no question of "a tip" in return for something else.

The minister met early in the morning with his FRG counterpart Hans-Dietrich Genscher, with whom he discussed problems connected with NATO and with the EEC for about 70 minutes. The FRG will hold the rotating EEC chairmanship from next January. Genscher apparently conveyed to Moran an invitation for Felipe Gonzalez and the Spanish foreign minister himself to visit Bonn.

"Honeymoon" With Claude Cheysson

In the afternoon, and in addition to two brief meetings with the Belgian and Italian ministers, Fernando Moran held a lengthy conversation with his French counterpart Claude Cheysson. The Spanish minister appeared to be extremely satisfied with his contact with Cheysson. "It was a frank, very friendly and very constructive meeting," he explained. "The path toward Europe is not easy, and I do not wish to give any impression of overconfidence, but I can say that the meeting I held with the French minister is the one which has left me most satisfied in my entire diplomatic career." Moran stated that relations with France are not confined either to the alliance or to the EEC, and that the two countries can do more things together than separately.

Finally, the Spanish foreign minster announced that he will propose the setting up of an international cooperation body, which will "bring me many struggles with the minister of finance. We want foreign policy to contribute to the culture of democracy and the international values of cooperation and support to become integrated into Spanish society," he added.

ETA DEMANDS, ACTIONS AGAINST BANKS REVEALED

PA141750 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1412 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Madrid, 14 Dec (EFE) -- The large Spanish banks received letters last April from the terrorist organization ETA [Euzkadi Ta Azkatasuna] demanding payment of a "revolutionary tax" of 250 million pesetas (some $2 million).

In the last few months ETA terrorists have exploded charges of approximately 2 kg of "Plastic-2" in 50 banks in the Basque region, each of which caused damage.

Banking sources said today that the first letters sent to the banks by ETA were received last April, demanding that the Bank of Vizcaya and the Bank of Santander pay 10,000 pesetas for each councilman, which totals 250 million pesetas per bank (some $2 million). If the banks did not pay, the ETA threatened to start a wave of attacks against people and property.

Three months later similar letters were sent to Banesto and its subsidiary, the Banco Guipuzcoano, Hispano y Bilbao and by the end of summer the threat was expanded to include the central, popular and several medium-sized banks.

AKTUELT VIEWS FOLKETING MISSILE FUNDS VOTE

PM150943 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 8 Dec 82 p 8

[Editorial: "Missiles a Damp Squib"]

[Text] The nonsocialist coalition government has survived yet another vote. The Folketing's political showdown on new West European nuclear missiles was an anticlimax after the dramatic buildup with "threats of elections" and a violent nonsocialist campaign against the Social Democrats and the former government party's demands that the question of future fund allocations for the missile program be shelved.

Once again Prime Minister Poul Schlueter has had to admit that the nonsocialist government does not rule on the foundation of a majority in the Folketing but is forced to bow to the wishes of the majority, which has not changed since the change of government in September.

The government is satisfied that Denmark is able to meet its commitments in the coming months and will be able to return to the question at a later date, the prime minister said during the debate, in which the government parties were forced to accept the fact that there is no majority for the allocation of new funds to the missile program over and above the 26 million kroner Denmark has already promised.

The government saved its life this time, too, and there will not be an election on the missile issue. And just as well. The government should not be toppled on a NATO question, and it would have been unreasonable for the conservative section of the government to have seized on the missiles as an election opportunity. The nonsocialist government will be toppled on account of its antisocial economic policy which creates unemployment.

PRESIDENT, PARTIES TO ATTEND MOSCOW FESTIVITIES

LD142300 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1700 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto will attend the festivities in Moscow next week marking the 60th anniversary of the establishment of the USSR. The president and his entourage will leave for Moscow by air on Monday and return home on Wednesday. The president will be accompanied by Foreign Minister Par Stenback, among others. This was announced by the president's office today.

Earlier the biggest government parties, the SDP [Social Democratic Party], the SKP [Finnish Communist Party] and the Center Party, appointed their own delegations to the 60th anniversary festivities of the USSR. The chairmen of four workers' organizations have also been invited to the Moscow festivities.

POLISH STOWAWAYS ON FINNISH SHIP REQUEST ASYLUM

[Text] Two Polish refugees went ashore in Sodertalje on Monday from the Finnish coal vessel MS Kontula, which had arrived from Gdansk at 0800 hours. The men had rowed out to the Kontula while the ship lay at anchor in Gdansk. The two men, who are 21 and 26 years of age, were taken into custody by the Sodertalje police and have requested asylum in Sweden.

After some on the spot questioning, the matter was turned over to the Immigration Police, said a spokesman for the Sodertalje police. It was the pilots stationed at Landsort at the channel to Sodertalje who were alerted by the captain of the Kontula Reijo Mattila, to the fact that the two were on board. The police met the vessel at the Sodertalje coal-fired heating plant, and the men are now at the police station awaiting a hearing. The Kontula, which belongs to Etela-Suomen Laiva Oy in Helsinki, is to return to Gdansk on Friday to take on a new load of coal, this time for Raumo. The shipping firm is worried about the ramifications the defection may have for the ship's continued trading with Poland. It has been revealed that earlier this year another defector is said to have used one of Etela-Suomen's ships to flee Poland.

PALME COMMISSION PROPOSES NUCLEAR-FREE ZONES

PM150845 Stockholm STOCKHOLMSTIDNINGEN in Swedish 10 Dec 82 p 41

[Editorial: "Steps in Support of Peace"]

[Text] Without dramatic gestures Sweden has approached a number of European governments, and Moscow and Washington, to sound out the kind of interest there may be in a nuclear-free zone along the border between East and West right through central Europe as recommended by the Palme Commission.

The liberal EXPRESSEN is of course right when its writes that the establishment of such a zone would be of great symbolic value, as it is also right when it reflects that unfortunately it is unlikely that Sweden will find much sympathy for the proposal. Nevertheless, it is right both that the Swedish Government should make soundings before a proposal is actually put forward and that the commission's proposal should be revitalized in this way.

It is an expression of what Swedish Foreign Ministry Under Secretary Pierre Schori described in an article in STOCKHOLMSTIDNINGEN on Sweden's new active foreign policy. This description also applies, for example, to Swedish initiatives for a number of UN resolutions this fall which have won the support of the UN majority.

As far as the idea of a nuclear-free zone through Europe is concerned, this is also a way of keeping the discussion alive and forcing the superpowers and the military alliances always to act against the background of an active body of public opinion in favor of peace and disarmament in Europe.

In our view the situation is different when the question of a nuclear-free zone in the Nordic area is discussed. Implementing the call for such a zone or even creating some sort of minizone could be said to have significance as an expression of political determination and as moral pressure. But important concrete Swedish security interests are at stake here, and this is why the discussion from the very start must couch its definitions in much clearer terms. Otherwise the debate and the conclusions reached run the risk of leading to illusions which could create a false sense of security. And this would not serve the interests of Sweden or those of the stability of this part of Europe.

DEFENSE MINISTRY ISSUES SECOND WHITE PAPER

[By Robert Hutchinson, PA defence correspondent]

[Excerpt] A massive 1,000 pounds million package to boost Britain's defences in the wake of the Falklands campaign was announced today by Defence Secretary Mr John Nott. A new defence white paper -- the second this year -- stressed: "We shall be taking measures which will strengthen our general defence capability by increasing the flexibility, mobility and readiness of all three services for operations in support of NATO and elsewhere."

As expected, the Royal Navy has won, at least temporarily, some of its demands. A total of 55 frigates and destroyers will be maintained by running-on older ships over the next three years. Four ships which would have gone into the standby squadron by April 1985 will now remain in the front line of the fleet. But in the longer term, the escort's strength will be lowered in line with last year's defence review to around 50 ships by April 1, 1987. The number of the standby squadron within this total of 50, will be for "decision at the time in the light of the resources available."

The white paper announces:

-- Six new ships for the Royal Navy, at a cost totalling 600 million pounds, ordered from the ship yards of Swan Hunter, Yarrows and Vosper Thornycroft. These include five type 22 "super frigates", some fitted with new communications, others with a medium calibre gun, and eight instead of four Exocet-type anti-ship missiles.

-- Strengthening of 5 Infantry Brigade by giving it an artillery regiment, light tanks for armoured reconnaissance and logistic support. With 3 Commando Brigade, Royal Marines, Britain "will have a better capability to respond to the unforeseen in a rapid way."

-- Six Tristar aircraft from British Airways for use as strategic air-to-air refuelling tankers, at a cost, with conversion work, of between 100 million and 200 million pounds. Each Tristar will be able to refuel two Phantom fighters and carry 120 men to the Falklands at the same time.

-- Twelve second-hand Phantoms to be bought from the United States to reinforce Britain's air defence while RAF aircraft are in the Falklands.

-- Five extra Chinook transport helicopters on top of the three being purchased to replace those lost when the Atlantic conveyor was sunk in the Falklands. Each can carry 80 soldiers.

-- Point defense weapons -- probably rapid-fire guns to shoot down missiles being fitted to the Royal Navy's existing and planned carriers, the destroyer Bristol, the amphibious warfare ships Fearless and Intrepid, and all the type 42 destroyers.

-- Depending on talks with unions on flexible working, a slightly increased role for Portsmouth Naval Base.

Under the defence review, the workforce was to be cut to 1,300 civilians, but new work created by extra ships being kept on means the workforce will be boosted to 2,800. It is understood that the number of redundancies planned for the Navy could be slightly fewer than the 4,000 planned for next year, although the final figure is not yet known. But job cuts at shore establishments will continue.

One of the most significant new moves is the order for new type 22 "super frigates". One is merely confirmation of an intention to order announced in the summer. All will have increased safety measures, better water-type hatches, fuel tanks re-sited lower down in the hull, and fire hydrants. Three will be of a new design, equipped with the Vickers Mark 8 4.5 inch gun, and will have more anti-ship missiles, the improved Sea Wolf anti-missile rocket, and probably a close support gun system for shooting down attacking missiles. They will also be able to carry the Sea King helicopter or the new EH-101, now under development by Britain and Italy.

The cost of the new ships -- four of which replace the Sheffield, Coventry, Ardent and Antelope lost in the Falklands war -- will be under 130 million pounds each -- lower than the ministry estimate. The orders for the first two ships of the new variant class will go to the type 22 design yard, Yarrow's on the clyde. Vosper Thorneycroft of Southampton, and Cammell Laird, of Liverpool, are said to be strong contenders for the third order. A replacement for the logistic landing ship, Sir Galahad, lost at Bluff Cove, is now being designed. But the Navy hopes that her sister ship, Sir Tristan, also damaged in the same bombing attack, will be brought back to Britain for repair.

The Army's 5 Infantry Brigade will get its own squadron of RAF Hercules transport planes, fitted with radar station-keeping devices, in 1985 to allow the paras once again to make assault drops on targets. The improvements to 5 Infantry Brigade, including new artillery and light tank regiments, and a squadron of Army Air Corps helicopters, "represent a major improvement to our capability for airborne operations" outside the NATO area, says the white paper. The two brigades - the other being the Marines' 3 Commando Brigade - give "a greatly improved ability to respond to the unforeseen in a flexible and rapid way."

The ministry is also buying 24 additional Rapier SAM missile units for the Army and the RAF regiment. The decision to plump for the six British Airways Tristars was no doubt influenced by the fact that one Tristar is cheaper to run than four of its rival DC-10s, and that badly needed capital will be injected into the state airline. One Tristar's capability is equal to that of eight of the RAF's present Victor air-to-air tankers, and the jetliner will also be able to carry troops and freight at the same time.

A total of 500 million pounds is being spent on the new ships, another 100 million pounds on helicopters, 200 million pounds on improvements to weapons systems, and a further 424 million pounds on the Falklands garrison.

Admiral of the Fleet Sir Henry Leach, who returned as first sea lord on December 1, and led the Navy's fights against the cuts, said: "the white paper was fairly representative of the situation today, and I support it. Anybody would always wish for a little more."

IRELAND: NEW PRIME MINISTER DESIGNATED

NC141724 Paris AFP in English 1713 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Dublin, Dec 14 (AFP) -- Garret Fitzgerald was today designated prime minister of the Irish Republic after outgoing Premier Charles Haughey failed in a bid to form a minority government. Mr Fitzgerald, 57, is to form a coalition Fine Gael-Labour government. He was elected in Parliament after an 85-79 vote. Mr Haughey, whose Fianna Fail Party suffered a setback in general elections on November 24, was defeated by 88 votes to 77.

Garret Fitzgerald Confirmed

LD141820 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1735 GMT 14 Dec 82

[By Chris Parkin, PA staff reporter]

[Text] Dr Garret Fitzgerald was confirmed tonight as the new prime minister of the Irish Republic. He gained control of the Dublin government ousting Mr Charles Haughey in a vote at the first meeting of the country's newly elected Parliament.

Dr Fitzerald's return to power as head of a Fine Gael-Labour coalition administration came a little more than nine months after he had surrendered office to Fianna Fail Party chief Mr Haughey in a similar division of the Dail. This time boosted by general election gains last month for his Fine Gael and for Labour, Dr Fitzgerald was an easy winner. He secured the job by a six-vote majority and soon after the declaration, collected his seal of office from Ireland's president, Dr Patrick Hillery.

He was due to return later to name his cabinet. Apart from Dr Fitzgerald, one man was certain of a government post -- Labour's leader Mr Dick Spring, who, at 32, was set to become Ireland's youngest deputy premier. Through a deal agreed at weekend conference, Labour was expected to get four of the 15 Cabinet seats plus three junior ministries.

Before leaving to see the president, Dr Fitzgerald told the Dail he hoped the efforts of Parliament and the whole country would mobilize to tackle the challenges ahead. Dr Fitzgerald was congratulated by Mr Haughey, who said: "We wish him well in this difficult assignment. I am fully aware of the problems facing Dr Fitzgerald as prime minister, and of the onerous and difficult responsibilities."

FLORAKIS GIVES AIMS OF KKE'S 11TH CONGRESS

NC131910 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 13 Dec 82 p 7

[Text] KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis made the following statent to ELEVTHEROTIPIA on the particular significance of the party's 11 congress [due to start 14 December]. "Every single congress of a communist party has, in any eventuality, great political significance. This particular significance is judged, in every given case, by the problems it has to deal with. Our 11th congress is being held at a time when our country is facing a critical and complex situation. As a nation and as a people, we are facing grave and difficult problems. At the same time, the dangers facing world peace, and specifically our own peaceful future, are very serious.

"Through our congress we want to contribute to the struggle for peace and detente, to give a clearer answer as to how we can extricate ourselves from today's deep economic crisis, to show the ways through which our national and economic problems could be solved for the benefit of the people and, more generally, to show what way out there could be for a real change within the prospects of socialism. We aspire for our 11th congress to become a milestone in the struggle for real change.

"Today, ever-widening forces of our people consider our party's involvement necessary if there are to be positive developments. For a whole year now our slogan that 'change cannot be accomplished without the KKE' has gained ground among the people. Through our congress we want to take a leap forward in our party's work, to become more proficient in winning the widest confidence of the people and to be more able to undertake our responsibilities so that the course toward real change may be opened."

Delivers Opening Address

NC141524 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] The work of the 11th KKE Congress began this morning. Hellenic Radio Television reporter Aris Xipolithidhis reports: [Begin recording] At 0900 this morning at the party's headquarters at Perisos [near Athens] the 11th KKE Congress began with the participation of 658 regular and 114 alternate delegates from all over the country and delegations from communist and workers' parties and national liberation movements from 156 countries. The CPSU, the Bulgarian, Polish Vietnamese, U.S., French, Italian, Israeli, Turkish, Cypriot, Chilean and other parties have sent observers to the congress. The work of the congress began with the election of a president and the unanimous approval by the conferees of the agenda for the working program, the composition of the secretariat and the acknowledgement -- amid warm applause -- of the conferees from foreign delegations.

Then Secretary General of the KKE Central Committee Kharilaos Florakis read the speech of the departing Central Committee. Beginning his speech, Florakis said:

[Florakis] Dear comrades: We have reached this highest party organ in the 11th congress after constructive preparatory work that lasted many months in which all party members and thousands of followers participated. As is well known, on 5 September we published the Central Committee positions that refer to the party's and the Central Committee's activities since the 10th congress, to international and domestic political developments, to the struggle our people are waging for true change, to a people's democracy, and to socialism.

These positions were discussed in thousands of party meetings, in conferences, and they were also discussed with thousands of party followers. In addition to this discussion, another discussion took place through our party press. RIZOSPASTIS, and three editions -- one regular and two special -- of the magazine COMMUNIST REVIEW published 270 written judgments and opinions on the issues raised by the Central Committee's positions and on the problems with which our congress will occupy itself.

There are other similar written interpretations which have not yet been published but which have been submitted as material for the congress. This rich discussion is a great contribution by the party's members and followers to the evaluation of its activities and to the working out of its policy. During this discussion, which was without any restrictions on the expression of opinions, the Central Committee's positions were approved in their totality. Many problems were expounded, very many proposals were made and, naturally, different viewpoints were expressed on specific issues. All these things raised the level of the party's collective thought and in many instances led, through a constructive composition, to a more correct viewing of certain problems. Thus, through its struggles our party comes to the 11th congress quantitatively enhanced and ideological and politically more tightly knit. This fact definitely fills us with optimism.

However, assessing them properly, avoiding any feeling of self-satisfaction, we turn our attention to the new duties that await us, to the unsolved and new problems of the country which is living in an uneasy world. [end Florakis recording]

[Begin recording] Continuing, the secretary general of the KKE Central Committee referred to recent international developments and to the great problem of peace in the world, stressing that the KKE will wage a struggle for a Greece without nuclear weapons, without foreign bases and out of NATO, and for a missile-free Balkans. Furthermore, referring to the political situation in our country, Florakis put forth the requirements and the means needed if the country's to proceed to true change. He strongly criticized government policy, stressing that the fundamental goals of the change have been deferred to an indefinite future, and stressed that the KKE will seek to participate in a democratic government only if the content and the means of exercising government policy are aimed at true change.

The speaker also referred to ways for leading the country out of the crisis with an economic development for the benefit of the people and asked for the exercise of a foreign policy of national independence.

Finally, he spoke of the new duties the KKE is shouldering in view of the new political situation that has formed in the country. The work of the congress will end on Saturday with the election of a new party Central Committee, and on Sunday evening a ceremony will be held at [Athens Club] the sporting grounds. [end recording]

RIZOSPASTIS LAUDS DENUCLEARIZATION SPEECH

[From the "Radical" column: "Nuclear Weapons and Bases"]

[Text] Addressing the congress yesterday on denuclearized zones in Europe, Mr Papandreou said: "It is the governments's duty to protect the people from the consequences of a nuclear war." To fulfill this duty, the prime minister promised that the government will seek not only the denuclearization of the Balkans but also that it will "unilaterally" remove the nuclear weapons from our country if it is not possible to conclude an agreement to this effect. However, he added that it is the government that will decide how and when this will be done. Even though the time is not defined, the repetition of this stance, which is included in the government platform, is undoubtedly of positive nature. Shortly before, however, in the same speech, Mr Papandreou admitted that the presence of U.S. bases in Europe is an obstacle to nuclear disarmament since "even without the presence there of nuclear weapons they can serve as a station for the transfer of nuclear bombs." The obvious conclusion, therefore, is that if the government is to fulfill its duty toward the people, it must remove not only the nuclear weapons from Greece but also the bases, within the shortest possible time.

KKE-INTERIOR VIEWS ON INTERNAL DEVELOPMENTS

NC101930 Athens I AVYI in Greek 10 Dec 82 p 1, 8

[Text] The coming year of 1983 will be a difficult one -- a year of tensions -- for the government, and a change is needed in the change [reference to PASOK policy]. This is noted yesterday by Eurodeputy Leonidhas Kirkos, a member of the KKE-Interior Central Committee, during a meeting with Athens political editors in the Eurodeputies' hall of the chamber.

Leonidhas Kirkos, who seized the opportunity to give a more general analysis and a commentary on current developments in the country, stated that the KKE-Interior's leadership will seek a meeting with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou. He added that KKE-Interior will ask that it be allowed to expound its views on the situation over television. In addition, he proposed that an interparty "roundtable" discussion be held on the income policy.

[The government spokesman was asked about this yesterday and said that the government will examine Kirkos' proposal when it is submitted.)

Messages are coming from all sides, the KKE-Interior Eurodeputy continued, that the coming months will be months of social and political tension. Social conservation is rallying and waiting at "the turn of the road." Ankara is increasing its threats. Bartholomew is coming and going on the bases and there are also critical economic and social problems.

"The government cannot alone deal with the situation. It needs the unanimity of the people," Kirkos observed. He then asked: "However, how can unanimity be achieved when popular consent is not asked on the measures that are being taken? When the income policy is decided upon and announced over television without a dialogue with the working people beforehand and without even consulting the Greek General Confederation of Labor?"

In reply to questions by the political editors, the KKE-Interior representative stressed that "we are concerned that a way out can be found so that the change can succeed."

The change, however, cannot rely on paternalistic logic, he said. The prime minister must see the change from the perspective of popular participation. This means buttressing the change with the working people and their struggles, dialogue and the switching on of a television. It requires the broadest possible briefing. An uninformed public is a serious obstacle to the change.

The militant reaction of the working people, who reject rightist demagogy and defend their right for life and through it the promotion of the change, is justified. There can be various scenarios on what possible political developments can be, and it would be possible for the prime minister himself to take the initiative.

The answer -- Kirkos concluded -- lies in the rallying of the broadest social and political forces which are interested in the change on the basis of equality. In any case, our party is continuing on its independent road convinced that its policies and practices are a basic element in the struggle for the consolidation and widening of the change.

In reply to other questions, Kirkos referred both to the controversial issue of the "simple and disingenuous proportional" [systems of election] and to "democracy's permanent demand -- dialogue."

He also referred to the "person" the current leadership of New Democracy has shown through its appearance in Makriyiannis [the site where new Democracy organized an anti-communist celebration of a civil war battle] (as compared with G. Rallis' statement) and to the stance of the doctrinaire communist party, specifically on the way it formulates policy.

DAILY SCORES GOVERNMENT PROPAGANDA OVER LIMNOS

NC101732 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 10 Dec 82 p 2

[From the "Laconic" column: "The 'Victory' of Limnos"]

[Text] NATO Secretary General Luns said that neither NATO nor Turkey question Greek sovereignty over Limnos." The government's propaganda will now most certainly proclaim this as a new "victory" for its "multifaceted policy," which it won with its "proud stance" which consists of "gnashing its teeth" at the West and by embracing dictators, no matter where they may be, with the archjunta leader Jaruselski in the lead.

Over and beyond these ridiculous government positions, however, the Greek people consider the above "achievement" as a very sorry state of affairs. What else can it be when we reach the point of needing the Greek character of Limnos reaffirmed? We have been led to this sorry state of affairs by the completely inane "handling" of the government, which unfortunately handles foreign and even national issues with the creation of sensations -- at home -- as the criterion. Under this criterion, the rejection of the questioning of our sovereignty over an ancient and inseparable portion of our national territory is declared a "victory." This is the sorry state of affairs we have come to.

PAPER VOICES CONCERN OVER FUTURE OF ECONOMY

NC101019 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 9 Dec 82 p 5

[Editorial: "Do Not Put Much Faith in Big Promises"]

[Excerpts] The government is desperately trying to lessen the damages that it has caused to the country's economy not only during the 14 months it has been in power but also during the 7 years when it was in the opposition.

The inconsiderate adoption of every economic demand made by the various classes and the promises which were made before and after the elections have helped to create a tyrannosaur which has been absorbing all the vigor of our economy. Now that the visions are over, the government is trying to get rid of the tyrannosaur which is threatening it, even before it completes 2 years in power.

National Economy Minister Yeoryios Arsenis has bravely and sincerely admitted that we are on the verge of chaos, after 14 months of optimism and mines of wealth.

This paper knows quite well that if we fall into the abyss it would be pointless to try to find out who is responsible. Based on the principle that "opposition for the sake of opposition" has brought about great calamities to this country, this paper refuses to follow such a line. The measures which Mr Arsenis has announced, as well as others that will follow, are painful, and it is definite that it is the majority of the salaried people who will bear the burden. But, indeed, we cannot see any other way that would not let us roll into inflation and unemployment.

The measures announced by the government are an admission of the inefficiency and instability of its economic policy during the 14 months it has been in power. When radio and television slander the productive classes and more or less aim at beheading them by means of circumstantial legislation, the present results are considered inevitable by those with commonsense.

The measures announced by Mr Arsenis are not enough. The government must regain confidence; and the economy is primarily a matter of confidence, secondly a matter of confidence, and thirdly a matter of confidence.

If the employees do not put faith in what Mr Arsenis said, then the measures will soon boomerang. If the government does not clarify its relations with private initiative, then nothing will lead us out of the...tunnel of 1983.

On the other hand, the opposition must cease to state that in the past it has given the employees much more than what PASOK has given them. This is understood better and better every day by the average Greek, who sees that his purchasing power is being reduced. And he will become more convincingly aware of this in March when he receives the increased bills from the public power corporation, the Greek telecommunications organization and so forth. As Mr Arsenis admitted, these state organizations, which operate with a deficit, should see that they meet their operating costs. At the time when PASOK took over, the deficit was 38 billion drachmas, and now it is 75 billion. In order to reduce the deficit (this is another imperative measure in order to have a healthy economy) increases will have to be approved.

Thus, the opposition should submit to the people at the earliest opportunity a concrete economic program which will prove with evidence and not with nice words how the people will be able to regain what they have lost from their standard of living because of PASOK.

With his television speech, National Economy Minister Yeoryios Arsenis made a great contribution to the Greek people. He has helped them remember that they should not put much faith in big promises. During the next elections it is the concrete programs that will count. The era of nice words is over.

DEFENSE MINISTER BAYULKEN RETURNS FROM JORDAN

COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN CRITICIZES EEC ATTITUDE

TA141530 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1515 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 14 (AA) -- Chairman of the expert committee on Turkey's relations with EEC Dr Riza Kandiller said the recent attitude of the Community toward Turkey tended to alienate rather than bring about rapprochement.

Announcing that, after 3 months of deliberations, his committee had drafted a report on EEC for the drafting of the 5th 5-year development plan, Dr Kandiller said current difficulties in relations with EEC had made it difficult to look ahead or to comment on future prospects. He called on the Community to adhere to its own principles, and to the Ankara accord and the protocols it has signed with Turkey.

VOTCP: TURKMEN, SHULTZ TALK AT NATO MEETING

TA101410 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen who is attending the winter session of the NATO Ministerial Council meetings, met with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz in Brussels yesterday. It was stated following the meeting that in addition to Turkish-U.S. relations, which were discussed in detail, problems in relations between Turkey and Greece and intra-NATO solidarity were also reviewed. Turkish officials said Turkmen reiterated to Shultz Turkey's readiness to negotiate with Greece for the solution of standing problems. It was also claimed that Shultz would meet with EEC Commission Presidnet Gaston Thorn in a bid to mediate in efforts to dispel the cool relationship between the Council and Turkey. It was also announced in this connection that in its meetings to be held in Brussels on Monday, the EEC foreign ministers would review the issue of relations with Turkey.

It is reported that during his address to the NATO Ministerial Council, Turkmen briefed the NATO foreign ministers on his recent visit to the Soviet Union.

VOTCP on NATO Relationship

TA110803 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Station commentary: "NATO's Aggressive Doctrine and Turkey"]

[Excerpts] The attainment of a consensus in economic, political and military fields was the main topic of discussion at the winter session of the NATO Ministerial Council meetings held in Brussels which ended yesterday. Why did this aggressive organization need a general agreement? Because various differences exist among the NATO members and get worse as time goes by. These disagreements are based on both objective and subjective factors. The upsetting of the economic balance of forces among NATO countries, the egotistical interests of the ruling circles of each and every member of the treaty, the position of political forces, the influence of their communities as well as other factors are instrumental in this process.

In particular, dangers created as a result of U.S. adventurist policies are further heating up conflicts between the United States and its Western allies. More and more, certain NATO member countries are resenting the big boss stance adopted by the United States, which results in pressures within the organization.

Despite this conflicting situation, the United States succeeds in imposing its military concepts on its NATO allies.

An additional economic ban was imposed on NATO members during the meetings held in Brussels, according to which treaty members are not allowed to sign new agreements with socialist countries in the field of supply of natural gas until the new NATO energy plans are adopted.

This ban is also directed against Turkey. As will be recalled, it was announced during the visit made by Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen to Moscow that the Soviet Union was ready to supply natural gas to Turkey and to help in the construction of a pipeline that would reach our country via Bulgaria. Thus, such a project which would greatly contribute to the development of our national industry has been directly banned by NATO even before it could be initiated. This is gross interference in the internal affairs of Turkey.

This has been the case from the very day Turkey was dragged into NATO. Turkey's budget is determined in the NATO headquarters, which interferes with its planning. NATO tells our country which factories should be set up and where.

It is also NATO headquarters that decides on the proportions relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union may attain. The number of persons who are waking up to these realities and side with our national interests is continuously increasing. These persons are against Turkey's presence in NATO.

Those who have espoused different political views in our country, from the religious to the communists, are united in common causes such as objecting to Turkey's membership in NATO and supporting goodneighborly relations of cooperation with the Soviet Union. Those circles openly voice their views that unless Turkey is disengaged from NATO, there will be no end to this blind policy.

VOTCP REVIEWS ULUSU BUDGET SPEECH IN COUNCIL

TA101359 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] The fiscal 1983 budget draft law has been ratified by the National Security Council. General Evren, the junta head, presided over the meeting of the council which convened yesterday in order to discuss the 1983 budget bill, which has already been adopted by the Consultative Assembly. Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu submitted the draft budget to the council with an introduction statement.

In his expose, Ulusu blamed the world recession -- which in fact reigns solely in the capitalist world -- for the economic difficulties facing the country, and tried to defend the 24 January 1980 program, which he defined as one of economic stability. Ulusu explained that the increase in oil prices since 1973, the ensuing world recession and inflationary developments had affected the Turkish economy very negatively. However, he had nothing to say about the harmful effects of economic dependence on imperialism.

The statement claims that Turkey has achieved a development rate of 6 to 7 percent, the highest among the OECD countries. But in his address to the officials of the Turkish Confederation of Labor [Turk-Is], Ulusu said that Turkey achieved a development rate of 5 percent.

Regarding the rate of inflation, Ulusu pointed out that this figure was down to 20 percent from last year's 25 percent, maintaining that most of the inflationary problems caused by the instability in the balance of supply and demand had been solved. But he did not mention the price at which this result was achieved and its effects on the people. It will be recalled that since the economic program of 24 January was implemented, the real income of the people has decreased. Taking into account the loss of value of the Turkish lira against the dollar, the inflation rate in our country is actually more than 40 percent. The latest price increases in oil products imposed by the government and the rise in gold prices are likely to further increase this current inflation rate.

In his statement, Ulusu said that a price increase of 20 percent was expected during 1983. Economic experts have already announced several times that with an inflation rate over 40 percent, the price increase in 1983 would be much higher.

Ulusu's explanations on the 1983 budget have proved that all calculations have been based on more burdens for the toiling people and more profits for big capitalists: all this within the destructive 24 January economy program.

Moreover, reporting the ratification of the new budget, the Istanbul daily DUNYA recalls that the state owes 21.6 billion Turkish lira to farmers for crops purchased, adding that the Soil Products Office [TMO] has stopped the promised payment of price differences. Thus, while Ulusu recalls that his government paid all severance amounts due the workers, he does not mention the amounts due the small farmers.

OEVP'S GRAFF RAPS KREISKY ON U.S. RELATIONS

[Special DIE PRESSE report: "U.S. Warnings: Graff Criticizes Kreisky"]

[Excerpt] Vienna -- It is "exclusively the fault of Chancellor Kreisky's neutralist foreign policy" that the United States today "distrusts neutral Austria more than was earlier the case among good friends." Austrian People's Party Secretary General Michael Graff stated this on Tuesday in a release issued by his party's press service. It is completely legitimate if the United States sees to it that technologies that it exports are not passed on to the East, Graff declared.

MUBARAK, KREISKY MEET FOR MIDEAST TALKS

AU151827 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Report on talks between Egyptian President Husni Mubarak and Chancellor Kreisky at Vienna's Schwechat Airport today, with Harry Sichrowsky interviews with Mubarak and Kreisky -- recorded]

[Excerpt] On his European tour, Egyptian State President Husni Mubarak arrived in Vienna from Bonn today. He only made a 2-hour stopover in Vienna-Schwechat, and didn't leave the terminal. There was a more than one-hour converstation between the Egyptian head of state and Chancellor Kreisky in the VIP lounge while Foreign Minister Pahr, Trade Minister Staribacher and Minister of Agriculture Haiden conducted talks with the relevant Egyptian ministers in an adjacent room. Before President Mubarak continued his trip to Bucharest, he appeared before waiting journalists for a short talk. Harry Sichrowsky reports from the brief press conference of the Egyptian state president:

Asked to comment on the proposal for the formation of a Palestinian government in exile, the Egyptian president stated that his government would immediately support such a government. It is well-known, however, that the PLO rejects this. But Mubarak unamibiguously endorsed recognition of Israel by the PLO, even if such a recognition were to remain unilateral.

[Begin Mubarak recording] It will also be a good thing for the Palestinians for their part to declare their unambiguous recognition and thus eliminate something that has constantly been repeated, that is, that the Palestinians seek the destruction of Israel. But if the Palestinians recognize Israel -- the right of Israel [das recht Israels] -- the discussion among all parties concerned will begin. I also want to add the following to this: There is always a debate as to what guarantees or securities there are if the Palestinians recognize Israel, or the right of Israel, and subsequently nothing happens with the Palestinians or with the Palestinian issue. And my answer is as simple and clear as this: This will not be a problem at all, because the Palestinians can also annul this recognition. [end Mubarak recording]

The Egytpian journalists naturally availed themselves of the opportunity to interview Chancellor Kreisky about his position vis-a-vis the two alternative plans for solving the Palestinian problem. The chancellor stated in this context:

[Begin Kreisky recording] First, I would like to repeat what I said several weeks ago, that is, that I welcome President Reagan's initiative very much indeed because to the best of my knowledge, this is the first time that a U.S. president has also recognized and expressed the problem of the Palestinians with such clarity. It seems to me that the correct answer to this [plan] was given in Fes, where the Arab governments gathered there also drafted a plan.

I am not in a position to judge to what extent this plan is realistic, but after all, we have achieved one thing; that is, that there are now two different bases for negotiations. [end Kreisky recording]

In a final remark on the Iranian-Iraqi war, Mubarak termed it a very complicated problem and vigorously opposed any aggression to achieve territorial changes by force. Egypt supports Iraq in defending its territory, Mubarak said.

Mubarak, Kreisky Press Conference

NC151656 Cairo MENA in Arabic 1612 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Vienna, 15 Dec (MENA) -- President Muhammad Husni Mubarak and Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky held a joint press conference this afternoon following the 45-minute bilateral discussions in the Vienna airport VIP lounge.

At the outset of the conference, President Mubarak said: I have come to exchange views with Chancellor Kreisky on the Middle East question. We discussed this and other questions at length. Chancellor Kreisky has much experience in Middle East issues.

Answering a question regarding Egypt's final stand on President Reagan's initiative, President Mubarak said: I have discussed this issue more than once and I was clear in what I said. In principle, we approve President Reagan's initiative, which contains positive points. We have reservations on other points and have communicated these reservations to the U.S. side.

In addition, President Mubarak said: We consider that we should accept this initiative and then develop it at the negotiating table. It is a mistake to believe that the United States will submit an initiative whose points will all be positive for the Arabs.

Questioned about what has been published during President Mitterrands' visit to Cairo to the effect that Egypt has proposed that the Palestinians set up a government-in-exile in Tunis, President Mubarak said: In none of my statements did I say that the Palestinians must set up a government-in-exile, but I was asked if Egypt would accept the Palestinians were they to set up a government-in-exile. The Lebanese events took place and matters and conditions changed. I said then: If the Palestinians set up a government-in-exile, then let it be in Tunis, where the Arab League is headquartered and of which they are a member. I would like to add that despite our statement that the government-in-exile could be based in Tunis, this does not mean that we will abandon the Palestinian question. Egypt has been doing its utmost for the [Palestinian] question for 30 years. It has sacrificed much -- more than 1 billion pounds and 100,000 dead and wounded. It was Egypt which sought to change the status of the Palestinian question in [UN] Resolution 242 from a question of refugees to a question of people -- a political question. Egypt is still seeking a comprehensive settlement of this issue.

Asked about reports that some PLO members are ready to recognize Israel, President Mubarak said: I encourage this trend. This is because we are asking the United States to begin a dialogue with the Palestinians and the U.S. reply has always been that they cannot do so as long as the Palestinians do not recognize Israel's right to exist.

We have previously called for mutual recognition. We believe that Israel will not announce this recognition at least for the time being.

So I said that it does not harm the Palestinians if they unilaterally announce their recognition in order to not give anyone a chance to say that the Palestinians want to destroy Israel. The recognition would be a strong cause for starting the dialogue with the Palestinians and would consequently facilitate the negotiating process.

Some people ask what guarantees Palestinians will have if they recognize Israel, but the issue does not develop and the dialogue does not begin. The answer is simple: The Palestinians will not lose anything and they can withdraw their recognition at any time.

Asked about the positive and negative aspects of the Reagan initiative and Egypt's stand on the Arab Fes summit resolutions, President Mubarak said: Concerning the first part of the question, the issue is long and the positive aspects are the points approved by all the Arabs. As for Egypt's remarks, they are numerous the most important of which is that the initiative does not recognize the existence of a Palestinian state.

He added: As for the Fes resolutions, they are excellent and contain all the Arabs' aspirations. We support these resolutions, but I have one question: Which is the power able to implement the Fes resolutions? We approve the resolutions 100 percent but which is the power able to implement them? I personally don't know.

Chancellor Kreisky, asked about the current Middle East peace initiatives, especially the Reagan initiative, said: I must say that I like the Reagan initiative and I support it. For the first time a U.S. president has declared that he feels and realizes the Palestinians problem. True, there are points which I don't believe the Arabs approve of, but the bais has been laid in this initiative. The Arabs have agreed on a joint plan in Fes. There are now two initiatives, and we ask which of them is better? In my opinion, the two initiatives can be reconciled.

Asked about his opinion of Israel's conditions for withdrawing from Lebanon and whether these conditions help a settlement of the problem, Kreisky said: I don't believe so; I belive that Israel wants to remain in Lebanon as long as possible.

President Mubarak, asked about the Iraqi-Iranian war and whether he discussed this problem with the U.S. secretary of state in Federal Germany or with Chancellor Kreisky, said: Undoubtedly, this war was a subject of discussion in all the countries I visited. This war is very complicated. We don't approve or support the occupation of any land by force. We also believe that this war is exhausting the resources of the two countries and is not in the interest of the two peoples but instead, will cause immense losses for them. This war is complicated. Several states are helping Iran, such as Syria, Libya and Israel, although Syria and Libya are Arab states and are signatories to the [Arab] joint defense pact. This does not mean that I am urging Syria and Libya to fight on Iraq's side, but what I am saying is that they should not take the same line as Israel. They should have mediated to stop the conflict.

President Mubarak added: We are helping Iraq and are providing it with ammunition, particularly since it has withdrawn to its international borders. However, I stress that we have no forces fighting with the Iraqi forces.

INA on Mubarak Iraqi Support

JN151617 Baghdad INA in Arabic 1545 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Vienna, 15 Dec (INA) -- Egyptian President Husni Mubarak has stated that his country is supporting Iraq and assisting it in repulsing the Iranian aggression now that Iraq has withdrawn its forces from Iranian territories to the international borders.

In reply to a question by the INA correspondent in Vienna today on the Iraqi-Iranian war, President Mubarak said that developments in the war had been part of the discussions we had had with officials in the countries he had visited.

During a short stopover he made in Vienna at noon today, President Mubarak said that it is difficult to assess this war, because Iran is supported by many countries, particularly Israel, Libya and Syria, despite the fact that Libya and Syria are Arab countries which are signatories to the collective Arab defense pact.

President Mubarak added: I do not say this to instigate Libya or Syria to fight against Iran, but I had at least expected that because of their Arab affiliation, they would not stand in the same trench with Israel which is supporting Iran against Iraq.

President Mubarak said that Egypt supports Iraq and explained that Egyptian forces are not participating in this war.

'Ali Discusses Talks

NC151916 Cairo Domestic Service in Arabic 1830 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Following the meeting between President Husni Mubarak and Chancellor Bruno Kreisky at Vienna airport, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Kamal Hasan 'Ali said the discussions dealt with the importance of action for providing momentum to the peace efforts and for establishing stability in Lebanon and the Middle East and also with the European role in this regard.

'Ali added that the discussions also dealt with ways of bolstering cooperation between the two countries in the economic agricultural domains and with increasing trade.

'Ali praised the close relations between Austria and Egypt, stating that they will realize aims serving the interests of both countries. He stressed that there was full agreement in both sides' views on all questions discussed.

CARDINAL KOENIG PLANS WORLD PEACE CONFERENCE

AU151111 Vienna NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 15 Dec 82 p 3

[Dieter Kindermann report: "Cardinal Franz Koenig Convenes a Peace Conference Before the Pope's Visit: Leaders of World Religions in Vienna"]

[Summary] Vienna/Rome -- "Even before next year's papal visit, Vienna will become the venue of a historic church event of world political dimensions: Cardinal Koenig will call the spiritual leaders of all world religions to a peace conference in the Danube metropolis. From here, hundreds of millions of believers are to be mobilized for the cause of peace and against nuclear armament: Christians, Muslims, Buddhists, Hindus etc.

"The foundation for this church peace offensive was laid some 6 months ago at a conference in the Vatican. On that occasion the presidents of 35 academies of science from East and West signed a document urgently warning against the dangers of a nuclear war. Only a few days ago the pope referred in a letter to cardinal Koenig as a 'peacemaker.' The reason: It was from the cardinal that decisive stimuli emanated for the materialization of the conference. Thus, Cardinal Koenig has now been assigned the task of the next church peace initiative, designed to firmly impress the burning appeal of the scientists on the minds of as many people as possible."

In a talk yesterday with NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG, Cardinal Koenig declared: "Scientists can establish facts, warn against effects and catastrophes, but they cannot do any more by themselves. This is what induced me to invite the most important leaders of the world religions to Vienna for a peace conference. The Vatican document of the academy presidents must be underpinned with ethical-religious aspects so as to mobilize the whole world -- any part of it is not enough -- in a positive sense."

Asked whether the churches do not fear being drawn into the wake of radical peace demonstrators, the Vienna archbishop declared: "no, it is clear that the peace movements are manipulated in all kinds of ways. We, however, are supporting disarmament for religious reasons. Our concern is human rights, the hope for the future of mankind." He added that it was necessary to take the disarmament discussion from the hands of the strategists and military leaders and to transfer it to the state leaders and to the states' citizens. "there must be disarmament conferences, disarmament talks where it is clearly brought out that there can be no victor in a nuclear war," he said.

The cardinal added that the planned peace conference of world religious leaders will be unprecedented, that the pope has been informed about his initiative, that the invitations to the most important religious leaders have already been sent out, and that some of them have already accepted. "For security reasons, the conference site and date are being kept secret."

ALBANIA HAS LARGE DEPOSITS IN AUSTRIAN BANKS

AU151538 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 15 Dec 82 p 7

[Erich Hoorn report: "Austria Is Albania's Switzerland"]

[Excerpts] Albania is the only communist country which does not have any debts in the West because according to its Constitution, it is strictly prohibited from securing credits abroad. The Albanians even have deposit accounts in the West which, according to the statistics of the bank for international settlements published in mid-1982, were $100 million at that time.

The majority of these funds are deposited in Austrian banks. Thus, the Danube-Alpine republic fulfills the same function for the Albanians as Switzerland does for other countries: By the end of 1981, 0.8 billion schillings were deposited here. This shows that Tirana places great trust in Austria. Albania also maintains a large embassy in Vienna, one of the most important ones in the entire West.

The latest issue of the periodical NEW ALBANIA contains some figures on Albanian raw materials. According to this publication, in 1980 Albania produced 1 million tons of chrome ore, 600,000 tons of ferronickel ore and 740,000 tons of copper ore. Tirana has considerably stepped up the development of hydroelectric power production, so that it is already exporting power to Yugoslavia.

Now Albania also wants to supply power to Austria, but a prerequisite for such deliveries would be a settlement of the transit problem. Albania also wants to increase its chrome and nickel ore deliveries.

Austrian exports to Albania this year were 73 million schillings, the same as last year, while imports more than doubled to 165 million schillings. Austrian imports from Albania mostly consist of vegetables and fruit, while exports to Albania are dominated by milk and milk products, chemical products, paper and steel.

POLAND SEEKS TO RECAPTURE LOST COAL MARKET

AU141310 Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 14 Dec 82 p 1

[Special DIE PRESSE report by "Ho.": "Poland Is Struggling for Austria's Coal Market"]

[Text] Vienna -- As early as next year Poland wants to increase its exports to Austria to 1 million tons of coal and 200,000-250,000 tons of coke, thus again reaching the long-term average volume. This was stated by Jozef M. Stankiewicz, Polish trade delegate in Vienna, in a talk with DIE PRESSE. This year, Polish deliveries will be 700,000 tons of coal and 200,000 tons of coke.

Poland is hoping to regain the Austrian market because it can offer high-quality coal at competitive prices -- special attention is drawn to the low sulphur content of this coal -- and because cheap transportation routes are available. Austrian exports to Poland this year will be about 30 percent below last year's figures. With imports from Poland stagnating, this will bring Warsaw a favorable balance of trade with Austria this year for the first time in many years.

Exports to Poland at present are made only on a cash basis or as barter transactions. Stankiewicz described as an important aim the rescheduling of Western government loans to Poland, a deadlocked issue at present.

USSR CHEMICAL WEAPON SILOS IN GDR; SS-20 TESTS

LD152024 Hamburg DPA in German 1448 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA) -- The Soviet Union has established "hardened" silos for nuclear and chemical weapons in the GDR. Bonn Defense Ministry spokesman Juergen Reichardt today confirmed to DPA a report to this effect published in STERN. The details were known to the FRG Defense Ministry and to the competent NATO authorities. The spokesman would not comment on other details.

Reichardt further confirmed press reports that last weekend the Soviet Union tested four new types of SS-NX-20 long-range missiles which were launched from submarines in the White Sea. Two of the missiles with a range of more than 9,000 kilometers landed on the Kamchatka Peninsula, two landed in the target areas of the Pacific. The Soviet Union was thus continuing its series of tests of 33 known test flights since January 1980 -- 25 of which have been successful. The frequency of successful test flights, including dual launches, suggests that the new long-range missiles will soon be ready for deployment, probably in 1983. According to newspaper reports, the strategic missiles can carry 12 warheads.

Soviet Missile Proposals 'Inadequate'

LD152040 Hamburg DPA in German 1521 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA) -- The Soviet negotiating offer made in Geneva to reduce its stock of medium-range missiles in return for the West's total renunciation of counterarming "might point in the right direction," Minister of State at the Foreign Ministry Alois Mertes (CDU) said in a DPA interview today. This move in the right direction only applies, however, to Moscow's unstated admission that the SS-20 missiles represent a special threat.

Mertes expressly pointed out that the basis of imbalance will remain because the Soviet offer is aimed at still keeping available more than enough SS-20 missiles for which the West has no counterbalance.

Minister of State Mertes stressed that the United States is not only negotiating exceptionally earnestly in Geneva, but is also prepared to examine every serious Soviet proposal. In any event, solutions must take into account the West's legitimate security interests, particularly those of the nonnuclear Federal Republic. All previous Soviet proposals must therefore be regarded by the Federal Republic as inadequate.

In Mertes' view, the negotiating plan which has now become known demonstrates the Soviet goal of fixing unilateral superiority. The intention of seriously examining all Soviet proposals does not mean giving up the zero option. This goal of totally eliminating an genre of weapons on both sides was underlined again only a few days ago by the Western alliance in Brussels.

POLAND TO BE DISCUSSED WITH WESTERN ALLIES

LD152014 Hamburg DPA in German 1513 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government wants to hold a joint study with the Western allies to determine the real significance of recent measures in Poland, such as the lifting of martial law. Government Spokesman Diether Stolze, who announced this study in Bonn today, stated that the Federal Government expressly welcomes the intention to release all internees. It also holds the hope "that the Polish Government will establish a dialogue with all the appointed representatives of church and social organizations and that this will lead to a national consensus."

This means, however, an amnesty for all those sentenced under martial law, the reinstatement of all those dismissed for their trade union activity and the right of workers to found a trade union of their choice, Stolze said. At the moment, the Federal Government sees no reason to resume economic aid. After the Polish Parliament has adopted all the planned relaxations, this would be the subject of joint consultations with the Western partners.

MINISTER URGES GDR TO OBSERVE BASIC TREATY

LD151532 Hamburg DPA in German 1155 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Minister for Inner-German Relations Rainer Barzel has called on the GDR to improve, in particular, the opportunities for GDR citizens to visit the Federal Republic by way of observing and fulfilling the basic treaty concluded between the two German states 10 years ago. In a program on DEUTSCHE WELLE to mark the anniversary of the system of treaties today, Barzel confirmed that the Federal Government is observing the treaty and that the GDR should do the same. The treaty has brought improvements in telephone communications and tourist traffic but, contrary to its promises of good neighborliness, the GDR is restricting visits "by increasing the compulsory exchange levy and by repugnant harassment."

Barzel, under whose chairmanship the then CDU/CSU opposition voted against the treaty, described these problems as evidence of the omissions in drawing up the treaty, which he criticized as being "on the whole unbalanced." On the other hand, in the view of SPD Deputy Egon Bahr, who signed the treaty on 21 January 1972 on behalf of the Federal Government, the relationship created with the GDR on the basis of the basic treaty has proved itself, particularly at times of strained East-West relations.

Berlin's Governing Mayor Richard von Weizsaecker (CDU) spoke during the program of successes, especially in the field of traffic, even if it only favors traffic in the direction of the GDR. There are also setbacks to be recorded, however, particularly the increase and extension of the GDR ruling on the minimum compulsory exchange amount of October 1980. The mayor also expressed the hope for progress in the sphere of more freedom of movement.

COMMENTATOR ON GDR RELATIONS, MONETARY DEMANDS

DW141209 Munich SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG in German 14 Dec 82 p 4

[Commentary signed DR]

[Text] It would certainly be premature to interpret the high financial demands of the GDR as being an intention by the SED leadership to put a spoke in the wheels of the new Federal Government. The tones which can be heard from Moscow as well as East Berlin since the government change allow one to much rather assume the contrary. The Soviet Union, for example, wouldn't be sending its Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko in early January for a 3-day visit to Bonn if it wanted to embarrass Chancellor Kohl. It is showing him an even greater honor than his predecessor Schmidt, because Gromyko was known for preferring to just make stopovers at the Rhine.

Two things are demonstrated by the current policy of the East with regard to Bonn: It strives for a continuation of the current course with the new government, despite its composition, and this is based on the assumption that Kohl will remain at the helm after 6 March. This is not a bad starting point for the Federal Government.

It all isn't much impaired by the fact that the GDR is demanding a considerable increase in the lump sum for postal services (fivefold), as well as a considerable amount, DM900 million, for the desalination of the Werra and Weser rivers. These sums had also been envisaged by the earlier government.

The East Berlin leadership obviously wants to subject its new discussion partner to some sort of a toughness test. It shouldn't be difficult for the Bonn negotiations to remain firm on the matter. Both demands are unfounded with regard to their proportions. In addition, neither has the volume of telephone communications in the GDR increased so rapidly, nor can it be increased accordingly. The salinization of the Werra and Weser occurs almost exclusively in the GDR. Since the Federal Government has to preserve its own interests in both fields, it cannot contest the fact that a price has to be paid for it; however, it must be proportionate to the respective subject.

U.S. SOLDIER WOUNDED IN DARMSTADT BOMBING

LD151530 Hamburg DPA in German 1511 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Darmstadt, 15 Dec (DPA) -- A bomb attack was carried out this afternoon on a 27-year-old U.S. soldier in Darmstadt. According to a police spokesman, the man was admitted to a U.S. military hospital with burns on his legs. The explosive device detonated as the soldier got into the driver's seat of his car at a military installation. The car was completely destroyed by fire.

According to police, there is no trace of those who carried out the attack. For safety reasons, 150 Americans living in military housing in the vicinity of the attack were evacuated. Following the attack, U.S. military police are guarding the cars of members of the U.S. forces in Darmstadt. Experts of the Wiesbaden criminal police have also become involved in the investigations.

MINISTER CHEVENEMENT CITED ON USSR VISIT

PM141625 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 6 Dec 82 p 7

[Gerard Streiff dispatch: "Quick Progress Is Possible"]

[Text] Moscow, 5 December -- The visit by Jean-Pierre Chevenement, French minister of scientific research and technology and minister of industry, ended on Sunday. During his stay he had meetings with Council of Ministers Chairman Tikhonov and with five ministers [as published]: Foreign Trade (Patolichev), Machine-Building (Antonov), research (Marchuk), State Planning (Baybakov), and Heavy Industry (Dolgikh, who is also a member of the CPSU Politburo).

How can the political scope of this visit be described?

"It is taking place at an important and significant time," Jean-Pierre Chevenement said, "when we are seeing some new elements here and there. France and the Soviet Union are different societies. Each has its history and principles. But they are not on different planets. They are on the same continent. We have differences on some questions which it is not necessary to recall. And there are common interests (trade, scientific, industrial and cultural cooperation). Significant progress can be recorded in a short period. This is desirable and possible."

Had he come with a "message?" The minister replied to the journalists: "I had the opportunity to discuss my visit here with the president of the republic. I will inform him of my impressions when I return. I have found this visit to be an enriching experience. There is an opportunity to be seized. France and the Soviet Union have a long tradition of relations -- close relations more often than hostile ones."

What about prospects in the cooperation sphere? There will be no difficulty in renewing the scientific cooperation agreement which has existed between the two countries for 18 years.

The Soviets have shown particular interest in the industrial sectors, which might enable them to improve the standard of living while stressing teh qualitative aspect of this cooperation.

In the commercial sphere there again was talk of contracts for equipping a gas desulfurization factory near Astrakhan.

The minister noted that there is a large flow of business in the food products sphere.

In the scientific cooperation sphere there is a move toward a Franco-Soviet colloqium in 1983 on the rational use of energy.

As regards cooperation in space, J.P. Chevenement said during his visit to the space flight control center that it had good prospects.

NAVY CHIEF CRITICIZES CUTS IN SECRET LETTER

PM151123 Paris LE MATIN in French 7 Dec 82 p 4

[Extracts from "confidential" letter sent by French Navy Chief of Staff Admiral Leenhardt to Armed Forces Chief of Staff General Lacaze on 7 October: "Choosing between the Atlantic and the nuclear-propelled aircraft carriers"]

[Text] Paris, 7 October 1982.

Admiral Leenhardt, Navy chief of staff, to Army General Lacaze, armed forces chief of staff.

Subject: Preparation of the 1984-1988 military plan.

...The essential conclusion of this study is twofold: The financial burden of the programs already launched is such that, for lack of adequate resources, I am obliged not only to limit the series of ships to the last vessel under construction at the end of 1983, but also to postpone beyond the programming period a large number of the new operations, including at least one major program. Now, the choice of programs to be postponed until after 1988 -- a postponement which gives rise to fears that it might eventually be necessary to abandon it or acquire foreign equipment -- has such consequences for the level and coherence of our aeronaval forces that it seems to me that the decision is no longer within my ability.

That is why I have, in this spirit, had two programming hypotheses drawn up, corresponding to the postponement, if not the abandonment, of either the launching of the first nuclear aircraft carrier or the industrial exploitation of the new naval patrol plane. Whatever choice is made, it will apply to the 1984-1988 period and, owing to the delays in all the programs, the realization of the "limited" navy model intended by the last ministerial directive would presuppose such a large increase in the size of the naval section's resources after 1988 that it would seem unrealistic.

I must therefore take care not to launch large-scale operations which it would then be necessary to subsequently cancel or which would have to be inordinately drawn out at the cost of overstepping the estimates -- a decision which would, in both cases, waste the state's money. Thus, it seemed indispensible to me, although the minister did not explicitly ask me to do so, to enlighten you on the deterioration of some components of our aeronaval forces in the nineties, since it is after 1988 and especially after 1995 that the consequences of most of the choices which will have been made in the 1984-1988 programming will clearly appear....

The alternative at which I have arrived for the 1984-1988 period was drawn up with the sole concern of meeting the prescribed financial requirements. Nontheless, I feel it vital to draw attention to the inevitable consequences which either solution will have for the more distant future. Indeed, the modernization of a navy must be examined in a context of around 15 years. In these circumstances, the 1984-1988 programming cannot be dissociated from longer-term planning.

1 -- Air defense at sea which, until 1995 and beyond, will only be provided by an average of five to six vessels, instead of the nine scheduled in the initial navy model.

2 -- Antisubmarine combat, for which the number of ships will at best fall from 14 to 11, instead of the 18 included in the navy model. The directive proposing the reduction of defense capabilities on a maritime front reduces the number of ships necessary to 16, but even in those conditions, the loss of capability is still great (around 31 percent).

-- Mine countermeasures, for which the average reduction during the 1988-1995 period will be around 40 percent despite the savings made by reducing the number of ports swept to three (excluding the strategic ocean forces).

-- The attack submarine forces, which scarcely meet their objective despite the cutback of this objective to eight nuclear attack submarines, according to the limitations of the new model's capability. In this connection, I note that this limited number of nuclear attack submarines, after the disarmament of the conventional submarines, will probably pose serious staff training problems when the new generation of nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarines begin coming into service.

The amphibious forces and support from logistic vessels will also pass through a period when the loss of capability will be around 33 percent.

As I indicated in my introduction, because of the packages fixed by the ministerial directive and especially because of the foreseeable financial needs for the 1984-1988 period, I have been forced to submit to you a choice between two hypotheses, postponement, if not abandonment of either the second generation Atlantic or the nuclear-propelled aircraft carriers. Neither hypothesis is satisfactory and the consequences which they have for the Navy's future are such that the choice cannot be made at my level. I draw your attention to the fact that all the current programs left over from the previous period will, during the programming period, make it possible to maintain a capability for the Navy which will certainly be reduced but still consistent with its present missions. On the other hand, the light which I felt it vital to shed on the nineties shows that the decisions which will be taken in the programming law are irreversible decisions which are likely to radically change the nature of our Navy and, consequently, of one of the main tools of our foreign policy.

In conclusion, it seems clear that a fundamental revision of the Navy's missions ought to be envisaged given the budgetary hypotheses fixed for me.

DEMONSTRATORS OCCUPY SWEDISH EMBASSY IN PARIS

LD151150 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1130 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] The Swedish Embassy in Paris has been occupied by members of the international environmentalists' organization, Greenpeace. Some of the occupants have chained themselves to the embassy gates. They are demanding that they be allowed to meet in Stockholm with Energy Minster Birgitta Dahl in order to protest the transport of spent nuclear fuel from Sweden to France. Dahl has once before rejected the demand of the activists to be allowed to meet her.

LEGAL AUTHORITIES CLOSE TANASE KIDNAP CASE

NC151622 Paris AFP in English 1547 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 15 (AFP) -- French legal authorities today closed the case on the fake kidnapping of Romanian writer-in-exile Virgil Tanase, reportedly hidden for 10 days last summer by the French Secret Service.

The decision to close the case is seen here as confirming the official thesis that counter-intelligence agants "kidnapped" Mr Tanase on Aug 20 to protect him against Romanian agents detailed to kill him.

The operation, sanctioned by President Francois Mitterrand, was carried out in such secrecy that justice officials opened a case of kidnapping by persons unknown.

The affairs followed revelations by Matei Haiducu, a renegade from the Romanian secret service, who said he had been ordered to kill Mr Tanase.

When Mr Tanase reappeared in public, it was at a press conference in company with Mr Haiducu. The official version of the affairs appeared in the columns of the press, including a monthly magazine to which Mr Tanase contributes, shortly before he was to publish a new book.

Mr Haiducu, unemployed since October 1981, specialised in industrial espionage, thereby earning the nickname "the James Bond of the plumbing industry."

At the time, some alleged that the threats against Mr Tanase were fake ones -- part of a publicity stunt in which Mr Mitterrand and the French Secret Service were unwitting accomplices.

EXPLOSIVES SEIZED FROM ACTION DIRECTE SUSPECTS

NC141240 Paris AFP in English 1224 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Toulouse, France, Dec 14 (AFP) -- Police have seized 80 kilos (176 pounds) of explosives and 900 detonators here and arrested two revolutionary militants suspected of being close to the banned extreme leftist "Action Directe" movement, it was announced today.

The explosives were stolen from a construction site near here last May.

LE MONDE ON FRANCO-ALGERIAN 'FRICTION'

PM151147 Paris LE MONDE in French 15 Dec 82 p 1

[Editorial: "Friction between Paris and Algiers"]

[Text] Although King Baudouint [of Belgium] has never made an official visit to Algiers, whereas two French presidents have gone there -- Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing in April 1975 and Mr Francois Mitterrand in November 1981 -- [Algerian President] Chadli Benjedid has chosen Belgium, where he arrived this Tuesday, 14 December, for the first official visit to Europe by an Algerian head of state since independence in 1962. The successor to Ben Bella and Boumediene will, however, make a brief working visit to Paris Friday as the Elysee's guest.

The Algerian authorities point out that after visiting the Arab world, Africa, the socialist countries and the nonaligned countries, which is in keeping with their country's main ideological guidelines, President Bendjedid is naturally approaching Europe by starting with "its capital," where he will meet with EEC Commission Chairman Gaston Thorn. The Ten are probably Algeria's main suppliers and main clients -- France, Italy and the FRG alone supply more than 50 percent of Algerian imports -- but although the argument is clever, it does not deceive anybody, and Mr Bendjedid's presence in Brussels is primarily taking place within a bilateral framework.

In drawing up his program in this way, the Algerian president took account of several factors, some temporary and the others fundamental. The left's arrival in power on 10 May 1981 had given reason to hope that relations between Paris and Algiers would attain a quality rarely equaled in the past, the two capitals asserting their intention to establish a new international order and to give an exemplary character to their cooperation. That disregarded both the influence of the situation and the frequently emotional aspect which has underlain bilateral relations for more than 20 years.

Taking account of the generally positive aspect of these relations, for a long time the Algerians avoided stressing the anxiety they felt about some aspects of French policy on the Near East and some stances adopted by the PS. But other fears have since emerged, particularly as regards the Algerians being refused entry into France, the joint Franco-Moroccan military maneuvers, Paris' real position in the Saharan conflict and, in a general way, the development of French Third World Policy in a "more realistic" direction."

But that is not all. The Algerian authorities are vague when questioned about the possible date of an official visit and stress that "the popular welcome should be comparable to that given to Mr Mitterrand and his predecessor in Algiers." In the past, the invitations made by General de Gaulle, Georges Pompidou and Mr Giscard d'Estaing had not been taken up because memories of the war were still visible, or because there were protocol problems -- ought not the visitor to go to the Arc de Triomphe like all official guests? -- or because serious crises -- like the oil crisis or the Saharan conflict -- arose.

However, passions are subsiding with time. Is President Bendjedid's stopover in Paris merely a compromise or a step on the path of reconciliation which should be sealed by an official visit?

RELEASE OF SOUTH AFRICAN DISSIDENT VIEWED

FM141311 Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Dec 82 p 1

[Editorial: "Paris and Pretoria"]

[Text] Some 48 hours after the arrival in France of South African poet and painter Breyten Breytenbach, the reasons for his release are still giving rise to speculations. Officially it is due to remission for good conduct. The whole South African press, be it English-language opposition newspapers or the conservative Afrikaner dailies, is welcoming the decision taken regarding a man who had become a symbol abroad.

Indeed, Pretoria is trying to make people believe that its repressive policy is being eased. It is true that some political prisoners have already been released early on parole, but it does not seem that other releases are being envisaged at present and there is still concern in Europe over the fate of many black prisoners, of whom the most famous is nationalist Nelson Mandela.

Mr Breyten Breytenbach, who is tired and deeply traumatized by his years in detention, for the time being prefers not to explain the facts about the promises he may have made to his former jailers. By publicly announcing that he is abandoning political action, the man who only yesterday was regarded as a champion of the anti-apartheid struggle has already caused some disappointment among his own friends.

The role attributed to France in this affair is behind even more bitter controversy. South African Justice Minister Kobie Coetsee is officially denying Mr Cheysson's references to French diplomacy's "insistent interventions" on Mr Breyten Breytenbach's behalf, not hesitating to describe them as a "tissue of absurdities."

Just as in the case of Cuban poet Armando Valladares, the French Government invoked respect for human rights to secure the release of a man sentenced for his political opinions. Since May 1981, French policy toward the Pretoria regime has constantly become tougher: increased pressure within the five-member contact group to speed up Namibia's accession to independence; increased support for the nationalist movements SWAPO and the African National Congress which have strengthened their relations with the PS leaders; an open approach to all the frontline states which have been visited several times either by government members or by close presidential aides, including Mr Guy Penne, adviser for African affairs.

That leaves purely commercial relations between France and the Republic of South Africa. The trade balance, in which there had been a deficit since 1976 following the French embargo decision on arms sales, has been in the black again since last year.

Framatome's construction and sale of two reactors for the Koeberg nuclear power station explain that recovery. Thus, some people are giving in to the temptation to establish a link between Mr Breytenbach's release and plans to build a second nuclear power station in South Africa. However, authoritative circles deny that there is grounds for that link, since no South African call for tenders is scheduled before 1984.

COMMITTEE INVESTIGATES 'BULGARIAN CONNECTION'

AU161152 Rome ANSA in English 0806 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Excerpts] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 16 -- The spiralling revelations implicating the Bulgarian secret service in a broad conspiracy to destabilize Italy and, from within Italy, Poland were topic of a closed-door meeting Thursday night of the Italian Parliamentary Intelligence Watchdog Committee (CIS). No details of the meeting were released. Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni and Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio declined to make any comment to newsmen.

An official assessment of the validity of the Bulgarian connection in numerous destabilizing operations on Italian territory -- the assassination attempt of Pope John Paul II, a massive arms and drugs traffic ring, the use of an Italian trade unionist to spy and gather information on the Polish independent union Solidarity -- will be made by the Italian Government only in Parliament when a debate on the potentially explosive matter is slated to be held at the beginning of next week.

The Bulgarian connection first emerged when the pope's would be assassin, Turk Mehmet Ali Agca serving a life sentence in an Italian jail, fingered three Bulgarians from the Rome Embassy as his accomplices: Balkan Airlines Rome office manager Ivanov Antonov (under arrest), the secretary of the embassy military attache' Vasiliev Kolev (who returned to Sofia in June) and Todor Stoyanov Ayvazov (who could not be arrested because he had diplomatic immunity and who recently returned to Sofia).

Ayvazov issued a statement in Sofia today in which he voiced "stupor and indignation over the absurd and ridiculous charges" levelled against him and denied he ever met Agca. The Turk, however, is said to have given Italian investigators detailed descriptions of the home of the embassy official.

Ayvazov said he was ready to leave for Italy to prove his innocence and "defend his honor and that of his country", but voiced doubts about the "guarantees" he might receive for his defense.

The Bulgarian connection emerged also in the confessions of jailed trade union leader Luigi Scricciolo, arrested in February on charges of aiding and abetting the Red Brigades kidnappers of U.S. Brig Gen James Lee Dozier. Scricciolo recently confessed that Bulgarian agents asked him to spy and gather information on the Polish independent union Solidarity, its leader Lech Walesa and particularly on the union's international funding. It is believed the information was used in a campaign to discredit the union, directed at bringing Poland back into the Soviet orbit. The latest revelations in the Italian press suggested that Ali Agca was in Rome in January 1981 during Walesa's trip to Rome (organized by Scricciolo) and that he had orders to kill Walesa.

The third case in which a Bulgarian connection has emerged is in the two-year probe in northern Italy into the biggest arms and drugs traffic ring in northern Italy which has already led to the arrest of more than 200 suspects. Investigators believe Middle Eastern drug dealers, international terrorists, Sicilian mafia bosses and Turkish organized crime leaders met in Sofia and used drugs as payment to buy and resell heavy weapons, including tanks, helicopters and artillery.

In conclusion, U.S. secretary of state and the Vatican both issued denials Thursday of reports carried by the American media that Pope John Paul II told Shultz in the private audience they had Monday that the Soviet KGB was behind the aborted assassination attempt on the pontiff's life.

PAPERS VIEW BULGARIAN LINK TO PLOT AGAINST WALESA

AU151551 Rome ANSA in English 1535 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 15 -- Mehmet Ali Agca, the Turkish terrorist serving a life sentence in Italy for the assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II on May 13, 1981 had been ordered by the Bulgarian secret services to kill Lech Walesa, the leader of Poland's Solidarnosc Free Trade Union Movement, during his visit to Rome in January of that year, according to two Italian dailies.

LA REPUBBLICA, a left-of-center Rome paper, and IL GIORNALE NUOVO, a conservative Milan paper, affirmed in their accounts today that if this revelation reportedly made by the would-be assassin himself can be substantiated, it will lend considerable weight to the theory that the Bulgarians, backed by the Soviet KGB, intended to destabilize Poland by assassinating the Polish-born pope and Walesa. The purpose of the plot, in the terms of this hypothesis, was to nip in the bud the drive for democracy and reform in the Eastern European state and bring it back firmly into the Soviet orbit.

Today's press revelation, reportedly made in Agca's statements to investigating Magistrate Ilario Martella, who is heading the probe into the shooting of the pope, centered on Lech Walesa's visit to Rome from January 14 to 19 last year.

This trip was organized, the dailies point out, by Luigi Scricciolo, the head of the UIL Trade Union Federation foreign office at the time and in prison since February 4 this year on the charge of aiding and abetting the Red Brigades terrorists in their kidnapping of American Army General James Lee Dozier on December 17 last year. He is also charged with spying on Bulgaria.

The accounts refer to investigators' findings that Agca stayed in the Isa Hotel, not far from the Vatican, on January 19 last year under the name of Faruk Ozgun, the identification on the false passport in his possession when he was captured in Saint Peter's Square after the May shooting.

The dailies did not discuss how the Turk was to have killed the Polish trades union leader but noted that Walesa was in the Vatican on more than one occasion during his stay in Rome. Scricciolo is said to have "revolted against" the Bulgarian when he learned of the plan to slay Walesa. The former official for the socialist dominated union federation was quoted in LA REPUBBLICA as having said, "I will not let my friends be killed".

Scricciolo, who was the first Western union official to gain access to Walesa after the rise of Solidarnosc, was in Warsaw in December 1980 and, as the organizer of Walesa's visit to Rome, was in charge of police security for the Polish union leader's stay.

IL GIORNALE NUOVO, in its account, said that the Bulgarian secret services wanted to "commission" Italy's Red Brigades terrorists for the assassination of Walesa. "The project failed (and Agca may have been mobilized at that time) precisely because of the opposition of the former UIL "foreign minister'" according to the story.

In a related development, Scricciolo's defense attorneys told reporters that their client had not turned states evidence but that he was cooperating with the investigating magistrates "for the purpose of clarifying his position".

It was also reported last night that the jailed union official was said to have told Martella that he did not know and had never seen the Bulgarians allegedly involved in the assassination attempt against the pope.

BALSEMAO DELEGATION ARRIVES IN U.S. 15 DEC

LD152052 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Portuguese Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao arrived in Washington last night -- after having left Lisbon earlier in the afternoon -- for an official visit at the invitation of U.S. President Ronald Reagan. Before starting his talks with Ronald Reagan in the White House at 1630 GMT today, Pinto Balsemao will be meeting with Vice President George Bush, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, and members of Congress and the House of Representatives.

This morning, the Portuguese prime minister had a working breakfast with officials of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and is expected to return to Lisbon on Friday at 0600.

Meets With Reagan

LD152216 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Correspondent Oliveira e Silva report from Washington]

[Text] The 2-hour meeting between Ronald Reagan and Pinto Balsemao ended in the White House a few minutes ago. The talks, restricted to the two statesmen at first, were then subsequently extended to the delegations of both countries. The Portuguese delegation included [President of the Azores regional government] Mota Amaral, [Minister of State for Finance] Joao Salgueiro, [Foreign Minister] Futscher Pereira and [Secretary of State for Defence] Carlos Pardal, among others.

At the end of the meeting, Ronald Reagan and Pinto Balsemao each made a brief statement. Balsemao specifically referred to the Lajes issue -- which is, after all, the basic issue of this visit. The prime minister said that now that negotiations have entered a crucial stage, Portugal has expressed the wish to assume its responsibilities in the sphere of defense. Pinto Balsemao also stressed that, while opening the way for a speedy agreement, the Portuguese also expect full understanding of our problems from the Americans. Other matters touched upon were, according to Pinto Balsemao, peace and security in southern Africa. In this connection, Balsemao said that only through a negotiated process coupled with economic development and respect for the security of all countries involved can a solution be found.

Pinto Balsemao also said that he had the opportunity to brief Ronald Reagan on the latest developments in Portugal and our economic situation, as well as the state of negotiations aimed at Portugal's membership in the EEC.

For his part, Ronald Reagan said that Portugal and the United States have a joint responsibility in the defense of the West. The Portuguese prime minister, he added, explained to me the need to modernize the Portuguese Armed Forces and I, for my part, reiterated the commitment of the United States to ensure that the Portuguese requirements are met.

CENTRISTS ISSUE STATEMENT ON ELECTION OUTCOME

LD152120 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] While the Socialist Party has been maintaining official silence over the 12 December local elections results, leaders of the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] have pointed out that the Democratic Alliance [AD] is in the critical area of between 40 and 43 percent of the vote, which the centrists view as a serious warning calling for a recognition of the facts.

In a 65-line statement issued at the end of a meeting its Executive Committee held in the past 2 days, the CDS notes the AD's overall percentage drop and loss of ground in some town councils and of absolute majorities in the Lisbon and Oporto municipal corporations but stresses that the AD must get on with its parliamentary mandate, which it says is not called in question by the local election outcome. It emphasizes that from the institutional viewpoint, the CDS does not see any legitimacy in the opposition's arguments that the president of the republic should now dissolve Parliament and call early parliamentary elections.

However, the centrists do feel that the AD's poll results require a serious and profound study regarding the alliance and the decisions and changes required. In its statement, the CDS Executive Committee recognizes the gains made by the Socialist Party and the United People's Alliance's retention of its former electoral position.

However, the PCP holds different views. In a note released last night by its Central Committee Political Commission, the PCP says the United People's Alliance [APU] has recorded an important victory and the AD has suffered catastrophic losses compared with the 1979 election. In the PCP's view, the electorate's dissatisfaction with the AD government, the recovery of the vote lost in 1979, and tactical voting against the AD by democrats and against the APU by reactionaries were among the conflicting factors enabling the Socialist Party to make gains.

The Communists also take the view that there was a high percentage of abstentions, thereby confirming that a large section of the electorate felt that there was no one worth voting for.

After highlighting the APU's gain of five more town councils, the note goes on to point that the election results and the dynamism of the mass campaign show that the APU is a powerful force essential for defending the people's interests and democracy and for resolving major national problems.

GONZALEZ, SHULTZ DISCUSS BILATERAL RELATIONS

LD152150 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 2030 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpts] The U.S. Government wants to gain first-hand knowledge of the real foreign policy intentions of the Spanish Socialist Cabinet led by Felipe Gonzalez. In principle, the socialist executive is not as much in favor of the international policies of the Reagan administration as previous Cabinets were. As a first step, the Gonzalez government has halted Spain's military integration into NATO and is not prepared to give its approval to the defense agreement signed between the previous Union of Democratic Center Cabinet and the United States as it now stands. These issues form the background to the meeting at 1930 this evening between the prime minister and the U.S. secretary of state, who arrived in Madrid at midday. Here is a report from Angel Gomez Fuentes:

Bilateral relations were the central subject of discussion at the hour and a half meeting between Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez and U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz at the Moncloa Palace. This first high-level meeting between the Socialist government and the U.S. Administration has been the object of a great deal of interest.

We have ascertained that the talks took place in an atmosphere of cordiality and that Felipe Gonzalez clearly set out the new orientation of our relations with Washington. Felipe Gonzalez told George Shultz of the need for a reappraisal of the new agreement signed last July but awaiting ratification by the Spanish Parliament. The Socialist government intends to delete all references to the Atlantic alliance from the text following the decision to freeze Spanish integration into the military structure of NATO.

George Shultz is believed to have stated the U.S. wish that Spain remain in NATO, but at the same time expressed his respect for the socialist foreign policy and Washington's support for Spanish democracy.

They also discussed the question of the future attack and combat aircraft program, the purchase of which has to be decided one way or the other by the Spanish Government before 23 December. In the field of international affairs, Felipe Gonzalez and George Shultz spoke at length about Latin America. Shultz was especially interested in the prime minister's views on the conflict situation in Central America. We should recall here that Felipe Gonzalez is responsible for Ibero-American affairs within the Socialist International. The situation in the Maghreb, East-West relations and relations between Europe and the United States were other subjects discussed by Felipe Gonzalez and Shultz.

According to Spanish and U.S. diplomatic sources, it is hoped that Shultz's visit to Madrid will be the starting point for a new phase in relations between the Socialist government and Reagan's U.S. Administration now that this first important friendly contact has been established. To conclude, we shall say that Felipe Gonzalez and George Shultz reflected this atmosphere of friendship and cordiality, which is a feature of Shultz's meetings in Madrid, by putting on broad smiles for photographers at 2030 after their one-and-a-half-hour meeting.

Talks with Opposition Leader

[Text] We now have a report from Angel Gomez Fuentes: The leader of the opposition, Manuel Fraga, said he is pleased with the nearly 30-minute meeting he held this morning with U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz at the U.S. ambassador's residence.

Manuel Fraga expressed the view that Shultz' visit could be considered a success, and highlighted the words of support for Spanish democracy from the U.S. foreign affairs chief.

[Begin Fraga recording] [Few words indistinct] also that [words indistinct] once again that support from the United States for democratic political development in Spain (?will also be) a success. (?He made) statements which I see as very clarifying and very satisfactory [words indistinct]. [end recording]

Manuel Fraga also summed up the subjects of his conversation with Shultz: [Begin Fraga recording] [Passage indistinct] that was the main subject, but we also talked about policies toward the Third World, Africa, and in particular policies toward Latin America, (?which are subjects you would imagine we would cover. [Passage indistinct] [end recording]

At this moment, Shultz is holding a working breakfast at the Palace of Exhibitions and Congresses with the heads of Atlantic alliance CSCE member country delegations. At the end of the meeting, Shultz will read a statement. Immediately afterwards, he will go to the Zarzuela Palace to be received by King Juan Carlos. The U.S. secretary of state will leave Madrid at noon after holding a press conference.

GIBRALTAR-SPANISH BORDER OPEN 24 HOURS DAILY

LD142206 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] In 2 hours' time the Gibraltar border will be opened -- apparently the government on the Rock has decided at the last minute to keep the border open 24 hours a day. Our special correspondent reports:

The governor of Gibraltar, Sir David Williams [BBC records list Gen Sir William Jackson] has issued a communique revoking the decision of the Council of Ministers by which the border was to close daily from 0100 to 0600. The measures is described in Gibraltar political circles as the most serious institutional problem of the last 20 years. The communique from the governor of Gibraltar says that the British Government has taken full note of the opinions expressed by the Gibraltar ministers on the subject of the hours which the border between Gibraltar and Spain would be open.

In view of its aim of achieving the total abolition of restrictions and the need to bear in mind that the case of Gibraltar should be presented to world opinion in the best possible way, the British Government has concluded that there should be no obstacles on the Gibraltar side which would impede movement between Spain and Gibraltar. So, the border will be kept open 24 hours a day. That is all for the moment.

SOCIALIST UNIONS REJECT COMMUNIST PROPOSALS

PA141720 Madrid EFE in Spanish 0529 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Madrid, 13 Dec (EFE) -- Under the formula of a "joint interconfederational cooperation organization" [organo conjunto de cooperacion confederal], the Communist Spanish Workers Commissions (CCOO) today proposed rapprochement with the country's other large labor central, the Socialist General Workers Union (UGT). The two labor confederations control the labor sector following elections held in most of the country's enterprises.

The communist central's proposal, made by Secretary General Marcelino Camacho, is based on the functions and objectives of this "cooperation organization" of the CCOO and the UGT, which would jointly undertake upcoming collective negotiations with the government on labor matters. Camacho said that it would not be a "consolidation" but rather rapprochement and cooperation between the two confederations.

The socialist confederation rejected the Communist proposal because it considers this contradictory to the CCOO's strategy during the elections, in which it systematically attacked the UGT. According to the socialist confederation, the establishment of a cooperative group combining the two labor centrals would be more bureaucratic than effective and would require periodic negotiations to determine joint positions on specific labor matters, as has been done so far.

LATE REPORT: SHULTZ PRESS CONFERENCE

LD161204 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1100 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] A late report. As we reported earlier, U.S. Secretary of State Shultz was to hold a press conference at a Madrid hotel before leaving. Here is Delfin Garcia:

The press conference has just ended, and U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz is about to depart for Washington [as heard].

The highlight was his announcement that Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez had told him of his acceptance of an invitation from President Reagan to visit Washington sometime around next June.

Other subjects were discussed [words indistinct] the bases. At all our meetings, Shultz said, we discussed this matter and neither side sees any obstacle to ratification. On the subject of NATO, this is a decision for the Spanish Government to make. (?We are loyal) to the principles which Spanish democracy has already demonstrated. The United States would view Spanish membership with favor, but it is premature to give an opinion before the Madrid government reaches a final decision.

Latin America: Felipe Gonzalez is very interested in the problems of this region, of Central and South America. We shall find a formula for working together in this region. We also talked, the U.S. secretary of state said, about the declaration of the conference at San Jose, Honduras, [as heard] held a couple of months ago, which referred to banning the deployment of offensive weapons and of sending foreign technical experts and advisers, and which also proposed banning the traffic of weapons across borders with neighboring countries, and of working together to achieve reconciliation between the groups in power and those taking issue with them. On the question of a possible Helsinki-style conference on human rights throughout Latin America, the United States assists democracies in the region because, Mr. Shultz said, one of the most desired goals is respect for principles and human rights.

There was also talk of the F-18's, though this was only with the Spanish defense minister. Mr Shultz said that the subject is tied up with full Spanish membership in NATO.

Finally, in answer to some questions about whether there is resentment against the socialists, he said: We support democracy, and the outcome of this is a matter for each country individually. That is the U.S. position.

Shultz Leaves; Moran Interviewed

LD161428 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1200 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] The U.S. secretary of state is ending his official visit to Spain. A report from Hector Arenas at Barajas Airport:

U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz was seen off here at Barajas Airport in a relaxed but serious atmosphere, and with a promise that the United States will study a formula to satisfy Spanish proposals within the terms of the bilateral agreement. Shultz spent 24 hours in Spain in this the first official high-level contact between the Reagan administration and the Spanish Socialist government.

Alongside the U.S. Air Force Boeing-707 which was to take Mr Shultz to London, Spanish Foreign Minister Fernando Moran made the following statement to us about the visit, which apparently has not produced any immediate or spectacular results:

[Begin Moran recording] We explored the general international situation and bilateral relations. We also focused on defence relations, which are at present embodied in a text which has not yet been approved by Parliament and which requires some amendments or interpretations as regards its possible connection with the Atlantic alliance. On this point, we agreed to explore ideas and work for a complementary agreement -- or a complementary addendum, as it is called -- so as to make this relationship absolutely clear.

Essentially, the views we exchanged were similar. We paid great attention to the American point of view. I hope the Americans also fully understood the Spanish points of view. That is all I have to say. [end recording]

In response to a specific question, the Spanish foreign minister then added that as a result of the Shultz visit, the U.S. Government has agreed to begin looking for a formula to satisfy Spanish proposals. It is to be supposed -- and this is our comment -- that such Spanish proposals would almost certainly include reviewing the question of U.S. bases on Spanish territory, and negotiations for entry into NATO.

DENMARK

'DIFFERENT INTERESTS' OF SMALL, BIG NATO STATES

PM141827 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 7 Dec 82 pp 8-9

[Social Democratic Party Foreign and Defense Policy Committee Chairman Lasse Budtz article: "The Missiles and NATO: The Small Nations Have Different Interests From Those of the Large Nations"]

[Text] In the last few weeks' security debate, which in itself has been a good thing, the Social Democratic Party has stressed time and time again that it still holds the view that Denmark should be a member of NATO and take part in its military cooperation and that we cannot see any alternative to the security policy we are pursuing at present. Things could change, but the right conditions for a security policy turnabout do not exist today.

Some people have obviously not understood these Social Democratic Party statements, and this could be the party's fault.

Perhaps we have not spoken loudly or clearly enough, and if this is true, it is regrettable. Others have not heard what we have been saying for political reasons -- it has been practical for them not to hear, but such an attitude does not of course alter the facts.

Having said this, it would be both unrealistic and unwise not to admit at the same time the difficulties which already exist within NATO cooperation, and perhaps more particularly, the difficulties which are about to emerge. If we do not understand the problems and their existence, we cannot solve them.

One of the main problems is that NATO -- naturally -- is affected by the fact that the tension between East and West is a question of the relationship between the Soviet Union and the United States. If the superpowers are able to agree, things get better for the rest of us. A certain amount of mutual understanding and consideration is all that is needed. If the superpowers pursue a defiant policy of confrontation -- and that is what both have been doing for the last year -- the rest of us find ourselves in a difficult political and security situation.

Thus NATO's problem is that its all-dominating superpower quite understandably has different interests from those of the majority of the other member nations, especially the small nations, on a number of points in the general course of foreign and security policy.

Another aspect of NATO's main problem is of course the fact that confrontation between the superpowers leaves Europe as a kind of hostage on the political battlefield and, if nothing is done about it, it will also be the hostage on the military battlefield. Disagreements are therefore almost inevitable, but the existence of such disagreements is not being explained away any more. There is always something.

Small nations have interests different from those of the large nations even within an alliance. According to the system, individual countries also retain the rights of sovereign states, have the right to say "stop" or "no, thank you" without being excluded for stepping out of line.

All the 16 nations are interested in pointing out that we represent democracy. Small nations have a right to say to the large ones: Here we disagree, but we want to cooperate nevertheless, or: We cannot afford to take part in this, for the economic difficulties in a small country are different from those in a large country -- to say nothing of the all-dominating superpower.

However, there are also different views within each country. Rightwing parties are inclined to -- sorry to have to say it -- demonstrate almost unconscious acceptance of what the United States says. No questions are asked, not even requests for explanations. The Social Democrats are more skeptical. They want to have everything assessed and all their doubts discussed and it is well known that doubt is an intellectual strength.

We are all agreed that 1983 will be a very critical year for NATO cooperation if we do not reach an agreement with the Soviet Union on medium-range missiles which would lead to either their disappearance or to a reduction in their numbers.

The alternative to these two possibilities is unpredictable and deadly dangerous -- to such an extent that it is unthinkable that it would be possible to get the largest political movement in Europe, the Social Democratic Parties, to agree to such a development. And this would set off a chain reaction creating serious political problems internationally and nationally.

If West Germany's clearly rightwing [Chancellor] Kohl says an unqualified "yes" where West Germany's clearly leftwing Vogel [a leader of the FRG's CDU] says "no", you do not need much imagination to understand the tensions which would arise at all levels.

NATO's rejection of a study of the possibility of a new strategy which would involve the use of fewer nuclear arms could and would be the source of much surprise and many disagreements. Nuclear arms are cheaper, the military establishment says. Indeed, but if a movement is now growing in Europe in favor of strengthening -- although this would be expensive -- conventional arsenals, as [NATO Supreme Allied Commander] General Rogers, for example, has proposed, by adding precision weapons, should we just pretend that nothing is happening?

A nuclear arms freeze is one idea which has won much understanding, especially among U.S. experts and politicians, and there is probably a majority supporting it in the House of Representatives. Is the idea simply to be shelved because Reagan and his generals and a number of conservative European governments do not care for it?

At the recent NATO ministers meeting, great sympathy was expressed for the U.S. so-called Rapid Deployment Force, which will be able to move into any part of the world, but -- note well -- outside the NATO area. The Americans have the idea that they can withdraw U.S. supply troops from Europe and deploy them within the RDF organization when a crisis arises. But the Americans think that the holes left would be filled by Europeans; a figure of 90,000 men has been mentioned.

Well, do they expect all NATO nations simply to accept this -- and do they think that small nations such as Denmark, the Netherlands and Belgium have the capacity and the money to suddenly take their share of new burdens like these? Hardly, so why do they not say so more clearly?

According to its own resolutions, NATO is also prepared to put facilities at the disposal of the U.S. RDF during transit and in action. The additional assurance is given that there will first be mutual consultation before permission is granted -- or so I believe. For it could be that the U.S. forces are to be deployed in an area or against an opponent with which Denmark does not wish disagreement, or with which Denmark feels some sympathy. The NATO system should not then be used as a backup system for the United States outside the NATO area, and NATO's areas of responsibility are not to be extended.

A number of U.S. senators want to return a meager 24,000 troops home from Europe, in part for economic reasons and in part because they take the view that Europe is not making a sufficient contribution to NATO. Ignoring the fact that it is in the U.S. interest to take part in the defense of Europe, the idea is absurd for as long as the delegations taking part in the negotiations in Vienna on troop reductions pretend to be discussing the matter seriously. Why should the Russians agree to any arrangements if the Americans withdraw voluntarily?

In addition, 90 percent of the European NATO forces, 80 percent of the combat aircraft, 90 percent of the armored divisions and 70 percent of the combat ships are also European, just to set things right.

In the last few days there have been threats, from NATO, too, that if Denmark does not want to contribute toward the medium-range missiles, this would be worse than France's withdrawal from military cooperation, and the response could be a U.S. "No" to sending reinforcements in a war situation.

Things are now almost reaching the level of the absurd and must at least be seen as irresponsible. This underlines NATO's own crisis and the differences between the interests of a superpower and those of a small nation. Perhaps it also indirectly underlines the fact that the present time is well suited to new West-West negotiations, but especially to new East-West talks. Yuriy Andropov's "political arrival" in the top Soviet post is a good opportunity for some positive moves by the West.

CROWN PRINCE HARALD HOSPITALIZED 14 DEC

NC141455 Paris AFP in English 1447 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] Olso, Dec 14 (AFP) -- Prince Harald, the heir to the Norwegian throne, was admitted into hospital today to undergo minor surgery, the Royal Palace said. The crown prince will stay in hospital for about a week while doctors try to remove a stone from his urethra, the palace announcement said. Crown Prince Harald is 45 and married to Crown Princes Sonja. The royal couple has two children, Maertha and Haakon Magnus.

ARBEIDERBLADET WELCOMES HOUSE VOTE AGAINST MX

PM141701 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegain 9 Dec 82 p 4

[Editorial: "MX No"]

[Text] No U.S. Government will, we hope, start a nuclear war. The Americans want two things: enough nuclear arms to deter the Russians from starting such a war, and the capacity to launch a nuclear retaliatory attack after a possible future Soviet nuclear attack. The United States has both -- without the MX missiles, and without many of the weapons which have already been deployed.

With its "No" to the MX missiles, the House of Representatives has given the new Soviet leadership the signal which President Regan should really have given.

LABOR PARTY STANCE ON DUAL DECISION QUESTIONED

PM150937 Olso AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 8 Dec 82 p 2

[Editorial: "Attempting an Approach"]

[Text] Yesterday's Storting foreign affairs debate was dominated more than anything else by the desire to smooth over the recent sharp disagreements over Norwegian security policy. A well-constructed speech by the Labor party's chief spokesman Guttorm Hansen laid the foundation for a long-awaited dialogue which Foreign Minister Svenn Stray called for in his foreign affairs report as long as 26 November. This new meeting between the government and opposition undoubtedly represented a significant step forward in the depressing positional war over the NATO duel decision and the commitments Norway has in connection with it.

There was probably no one who paid much attention to Guttorm Hansen's show of indignation and injury at the fact that anyone could sow doubts about the Labor Party's position on vital security questions, and it does seem a little pointless for him to blame others for the fact that his party choose its words in such a way that everyone outside the party takes them as a retreat from previous positions.

If the Labor Party is firm on the dual decision, with all the commitments this entails, it is therefore an important task that calm be created around such a vital security issue. The Labor Party should stop choosing its words so that the party's position is interpreted differently from its intentions. The deep split we have seen recently over the dual decision and Western negotiating strategy is due -- as everyone knows -- to the fact that the Labor Party has been unwilling to fulfill the agreements and commitments to which the Nordli and Harlem Brundtland governments were party. If the Labor Party has now changed its mind and wants to see broad national unity reestablished, we for our part would welcome such a development. But as yet it is still too early to predict the final outcome of the differences of opinion existing within the Labor Party.

The two largest parties deserve recognition for the fact that they have contributed to a climate for debate which again makes it possible to discuss security policy on a more realistic basis. On the other hand, it is impossible to hide the fact that a change of attitude is beginning to emerge, not only in the Labor Party's ranks, but also it would seem in certain circles within the Christian People's and Center Parties. Many people are inclined toward the view that greater readiness towards reconsideration should be shown, so that attitudes and positions do not become too static. Guttorm Hansen touched on a very important point here. He said that those of us whose attitudes were determined by war and the years of occupation learned a lesson which it is impossible to forget, but which also makes reconsideration difficult. For his part, Guttorm Hansen was willing to admit this. However, this does not need to mean, he said, that all new ideas and attitudes are worthwhile and important simply because they are new.

The most important conclusion we are able to draw from yesterdays foreign affairs debate is the lesson that the last thing we should do is to try to wish our way out of the situation in which we find ourselves. We cannot accept a freeze on the Soviet Union's superior nuclear forces or further reinforcement of the domination of Soivet power in Europe. Such a situation would in itself lead to a dangerous risk of blackmail and force. Just as Guttorm Hansen, we have little liking for the idea of one day being called to negotiations by a superior military power which negotiates with missiles at its back.

PETITION SIGNED TO BREAK RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL

NC161330 Paris AFP in English 1323 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Stockholm, Dec 16 (AFP) -- A petition demanding the government to severe diplomatic ties with Israel has been signed by more than 100,000 Swedes, it was learned here today.

The petition, conceived by Swedish Jews and medical personnel in Lebanon at the time of the Israel invasion last June, will be submitted to Prime Minister Olof Palme in January.

FOREIGN MINISTER CITED ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE

PM151247 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 9 Dec 82 p 5, 6

[Magdalena Ribbing report: "Nuclear-Free Zone Soundings Brought Forward"]

[Text] DAGENS NYHETER's report on Tuesday [7 December] of a new Swedish disarmament initiatve resulted in the work on the initiative being accelerated. The intention had been that a large number of Swedish ambassadors were to contact various governments on Friday, 10 December, to sound them out about the Swedish proposal for a nuclear-free zone in central Europe.

Instead everything had to be brought forward to Wednesday, as was a hastily called press conference at the Foreign Ministry. At the press conference Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom pointed out that the Swedish move had originally been planned to take place 2 days after reports appeared in DAGENS NYHETER. Sweden is taking soundings to see how the idea is received, he said.

The Swedish move concerns a proposal made by the independent Palme Commission chaired by Olof Palme in its final report, "Common Security." The report describes and proposes a zone in central Europe free from nuclear warheads and the stockpiling of nuclear arms and stretching 150km along either side of the border between the power blocs. A zone of this size would be an important contribution to endeavors to promote detente and confidence between the two superpowers. It would primarily counter the risk that nuclear arms would be used at an early stage of a war.

"If there is any possibility at all that one nuclear warhead can be prevented from exploding, that possibility must be grasped," Lennart Bodstrom said. The foreign minister also thought that the timing of the Swedish move is well-chosen -- both East and West are growing poorer, unemployment is rising everywhere, and at the same time the arms race -- an enormous expense -- is accelerating.

Sweden's new disarmament ambassador Maj-Britt Theorin, told DAGENS NYHETER that the initiative is fully in line with Sweden's active disarmament policy. "But it is important to stress that we are not presenting a proposal, but taking soundings. The views we have solicited from all countries will form a foundation for our future action. Sweden has also succeeded in getting the Palme Commission's report into the UN machine -- unusual for such a report which was not produced by a government but by an independent commission. The proposal that the report should be included on the UN agenda was passed unanimously the other day by the UN first committee and the same will happen in the next round of voting," Maj-Britt Theorin said.

The states contacted by the Swedish Government on Wednesday on the subject of the nuclear-free zone in central Europe included the neutral and nonaligned states of Ireland, Yugoslavia, Switzerland, Finland and Austria, as well as the members of the NATO and Warsaw Pact military alliances.

Flaws Seen in 'Minizone' Idea

PM141703 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 9 Dec 82 p 2

[Editorial "Zone Soundings"]

[Text] The attempts to find an escape from superweapons and small tactical nuclear arms which could trigger off an unstoppable and destructive world conflict are attracting increasing attention in the international debate. They are made by a peace movement which is unrealistic in all too many cases, but in the wake of these "pacifist" currents politicalns are increasingly devoting their energies to attempts to limit arms.

This had led to shaky support for the Western defense alliance, and on Thursday it also led to President Reagan's first major defeat when the House of Representatives refused to grant the funds he had requested for the development of the experimental MX.

It was against such a background that the Swedish Government launched an international "initiative" aimed at creating a zone free from so-called battlefield nuclear arms.

It is wrong to speak of a Swedish initiative in this context. It is really more like a sounding of the members of NATO and the Warsaw Pact plus the nonaligned European states for their views on the idea. Nor is the idea originally Swedish. it is one of the results of the so-called Palme Commission's wearisome work to find ways to global disarmament, and even in the commission's final report it is nothing more than a drastically watered-down compromise. Olof Palme himself, together with the commission's West German representative, had wanted the commission to reccommand something much more far-reaching, namely that Europe should be purged of all nuclear arms.

The Swedish initiative which has now been presented — and which seems identical to the commission's proposal -- is that there should be no nuclear arms within 150 km on both sides of the border between the two power blocs in Europe.

Since a large part of the nuclear ammunition of both NATO and Warsaw Pact forces is intended for use on the field of battle, a minizone of the type proposed could of course reduce the risk of the use of tactical nuclear arms in the early stages of a conflict. However, the idea also has it weaknesses. Neither the U.S. nor the Soviet members of the Palme Commission were very enthusiastic about the idea. The Soviet Union's Georgiy Arbatov even had his reservations included in a footnote to the commission's report. A further weakness of an arrangement like this is that both sides involved in a conflict situation could quickly bring in nuclear warheads from nearby depots or even find such a zone to be a safe -- although forbidden -- stockpiling area for nuclear arms.

What the Social Democratic government is now putting out under the title of an "initiative" is very modest. What the government wants is for other governments to give their views on the idea. It is possible that the majority of replies will be "Oh, really."

It is difficult to dismiss an idea aimed at reducing tension in the world. At the same time, however, the Western alliance's members must fear that if the Western powers do away with their most important defense in the present situation a superior tank armada from the Soviet bloc could roll in over Western Europe.

This is also the rule which applies to the deployment of nuclear-armed medium-range missiles in Western Europe. The mood prevailing today benefits the Soviet Union's delaying tactics, and results from the engotiations currently taking place in Geneva are not to be expected until the Soviet side is convinced that the NATO decision from 1979 still applies and that new nuclear arms will be deployed in Western Europe unless the United States and the Soviet Union reach agreement on arms reductions before then.

The Swedish Government's idea runs the risk of primarily being used by the growing move-movement which is presently strengthening the Soviet bloc at the expense of NATO. Even though it is a modest demarche, the Swedish idea could give renewed international attention to Olof Palme, at the same time perhaps with this move enabling him to prevent more left-wing forces than the Social Democrats from becoming the dominant ones in the Swedish peace movement.

ESTONIAN EXILES SCORE TALLINN PORT PROJECT

PM151345 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 9 Dec 82 p 13

[Bo B. Melander report: "Baltic Protest Against Finnish Construction Aid"]

[Text] An open letter to the Finnish people from 15 Estonian dissidents was made public by the Estonian Aid Center in Stockholm Wednesday [18 December]. The letter calls on Finnish firms not to take part in the expansion of Tallinn's harbor.

One of the arguments against the project is the Russification of Estonia. Another is that the harbor could be used as a naval base for the Soviet fleet. According to the letter, the harbor with with its service industries will provide jobs for 100,000 workers. If the families of these 100,000 workers are included in estimates, around 200,000 new immigrants will come to Tallinn.

"It is inevitable that 90 percent of these will come from other parts of the Soviet Union. Today only half of Tallinn's population is Estonian. After the new immigration, the figure would fall to 35 percent," the letter says.

"We would thus become a minority in our own capital," Ants Kippar, the chairman of the aid center for political prisoners in Estonia, said at a press conference in Stockholm Wednesday.

At the press conference, it was made clear that the harbor is being constructed primarily for grain imports, but that it is very likely that it will also have considerable military importance.

A Swedish company was mentioned in this context -- the Johnson Construction Company, but as yet no firms have signed contracts since the project is still at the tender stage. On Wednesday, the aid center also handed over a letter to [Swedish Prime Minister] Olof Palme calling on him to help save the life of human rights activist Mart Niklus, who is serving a 10-year hard labor sentence. Niklus' release has been sought, along with permission for him to travel to join his brother in Sweden.

The organization has also received reports that three Estonians have been jailed for using a portrait of Brezhnev as a target. They are enterprise chief Toivo Orula, meteorologist Sulev Selli and lawyer Jarosalv Zirk of the Vohma meat combine. The trial is considered to be a farce since not even the photograph with the bullet holes was produced in court. The three were sentenced for hooliganism.

POLISH JAMMING OF BBC, VOA 'SUDDENLY STEPPED UP'

LD161304 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1247 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Jamming of British broadcasts to Poland was suddenly stepped up today, the BBC said in a statement. The increased interference came as it was reported that Lech Walesa, leader of the Solidarity Union, had been detained after Polish military police surrounded his home in Gdansk. It follows the suspension of martial law by the Polish authorities.

The BBC said the jamming was coming not from Russia, but from inside Poland. It meant that attempts were being made for the first time to blot out all BBC transmissions in Polish. Up until this week interference had been confined to short wave, the BBC said. "But now BBC Polish language transmissions on 231 metres medium wave are being affected as well. And not just Polish transmissions. Six other BBC foreign language services -- Bulgarian, Czech, German, Hungarian, Slovene and Turkish, which use the same medium wave frequency -- are also suffering some interference. So are those BBC World Service broadcasts in English which are beamed to Europe on 231 metres.

"In January, BBC engineers traced the continuing short wave jamming of BBC Polish programmes to three centres in the Soviet Union -- Kaliningrad, Smolensk and Tashkent. However, today it was confirmed that this new medium wave inference is Polish in origin."

Mr Douglas Muggeridge, managing director of external broadcasting, said: "The new medium wave jamming is not of the electrical noise variety. This time the authorities have simply overlaid Warsaw's second radio channel, which is basically a cultural and educational network, right on top of our BBC medium wave transmissions. When we first heard the interference, we thought it might just be a technical fault. But then we saw the same thing was happening to the Voice of America's Polish transmissions. The interference is obviously deliberate and intended to jam our medium wave signal," he said. The BBC's regular audience in Poland is currently estimated at about 7,500,000 people.

The BBC said that the latest round of jamming began almost a year ago, December 30, 1981. Prior to that the Polish service had been unjammed since 1963. Poland stopped jamming BBC broadcasts in 1956, but Soviet jammers kept up thier interference on these programmes for a further seven years. "Although jamming of any broadcast is strongly to be regretted, this new action does represent a backhanded tribute to the effectiveness of the BBC Polish service," said Mr Muggeridge.

When the Polish authorities stopped jamming BBC broadcasts in Polish in 1956, the Warsaw daily newspaper ZYCIE WARSZAWY described it as a "victory for correct principles and a break with the method that had brought us no credit". Foreign radios stations, it said, should be "countered by factual arguments, not noise."

THATCHER REPLY ON U.S. WARTIME MILITARY BASE

LD161006 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 0841 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] The government has agreed that the Americans can set up an alternative military command headquarters near High Wycombe, Bucks, during wartime, the prime minister has confirmed. But she has emphasised that the unit will be an American national headquarters and not a NATO headquarters.

Her Commons written reply yesterday followed reports at the weekend that the NATO Command Headquarters was to be transferred from Stuttgart to the U.S. Air Force base at Daws Hill near High Wycambe. She told Mr Frank Allaun, Labour MP for Salford East, "We have agreed that in wartime an alternative headquarters for parts of the U.S. European Command may be located at Wycombe Air Station." She said: "This will be purely a national headquarters, which is not the same as a NATO headquarters. United States European Command is responsible for directing the reinforcement and logistic support of U.S. forces in Europe. Forward defence remains an essential element of NATO's political and military strategy."

PYM IN DEBATE ON SOVIET MISSILE REDUCTION OFFER

LD152004 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1933 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Russia is prepared to cut the number of SS-20 nuclear missiles targeted on Western Europe in return for NATO abandoning the installation of cruise and Pershing missiles. This emerged during a Commons emergency debate tonight when the foreign secretary, Francis Pym, told MP's that the government was now studying the proposals which had been "floated" by the Soviet Union. He stressed that no precise details were available and when arms talks resumed in Geneva next month it would be a top priority to seek clarification from the Russians.

However, Mr Pym appeared to rule out reports that Russia was willing to halve the force of SS-20's aimed at Western Europe. The so called 'zero option' remains NATO's objective. This would involve Russia dismantling the SS-20 and the older SS-4 and SS-5 while the West would drop plans to install cruise and Pershing. But the Western leaders have made it known that there is room for negotiation.

Ministers see the latest Russian position -- apparently first made known before the death of President Brezhnev -- as yet another concession by the Soviets during the arms talks. At first they refused to talk until the West abandoned cruise -- a condition the Russians later dropped. The indications are that Soviet offer will be something short of the rumoured 50 percent cut in SS-20's, perhaps as little as one third of the 180 missiles pointing towards targets in Western Europe.

Mr Pym made clear during the debate that failing agreement with the Russians the West was determined to go ahead with the installation of cruise and Pershing. But he stressed that development would take five years and could be reversed if the result of negotiations justified it. "Nothing is irrevocable," he said.

Today's emergency debate, on Western governments' approach to nuclear disarmament and defence, was held as a result of a successful plea to the speaker on Tuesday by shadow Foreign Secretary Denis Healey. Mr Pym told MP's that negotiations between Russia and the United States must be confidential, but the description by Mr Healey of an "offer" by Mr Andropov to cut by 50 percent or more the number of SS-20 missiles targeted against Western Europe was not in accordance with the government's understanding.

The government wanted an agreement but Mr Pym reminded the house that the Russians had "disavowed" recent Western press reports of progress at the negotiations, saying they were "unfounded". But the Russians had recently floated some new ideas, although they had come up before the death of President Brezhnev. The NATO programme would not increase the total number of warheads in Western Europe by a single one, Mr Pym said.

"Nothing is irrevocable," he added "even when deployments take place we can put the process into reverse." Mr Pym said that if Western proposals for reductions in strategic U.S. and Soviet nuclear weapons were accepted this would halve the number of deployed intercontinental missiles and cut warhead numbers by one third by the end of this decade. He condemned, as "mischievous," claims that the multilateral approach did not work. Mr Pym also condemned calls for a nuclear freeze as only "superficially beguiling or attractive." A freeze would, in these negotiations, perpetuate an "overwhelming Soviet predominance" and remove any incentive for mutual negotiated reductions, as the primary Soviet aim of preventing NATO modernisation at zero cost would have been achieved.

Replying to an intervention by Mr Healey, the foreign secretary said he could give no assurance that there would be dual control over the cruise missiles America plans to site in Britain. Dual control would be highly desirable but, "I cannot give that assurance," Mr Pym said. He added: "The position remains exactly the same as it was when I made a statement three years ago. I am aware some arrangements of this kind would be highly desirable, but what I have explained is what the position is at present and how it stands at the moment."

SOUTH AFRICAN ENVOY LEAVES UNDER PRESSURE

[By diplomatic correspondent Tom McMullan]

[Text] A South African official believed to have been engaged in espionage has been asked to leave Britain. The Foreign Office said tonight that Warrant Officer Joseph Klue had left the country following an approach to the South African ambassador.

"We have reason to believe that he had been engaged in activities incompatible with his official status in this country," a spokeswoman said. This form of words is normally another way of saying that Klue had been engaged in spying. It is clear that if he was not withdrawn he would have been expelled. But the Foreign Office tonight would not go into details of the activities which led to his departure.

An approach was made a few months ago to Home Secretary William Whitelaw by the anti-apartheid movement, which complained about the acitivites of the South African Embassy in London. Since then, it is understood that the police have been investigating Klue's background.

Labour MP Mr Robert Hughes, chairman of the anti-apartheid movement, told Mr Whitelaw that opponents of apartheid were becoming anxious about their security because of the activities of the embassy. However, it is not clear if Klue was the organiser of a South African intelligence network covering part of Western Europe. According to Whitehall sources he is felt to be engaged in espionage in only a fairly limited way.

NORTH'S ATALAY ADDRESSES UN SECURITY COUNCIL

TA150755 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0500 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] The TFSC has asked for the status of the UNFICYP to be reviewed in accordance with the realities in Cyprus. The TURKISH CYPRIOT NEWS AGENCY [TAK] reports that the mandate of the UNFICYP was extended by another 6 months yesterday by the UN Security Council.

Addressing the council, which met on this occasion, Turkish Cypriot representative in New York Nail Atalay expressed his objection to the use of the term "Cypriot Government" mentioned in the draft resolution submitted to the Security Council. Atalay pointed out that since 1963, when the Greek Cypriot attacks began, there has been no legal Cypriot Government on the island. Recalling that the Greek Cypriot side usurped the right to a Cypriot Government through the use of force despite the existence of two separate communities on the island, Atalay said that this reflected neither the de facto nor the de jure situation in Cyprus. He stated that to consider the Greek Cypriot administration in the island as the Cypriot Government was against the fundamental provisions of the 1960 Cypriot Constitution.

Atalay said that his government would continue to exert efforts in order to leave the door open for the continuation of the intercommunal talks being held in Cyprus. The Turkish Cypriot side, he added, will never be the first one to close that door.

Criticizing the Greek Cypriot stance on the issue of the missing persons, Atalay said that though the Turkish side considered this issue as a humanitarian problem, the Greek Cypriot side treated it as a political problem. Atalay confirmed that the only forum where the missing persons issue could be discussed was the autonomous joint missing persons committee established by the two communities in Cyprus. Pointing out that no trace existed of a number of Greek Cypriots since they had been killed during the coup staged against Archbishop Makarios on 15 July 1974, the TFSC representative said: This problem will not be solved as long as the Greek Cypriots insist on exploiting this humanitarian issue in international forums for political expediency.

Answering Greek Cypriot objections to the formation of a central bank, a development bank and the introduction of Turkish currency in the TFSC, Atalay said that these decisions resulted from the current economic conditions in Cyprus. He said that this was an internal affair of the Turkish Cypriot Federated State and that the Greek Cypriot allegations were unfounded.

Calling on the UN Security Council to encourage the two national entities in Cyprus to solve their problems through the intercommunal talks based on equality, Atalay said that under the security provided by the Turkish peace forces, the two communities could (?coexist).

Replying to Greek Cypriot objections on the latest legislation in the TFSC in connection with immovable properties and [words indistinct], Atalay said that the goal of this law was to solve the social and economic problems of Turkish Cypriots who have become refugees as a result of the large-scale exchange of population that took place in Cyprus. Atalay said that these people were provided with the right of ownership and transfer of their immovable properties so that that could raise the capital and investment necessary for repair work, maintenance and the productive use of the properties. This legislation is not aimed at seizing by force the immovable [Greek Cypriot] properties in question and does not contradict the international laws and principles, Atalay concluded.

COUNCIL EXTENDS PEACE FORCE MANDATE 6 MONTHS

NC151441 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Cyprus' permanent UN representative, Mousioutas, once again stressed at the UN Security Council that the Cyprus problem is a problem of invasion and occupation of a significant part of the Cyprus Republic's territory and an issue of the mass violation of the human rights and basic freedoms of the Cypriot people as a whole.

Speaking last evening in a Security Council meeting which unanimously approved a 6-month extension of the International Peace Force's mandate in Cyprus. Mousioutas denounced the absolute flouting of UN resolutions by Turkey and its trampling upon the principles of the UN Charter. The Cypriot delegate stressed that UN credibility depends on its ability to implement its resolutions.

Speaking at the same meeting, Greek delegate Dhoundas reiterated that the intercommunal talks are in fact being held between the Greek Cypriot side and Turkey and added that Greece considers it inconceivable that these talks will lead to a just result since they are being held under the pressure of the Turkish military occupation of part of Cyprus.

TRADE, BANKING AGREEMENTS SIGNED WITH BULGARIA

NC152021 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] A trade protocol and a banking agreement were signed between Cyprus and Bulgaria at the Commerce Ministry today. Commerce Minister Andreou signed the protocol on behalf of the Cyprus Government, and Mr Ginev, first deputy minister of foreign trade, signed on behalf of the Bulgarian Government. The banking agreement was signed between Mr Avxendiou, Central Bank director, and Mr (Kairakov), director of the Bulgarian Bank for Foreign Trade. The doubling of trade between the two countries, which is $10 million annually, is envisaged with these agreements.

Speaking at the ceremony, Commerce Minister Andreou stated that the agreements follow the decisions of Presidents Kiprianou and Zhivkov to increase Cyprus-Bulgarian trade, and added that they will open new horizons in bilateral trade relations. Mr Andreou also expressed gratitude for Bulgaria's firm support of Cyprus' political problem.

Mr Ginev, Bulgarian first deputy minister for foreign trade, stated that the agreements are an example of good cooperation between countries with different systems.

The Bulgarian official was received by President Kiprianou today. He was accompanied by Mr Andreou and Bulgarian Ambassador Bochev.

ALITHIA CITES REJECTED DIKO-DISI COOPERATION

NC161130 Nicosia ALITHIA in Greek 16 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[Text] Mr Kliridhis' revelation that "opportunities were given and proposals were made to Mr Kiprianou to remain president" if he disengaged himself from AKEL, has caused a sensation among Nicosia's diplomatic circles and Democratic Party [DIKO] cadres. Mr Kliridhis further revealed that Kiprianou is "deriding his followers" when he says he will disengage himself from AKEL after the elections. In its very first issue in an exclusive report, ALITHIA had revealed when these contacts were made, and that one of the Democratic Rally [DISI] vice chairmen, Leandros Zakhariadhis, had undertaken to convey the pertinent proposal.

According to information received yesterday, the proposals were repeated recently and the initiative was left to Mr Kiprianou to form a government with proportional and reasonable participation with DISI and other parties outside AKEL once it disengaged itself from AKEL.

Diplomatic observers, who questioned whether this proposal constitutes an indirect appraisal of Mr Kiprianou's capabilities -- which AKEL also considers insufficient -- were given the reply that:

According to the Constitution, the president's authority to appoint the Council of Ministers is very strong. The president has no vote in the decisions taken by the Council of Ministers. If, however, the authority of appointing the Council of Ministers operated on the basis of a political protocol between ideological-connected parties, a strong executive rule would be formed. Mr Kiprianou would then retain the presidency with limited margins of personal mistakes and increased possibilities of operating a generally acceptable government that would represent the overwhelming majority of the people and would not deprive AKEL of its democratic rights. Moreover, the Greek press had mentioned that this was Mr Karamanlis' wish and proposal.

Regarding the rumors being spread by Mr Kiprianou that he will break away from AKEL after the elections -- something which Mr Kliridhis described as a mockery -- we were informed that DIKO members were also posing the following questions yesterday:

1. How can something like this ever happen because, if Mr Kiprianou breaks away from AKEL after the elections, DIKO would remain a minority party and lose the backing of the House of Representatives in which the phony DIKO-AKEL majority reigns today?

2. Why did Mr Kiprianou not prefer parties with the same ideas, which offered him cooperation, instead of becoming an AKEL prisoner?

These shaking questions have caused serious tendencies toward a rift in DIKO, while Mr Kiprianou's other party cadres insist on reexamining DISI's proposal before the pre-election struggle aggravates. This, however, has been precluded from circles in the Presidential Palace, who know the extent of Mr Kiprianou's commitment to AKEL, which he will neither abandon nor break away from.

DENKTAS SENDS MESSAGE TO ISLAMIC COUNCIL

TA151402 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English 1115 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has called on Muslims and Islamic states across the world to form a closer cooperation and solidarity for the achievement of freedom, peace and prosperity, not only for oppressed Muslims, but for all mankind. The president made his call in a message to the inaugural meeting of the continental council of [name indisdinct] for Asia and the Pacific held in Jakarta. The message was read out by Mr (Ferit) Erkin, roving ambassador to Islamic countries of the Federated State.

In his message, President Denktas described it as inspiring and encouraging to note that over the last few years there had been a pronounced and most welcome upsurge of Islamic revival and activity not only in the Middle East but in every continent and corner of the earth. He pointed out, however, that despite these developments, the world of Islam was still confronted with many problems. He said that this was because of a lack of sufficient cooperation and solidarity.

He added that this shortcoming was being exploited by the adversaries. After recounting many instances of exploitation against the oppressed Muslims, President Denktas said that peace could not be achieved or preserved without justice and sufficient deterrent force against the evil forces of political rivalry, economic disparity, religious discrimination and belligerent tendencies. He reiterated the call for further cooperation and solidarity among Islamic countries.

KKE 11TH CONGRESS CONTINUES MEETING IN ATHENS

Cuban Delegate's Statement

NC152144 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 15 Dec 82 p 5

["Text" of statement to RIZOSPASTIS by Miguel Cano Blanco, alternate member of the Cuban Communist Party Central Committee Politburo, in Athens -- date not specified]

[Text] We are coming to Greece to once again demonstrate the comradeship and fraternal friendship that unites us with the KKE. The KKE is very familiar to us. Despite the thousands of kilometers that separate us, the KKE has great authority in our country. This is why we Cuban communists, who in essence are internationalists, greatly value the KKE's authority and activities. We are coming to the 11th congress to contribute to strengthening the unity of the communist parties and the cooperation of the liberation movements in the world. We are also coming to show our intentions to fight U.S. imperialism everywhere, in any form and with every method.

Cyprus Papaioannou Addresses Congress

NC152154 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] In an address at the 11th KKE Congress, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou stressed that the Cyprus issue will be solved with the united and planned struggle of the Cypriot people, the support and help of democratic Greece and its government and the solidarity and support of the socialist and nonaligned countries and the world's freedom-loving people. Mr Papaioannou added that a careful and skillful handling of the Cyprus issue is needed. He further said that such handling has been undertaken through the democratic cooperation of the Democratic Party [DIKO] and AKEL, always along with close cooperation between the Cyprus and Greek Governments.

Turks' Bilen Greets Congress

TA151458 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Greeting message sent by Turkish Communist Party General Secretary Bilen to the 11th KKE Congress on 12 December 1982 -- read by announcer]

[Text] Dear comrades, on behalf of Turkish communists and the country's working class, the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee sends its revolutionary militant greetings to the brotherly Communist Party of Greece [KKE] on the occasion of its 11th congress.

Your congress is convening at a decisive time from the viewpoint of defending peace, continuing the process of detente and waging the struggle for saving humanity from a nuclear war. The U.S. imperialists and NATO ringleaders are intensifying their aggression directed toward a confrontation with the socialist countries and all the progressive forces. The task of curbing this course faces the world communist movement. The Soviet Union and the socialist countries are the most reliable and strongest supporters of all the peaceful forces.

The fact that your congress coincides with the 65th anniversary of the October Revolution and the 60th anniversary of the USSR along with the resolutions of your congress to be taken in favór of regional and world peace add historic significance to this event. Your congress is also convening at a time when the process of change in your country has won the hearts of the large masses, and moves have intensified for the promotion of peace, national independence, democracy and communal development. The Greek communists are struggling hard in order to realize the process of change, to put an end to the sovereignty of local and foreign monopolies, and to provide a decent standard of living for the workers. I hope that the 11th congress of your party will be an important step in this struggle.

Under conditions of reactionary military dictatorship, intensified terror, strong pressure and aggression, our party, the Turkish communists, are currently waging a difficult struggle against the reactionaries and the military junta and dictatorship, which supports the collaborationist and monopolist bourgeoisie and has eliminated all democratic rights. This struggle is also directed against U.S. efforts to transform our country into a regional springboard and utilize the junta as a tool for implementing this aim, against the (?restricting) of all the economic, political, social and cultural rights of our working class and toiling people, and against the junta which blindly follows the Reagan policies, which trample upon our national pride and which drag our 45-million strong motherland into an abyss and adventures.

The TCP is closely bound to the KKE within the framework of Marxism-Leninism and the principles of the international proletariat. The TCP extends its best wishes of success to the 11th Congress of the KKE. Long live the Leninist and militant solidarity of the Turkish and Greek Communist Parties; long live the international proletariat.

ARAB LEAGUE'S KLIBI ARRIVES ON OFFICIAL VISIT

NC141734 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Text] The secretary general of the Arab League, Chedli Klibi, arrived on an official 3-day visit to our country this evening. He will meet with the president of the republic, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou and other government officials.

Meeting With Papandreou

NC151746 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou received Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi at the political office this morning. Hellenic Radio-Television reporter Aris Xipolitidhis reports:

[Begin recording] During his meeting with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou at noon today, Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi stated that the Arab countries feel solidarity with Greece and support the Greek Government's efforts to achieve its goals. The meeting was held at the political office in the presence of Foreign Minister Kharalambopoulos and Mr Klibi's entourage.

In receiving the Arab League secretary general, Mr Papandreou stated: [Papandreou] It gives me great joy to receive Arab League Secretary General Klibi, a personality who has made an impact on the international arena and who plays a decisive role in the developments of the Arab nation, and of course, at this particular time in the major, unsolved Middle East problem. He knows how warm and close our relations with the Arabs are. We do not receive him formally, but substantively because Greece and the Greek people truly feel very close to the Arab people. Welcome, Mr Chairman.

[Xipolitidhis] In reply to the prime minister's statement, the Arab leader said: It is a great honor for me to meet the great struggler and leader, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou. We in the Arab world follow your great struggle and know what you went through to shoulder the responsibilities you have today. On this opportunity, we would like to express the solidarity and support of the Arab countries for all your efforts to achieve the goals of social justice and prosperity for the Greek people. I would like to assure you, Mr Prime Minister, that the Arab people have great respect for you, for what you have offered and for your stand toward the just Arab claims no matter what it costs you in sacrifices and in attacks from other sides. With great pleasure I declare to you that all the Arab states are in solidarity with you, and in the name of the Arab states and Arab nations, I convey their warm brotherly greetings to you. [end recording]

LEBANESE POLITICAL CIRCLES LAUD ASSISTANCE

NC111405 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 11 Dec 82

[Text] The Papandreou government is among the very few governments which effectively contributed toward raising the Israeli siege of West Beirut by supplying the transport means for the Palestinians' departure. This was stated this morning to the ATHENS NEWS AGENCY by political circles directly related to Lebanese Prime Minister al-Wazzan, according to reports from Beirut.

The same circles added that the Lebanese Government is most certainly fully aware of this great contribution and expects that relations between the two countries will be further strengthened. The same Lebanese political circles stressed that they want to believe that in the same way the business world of friendly Greece will demonstrate an interest and will contribute with its experience and knowledge to the reconstruction of Lebanon after the destruction caused by the Israeli invasion.

Greek firms have reportedly demonstrated an interest in undertaking construction projects in the Lebanese capital.

A Greek cargo ship arrived in Beirut port yesterday and unloaded large quantities of food and health material as part of the Greek Government's economic aid to the Lebanese and Palestinian peoples. Distribution of food has already commenced under the auspices of Lebanese Government officials.

ASALA ISSUES STATEMENT ON KUWAIT AIR BOMBING

NC101652 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 10 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] Since yesterday the Athens security police have been investigating a new development in the recent bomb explosion outside the Kuwait Air offices during which one of the alleged perpetrators was killed and the other injured.

According to the police, while the injured bomber has admitted that he and his dead companion threw the bomb, an unknown person who telephoned the AGENCE-FRANCE PRESS office has alleged that the suspected bombers are members of the Armenian Secret Army for the Liberation of Armenia (ASALA) and that they were the victims of an attempted assassination by Turkish agents operating in Athens.

During the telephone call, the AGENCE-FRANCE PRESS office received the following statement from ASALA: "Our organization declares that the bomb explosion at the Kuwait Air office early on 8 December was a premeditated attempt to murder the two young ASALA members. We have remained silent until now in order to avoid any exacerbation in Greek-Turkish relations. However, since the police have exploited our silence, we are obliged to declare the truth. The two ASALA members are the victims of special commandos dispatched by Evren to murder Armenian fighters. Barely 1 month ago, Turkish agents killed the Armenian fighter Novar Sialiman in the Netherlands. We will never remain silent in the face of such acts, and all those who consciously or unconsciously plot against the Armenian people will be punished in the proper way."

PAPER: GREECE PLANS 10-MILE SEA BORDER LIMIT

NC161043 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 12 Dec 82 p 1, 14

[Nur Batur report]

[Text] Ankara, (TERCUMAN) -- It has been learned that after signing the international Law of the Sea Convention, Greece is preparing to extend its territorial waters in the Agean to 10 miles, and to achieve this, it is engaged in an intensive behind the scenes diplomatic campaign.

A high-ranking official has confirmed that Greece is engaged in such a preparation, and added: "Greece is playing with fire. Its attempt to extend its territorial waters beyond 6 miles will entail grave consequences. Such an attempt will damage Turkey's vital interests. It can by no means be accepted." This is how diplomatic circles in Ankara evaluate Greece's preparations to extend its territorial waters in the Aegean to 10 miles instead of 12. Although no country, including Turkey, recognizes Greece's airspace as being 10 miles, Greece argues that it is. Today the Greek terirtorial waters are 6 miles. However, the Law of the Sea Convention, which will come into operation when it has been signed by 60 states, entitles the nations to extend their territorial waters to a maximum of 12 miles.

According to the Chicago Conventon, a country's airspace must be equal to its territorial waters. At present, the airspace of all countries is 6 miles like their territorial waters.

With the Law of the Sea Convention coming into force, Greece may say "My airspace is 10 miles. According to the rules, I am also extending my territorial waters to 10 miles to match my airspace." Through such devious tactics, Greece may argue that it has balanced its airspace with its territorial waters and that Turkey should have nothing to say about it.

Another high-ranking official in assessing Greece's preparation said that Turkey's reaction to such an attempt would be very severe and added: "The Aegean possesses a special status. Turkey can by no means accept Greece's extension of territorial waters in the Aegean beyond 6 miles. It these waters are extended beyond 6 miles, the Aegean will become a Greek lake, a development which will run counter to Turkey's vital interests, and at the same time will prove detrimental to Turkey. Turkey has refused to sign the international Law of the Sea Convention and neither recognizes the convention nor the rules it has put forth. If Greece chooses to act in this manner -- without taking the special status in the Aegean into consideration -- it will be abusing rights, and it will be creating a serious crisis in the Aegean."

MINISTRY REPORTS GENERAL AGREEMENT WITH IMF

TA151635 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 15 (AA) -- Turkey and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) have reached agreement on all outstanding issues that were taken up in the latest round of talks held in Ankara, the Finance Ministry said Wednesday. The statement was issued to the press after Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu received the IMF delegation headed by Mr. Geoffrey Tyler.

Mr. Tyler was quoted as telling Mr. Kafaoglu that the present economic policies of Turkey enhanced Turkey's international credibility and image.

The ministry said the Fund would release the last tranche [slice] of the agreed credit next month and the remaining tranche in June 1983.

The January tranche is 100 million SDR and the last one 190 million SDR. It said the Fund was pleased with the performance of the Turkish economy and appreciated Turkey's problems in certain fields.

HUNGARY'S DEPUTY MINISTER OF TRADE IN ISTANBUL

TA131714 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 13 Dec 82

[Text] Istanbul, 13 Dec (A.A.) -- Hungary's deputy minister of trade, Ms. Selmeczi, was in Istanbul Monday at the head of a trade mission for talks with Istanbul businessmen at the local chamber of trade. Chairman of the chamber Nuh Kusculu noted Turkish goods accounted for less than one percent of Hungary's imports and called for a rise in the figure.

Ms. Selmeczi said they had come to Turkey to see Turkish products for themselves, and they were interested particularly in fresh fruit and vegetables, durable consumer goods, textiles and leatherware from Turkey. She believed the current 160 million dollar volume of trade could be expanded. Understanding was reached to hold a special "Turkish Week" featuring Turkish products, art and culture in Hungary next year.

VOTCP WARNS OF NEW AUTHORITARIAN LEGISLATION

TA140843 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 14 Dec 82

[Station commentary: "We Must Not Be Captive to the Junta Framework"]

[Excerpts] Based on its Constitution, the military junta is preparing to enact a series of new laws -- the political parties law, the election law, the press law, the state security courts law, the labor law, the trade unions law, the collective work contract law and others.

According to leaked information, the trade unions law envisages intensified state control over the trade unions. The supervision hinted at in the junta Constitution will be greatly developed and diversified. Since according to this law the workers will not be authorized to control their own activities, who will be? Officials to be appointed by the state, that is, by the junta! How can the workers trust the officials of the junta, which did not find the workers fit to conduct their own affairs? Since the workers will be powerless in the face of these officials, who will control these officials? According to the legislation being prepared, these officials or institutions will be accountable to the state or, in other words, to the head of state, to Evren -- that is to say, to one person only.

In the same way, according to the political parties law being prepared, efforts are being made to introduce articles that will allow the supervision of political activities by the parties. Here again the supervision of political activities will be carried out by the state and not by the members of political parties themselves. Who will supervise these state officials? Of course, the head of state, who has been invested with ample authority, that same person, though he has plenty of authority, is not accountable to anyone.

In brief, the junta wants to develop legislation that will allow it to implement its own authoritarian Constitution and strengthen its administration, which is under the authority of a handful of people or, rather, only one person. Thus the junta aims at preventing the people from being freely involved in political activities.

There was some strong opposition by various democratic circles against the junta Constitution before the referendum of 7 November. These efforts were not in vain, since they contributed to the formation of the current opposition against the junta Constitution. This opposition continues against the restrictions imposed by the junta Constitution and against the new legislation being prepared.

Thus, Teoman Erel, a writer of the Istanbul daily MILLIYET, is able to mock the political parties law being prepared by the junta. He points out that according to this legislation, the political parties to be established will have to struggle against the provisions of the new law that restrict their activities and the administration that will try to enforce them. Democratic writers like Mumtaz Soysal and Oktay Eksi also express their critical views on the new legislation being prepared by the junta.

All democratic circles are continuing their opposition to the new legislation. It is important that such criticism should not be confined to the constitutional framework, and must not develop the belief among the masses that if they ask for something the junta will provide it. Based on the experience of the past 2 years, the masses are already aware that their requests are never met by the junta. What the masses need is not superficial criticism of the laws as such, but criticism of the antidemocratic principles the laws represent. As long as the opposition against the new junta legislation is part of an opposition against the junta itself, this stand will contribute to the struggle being waged for the return of democracy in our country.

OFFICIAL ON U.S. CONCERN OVER TECHNOLOGY SALES

AU161333 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1133 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Michael Kerbler interview with State Secretary Ferdinand Lacina, who will visit the United States on 21 December -- live]

[Summary] [Question] Mr State Secretary, Austria has incurred the criticism of the United States over the alleged transfer of U.S.- imported technology to the USSR. You are going to visit the United States next week. Do you intend to outline the Austrian position on this issue?

[Answer] "All I can say about this is that there are no concrete indications from the United States as to which transactions are meant here. From Austria's viewpoint, the situation is such that Austrian firms are free to trade within the framework of the stipulations of the contracts they have concluded with American firms; in other words, if license agreements or agreements with affiliated companies of U.S. concerns in Austria provide for restrictions, then these firms are certainly bound by these contracts, but that is not a matter which directly concerns the Austrian state."

[Question] "Do you mean that it is impossible for Austria, or say, for the Trade Ministry, to ban exports of goods by decree to the USSR or to other East bloc countries, for example, because American components, which are contained in the so-called COCOM list, are contained in these, say, machines?"

[Answer] "Austria is not a member of the Western alliance, nor a member of any alliance, it is a neutral country. In principle, I can only repeat: if there are agreements between American and Austrian firms, then the Austrian firms are certainly committed to comply with these agreements, but for our part, we have no possibility of imposing export controls or export bans."

[Question] Mr State Secretary, what can be the reason why the Americans are now warning Austria, of all countries, against such a technology transfer to the East bloc?

[Answer] "I can say very little about the reasons which have induced the Americans to pursue this policy at this time, especially as far as the most recent statements are concerned. We have been talking with the U.S. Administration about these questions for quite some time now, and we are taking its concern very seriously, but it is known that as a neutral country, Austria must and will defend its neutral position here. Still, we certainly respect the American wish, which is conveyed to the American firms through the governments [sentence as heard] that they do not want to deliver certain products to the East. I only believe -- and we have experienced this on other occasions before -- that there have been statements about which we are certainly not very happy, and we will point it out over there. But I do not believe that these statements are representative of the opinion of the U.S. Government as a whole.

[Question] Thus you believe that the currently somewhat strained situation can be overcome?

[Answer] "Actually, I do not see any strained situation merely because some representative of the administration has deemed it necessary to make a statement. I think we should not be so sensitive in that respect. We cannot speak of strained relations yet -- it is unpleasant if there are misunderstandings resulting from such remarks, and I will certainly endeavor to hear the position of the U.S. Administration which -- it is hoped, and I am actually convinced of it -- will be different from what has been published here in the newspapers."

JOINT COMMISSION WITH HUNGARY -- The Austrian-Hungarian general joint commission held its ninth session in Vienna on 6-7 December. The Austrian delegation was headed by Ambassador Friedrich Bauer, the Hungarian one by Deputy Foreign Minister Karoly Szarka. The sides discussed the implementation of the decisions adopted at the eighth session and questions related to further deepening Austrian-Hungarian relations in various special fields. Both sides noted with satisfaction that these relations have developed successfully since the last session. "Both sides also paid special attention to the process of security and cooperation." BUNDESTAG GIVES KOHL NO-CONFIDENCE VOTE

[Excerpts] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA) -- As expected, the Bundestag today refused to give Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl a vote of confidence and thus, as planned, opened the way for a new general election to be held on 6 March.

In the roll-call vote on the chancellor's motion asking for a vote of confidence, 218 of the 474 deputies present voted "no," 8 voted "yes", and 248 abstained. There were no invalid votes.

Thus, as previously announced, the great majority of the CDU/CSU-FDP government coalition obviously abstained. The SPD Parliamentary Group announced a "solid no" vote.

Later in the day, Chancellor Helmut Kohl will see Federal President Karl Carstens and ask him to dissolve parliament. Carstens will probably announce his decision at the beginning of January.

Kohl Addresses Bundestag on Vote

DW171009 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0807 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Statement by Chancellor Helmut Kohl to the Bundestag in Bonn -- live]

[Text] Mr President, esteemed ladies and gentlemen: In the government statement of 13 March 1982, I presented the program of the Federal Government supported by the FDP, CDU and CSU and stressed our intention to hold elections on 6 March 1983 if possible. I have therefore submitted the proper motion in accordance with Article 68 of the Basic Law. Such motions have been submitted twice before in the history of the FRG; in September 1972 by Chancellor Willy Brandt with the aim of suggesting to the federal president that the Bundestag be dissolved if the motion was rejected; and in February 1982 when Chancellor Helmut Schmidt submitted such a motion to assure himself of the support of the coalition existing at that time.

Ladies and gentlemen, even if the reasons in 1972 were different, I am pursuing the aim noted by Chancellor Brandt at that time; my motion is to contribute to opening the way for new elections. I know that an intensive public discussion is going on over the application of Article 68 of the Basic Law as well as over other ways to dissolve the Bundestag during a legislative period.

After a thorough examination of all significant points of view and after talks and discussions with the chairmen of the parties and factions represented in the Bundestag, I have arrived at the conclusion that the decision I have made is in accordance with the Basic Law. Article 68 of the Basic Law provides the chancellor with the possibility of asking the Bundestag members whether a sufficient parliamentary basis exists for the continuing work of the Federal Government. I put this question to you today.

Ladies and gentlemen, I recall the agreement which the coalition parties CDU, SPD [corrects himself] CDU, FDP and SPD [corrects himself again] CDU/CSU and FDP [laughter] -- Ladies and gentlemen, that certainly was no freudian slip. [laughter, applause] I will say it once more: Which the coalition parties CDU/CSU and FDP made in September 1982. At that time, we jointly agreed in the coalition that we could not bear the responsibility for immediate elections in view of the extraordinary emergency situation then existing. There could be no delay in handling the urgent problems on which no majority could be achieved in the former government and coalition. I particularly recall the public financial situation, the economic situation, and in particular, developments on the labor market.

We had to pass the 1983 budget and the accompanying bills. We had to create clarity for our country and our partners and allies in the world regarding our future foreign policy course. Therefore, this Federal Government's mission was limited from the very beginning. We have therefore been striving from the very beginning to give the voters an opportunity to vote as soon as possible on the policy and coalition of the center, on this new policy.

Ladies and gentlemen, this primarily means that we wanted to set up an emergency program concentrated on what was urgently necessary. Second, after adopting the program, we wanted to face the voters immediately. On this basis, and according to this agreement, I was elected on 1 October 1982 as FRG chancellor. I stressed this in my government statement of 13 October 1982, and naturally, I also stand by it today.

We have implemented the first part of our agreement. First, the new coalition of the center has introduced the necessary initial steps to help improve state finances. The Bundestag adopted the budget and the related bills this week. The coalition has given the first impulses to get our economy going again and to create new jobs, particularly for the younger generation. At the same time, the Federal Government made it clear that we must -- and where we must -- accept sacrifices together with our fellow citizens to preserve the social net. We have adopted the supplementary bill on the right to conscientious objection, which has been pending for many years.

Second, the new coalition of the center has strengthened friendship with our European neighbors and our NATO partners. The Federal Government has strengthened our policy of dialogue in East-West relations and the partnership with Third World countries. Our security policy aims and our firm will to work for world peace have become particularly clear. Ladies and gentlemen, we are again a reliable and predictable partner in international politics.

Now that we have done what was most urgent, it is necessary to face the decision of the voters. [applause]

I have gained the impression in many talks that all parties represented in the Bundestag want new elections, and the overwhelming majority [applause] -- I am grateful to be applauded by you at least in this connection [applause] -- ladies and gentlemen, the overwhelming majority of our citizens also wants new elections. I am convinced that the elections we plan to hold are necessary. We are faced with extremely difficult tasks. It is important to lead our country out of the most serious economic and financial crisis since the founding of the Federal Republic.

Whether these tasks can be resolved successfully decisively depends on whether the work of the parties and factions supporting the government is backed by a firm mandate from the electorate. The necessary policy must be conceived on a long-term basis because we don't want to do piecework but lay lasting foundations as the CDU, CSU and FDP did in the early history of the FRG. [applause] We, the CDU, CSU and FDP, are prepared to again face such a difficult task at a difficult time.

We want to and must bring the state budget in line. In foreign and security policy we must continue our course of ensuring peace in freedom, even though in doing so we will have to cope with difficult conflicts [auseinandersetzungen]. We must also create lasting conditions for a more human society. Ladies and gentlemen, the present coalition partners have not yet made any comprehensive long-term decisions regarding all these problems. The coalition agreement concentrated on the priority program outlined in my government statement of 13 October 1982. It could not and cannot cover all political fields with the necessary broadness and diversity.

The necessary priority program has been fulfilled. With the fulfillment of this program, the coalition no longer has a parliamentary basis for continuing work. We now want to ask the electorate to give us a mandate for a long-term policy of the new center coalition. The coalition parties CDU, CSU and FDP are prepared in principle to cooperate again following the elections, and for the future work of the coalition parties a new parliamentary basis is necessary. This basis must be created by the voters. In addition, the must decide whether the coalition can continue its cooperation and what common content can be agreed on regarding a policy oriented toward the future and conceived on a long-term basis.

As the opposition party, the SPD also has clearly stated that it is not prepared to form a coalition and wants to hold new elections. Ladies and gentlemen, no party or faction represented in the Bundestag would suffer a disadvantage as a result of the dissolution of Parliament. If the road to new elections that I have embarked on is opposed on the grounds that the Constitution is being manipulated, this objection is entirely unfounded. [applause]

Today and in the weeks following my election as FRG chancellor, I informed you and the German public in all frankness of my considerations and I avoided everything that could have created the impression of artificiality or manipulation. The charge of manipulation, ladies and gentlemen, would be better justified if I chose the way of resignation in accordance with Article 63 of the Basic Law. Under Article 63 of the Basic Law, several unsuccessful ballots are required for opening the way to new elections. In the present situation, ladies and gentlemen, I would convince nobody if such a procedure were used to force the president to dissolve the Bundestag. [applause] I am of the view that the way I chose for the dissolution of the Bundestag is convincing and constitutional.

I again emphasize the most important aspects. The coalition needs the decision of the electorate as a basis for the necessary policy of renewal conceived on a broad and long-term basis. All parties represented in the Bundestag want new elections. There is no majority in the Bundestag prepared to elect a different government, and in their desire for new elections, the parties agree with the large majority of our people.

Ladies and gentlemen, I ask you to base your decision regarding the vote I have requested on your conscience. It is in accordance with the special nature of Article 68 of the Basic Law that I personally won't take part in the voting. Ladies and gentlemen, through our actions we will create the essential basis for the decision I want to propose to the president. [applause]

CHANCELLOR KOHL DEFENDS NATO DUAL DECISION

LD162228 Hamburg DPA in German 2137 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 16 Dec (DPA) -- Chancellor Helmut Kohl has emphatically defended the NATO dual decision, and particularly the decision on counterarming. At a final CDU rally in the Hamburg election campaign, Kohl said this evening that in the worldwide struggle for peace the FRG has a key role, for if the Germans fall, then "everyone around" would fall too. If the counterarming decision were to be rescinded, there would be no more movement, but in the U.S.-Soviet negotiations in Geveva, both sides would have to move.

Kohl said the influence of opponents of the counterarming decision was increasingly gaining ground in the SPD. The stand of former Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, who himself had a hand in the formulation of the dual decision, is only "vaguely related" to his previous attitude. Kohl called the "dream of peace without weapons" a "disastrous dream". A land without weapons is prey to the hegemony of the Soviet Union.

KOHL CONCERNED ABOUT WALESA'S DETENTION

LD161524 Hamburg DPA in German 1455 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl hopes for the immediate release of Lech Walesa if the reports that the former Polish trade union leader was rearrested on Thursday are true. Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff stressed the "extreme concern" of the federal chancellor. Kohl said he regrets that the Polish authorities have apparently "returned to their old practices." This action is all the more disappointing since the Polish Government has announced the suspension of martial law.

AL-AHRAM INTERVIEWS KOHL ON MIDEAST ISSUES

NC170840 Cairo MENA in Arabic 0640 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] Cairo, 17 Dec (MENA) -- FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl has emphasized the need for Israel to recognize the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and for the Palestinians to recognize Israel's right to existence and security. He said that reciprocal recognition constitutes a firm part of the stances of the European Community, which in turn is committed to the Venice Declaration.

In an interview he gave to Ibrahim Nafi', the chief editor of the newspaper AL-AHRAM, which was published today, Kohl said that his country supported the Palestinian people's right to self-determination in 1974. He added that the Palestinian people must determine their national identity by themselves and make a decision on the solution they want by participating in the peace process.

In the interview, the German chancellor dealt with the visit he will soon make to Israel. He said: It is useless to attempt to reach a peaceful solution without Israel's participation. We must talk with all sides. This is compatible with the views of the Arabs, who have requested that Germany exert efforts with Israel for the sake of establishing a just and peaceful solution. In this context, he referred to the relations of friendship which link his country with the Arab world and Israel alike. He added that he did not see any contradiction in this, but that confidence and balanced relations must be established and strengthened with all sides to the dispute so that we can participate in establishing peace in the Middle East.

PAPER REPORTS PERSHING DEPLOYMENT SITES

LD161948 Hamburg DPA in German 1851 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Munich 16 Dec (DPA) -- According to the Friday edition of the SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG, the 56th U.S. Artillery Brigade in Heilbronn, Neu-Ulm and Schwaebisch-Gmuend will be the sites of the American Pershing II missiles which are to be stationed on FRG territory in the event the Geneva Disarmament talks fail. The newspaper gives as its source the company documents of an American armaments manufacturer which are expressly declared to be "open", that is, not to be kept confidential, and are sent to anyone who requests them.

The Defense Ministry, which has so far refused to name the sites for reasons of secrecy, made no statement on the report on Thursday evening and would neither confirm nor deny it. Among others, the CDU politician Werner Marx and Minister of State Juergen Moellemann of the Foreign Ministry called for the sites to be named.

GOVERNMENT CONDEMNS ATTACKS ON U.S. SOLDIERS

LD161622 Hamburg DPA in German 1228 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- The federal government has strongly condemned the recent attacks on U.S. soldiers in the Federal Republic and wishes those injured a speedy recovery.

Government spokesman Diether Stolze said in Bonn today that the government learned of the attacks with horror and profound consternation. They represent "attacks on our security and defense capability." Our American friends should know that the government and the authorities will continue to do everything within their power to help protect U.S. installations, U.S. soldiers and their families. Several U.S. soldiers have been injured during the past few days in bomb attacks.

SPD OFFICIAL SAYS SOVIET OFFER 'INADEQUATE'

LD170004 Hamburg DPA in German 1430 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA) -- Today, one day after the assessment of the latest Soviet proposals in Geneva by Minister of State Alois Mertes, the SPD also described the negotiations offer as an "important step in the right direction". The Soviet proposals are, however, "not adequate", said Karsten Voight, chairman of the Foreign Policy Working Group of the SPD Bundestag group. He thus concurred with Mertes on this matter.

The Soviet Union has offered to reduce its 333 SS-20 medium-range missiles to 250, of which only 150 would be targeted at Western Europe. In response, the West has to renounce its counterarming in full. Voight recommended that the Soviet offer should be countered with the West's own ideas but even on this basis the threat to Western Europe could be considerably reduced. At the same time the SPD politician criticized the "lack of standpoint" of the new Federal Government, which has no strategy of its own. At least Minister of State Mertes had apparently briefed himself before making his statement. The government spokesman had not made a statement "so he did not receive any instructions from the chancellor" -- because advice from Washington was being awaited.

1983 BUDGET FOR DM253.2 BILLION APPROVED

LD162222 Hamburg DPA in German 1716 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA) -- In a roll call vote this evening, the Bundestag passed the 1983 budget in spite of SPD opposition. After a 3-day debate, which was partly influenced by the forthcoming elections, 266 deputies of the CDU/CSU and FDP voted for the budget, which envisages expenditures next year of DM253.2 billion, an increase of 2.8 percent compared with this year. Of those deputies fully entitled to vote, 480 did so; 210 voted against and 4 abstained.

The government's plan to invest DM33.3 billion means increasing its net borrowing requirement to DM40.9 billion, that is, about 3 percent more than this year.

TELEPHONE CONNECTIONS WITH GDR -- Bonn -- Since yesterday, 120 new telephone lines have been in operation between the FRG and the "GDR." Some 72 new lines from FRG territory and 48 from the western sectors of Berlin are connected with the "GDR" and East Berlin. [Text] [Bonn DIE WELT in German 16 Dec 82 p 1 DW]

GDR POSTAGE DEMAND -- Hamburg, 11 Dec (DPA) -- According to BILD AM SONNTAG, the GDR wants to increase the lump sum paid by the Federal Republic for postal services from the present DM85 million to DM430 million beginning in 1983. The paper states that the Federal Postal Ministry has strongly rejected East Berlin's demand. Since 1973, Bonn has been paying the GDR a lump sum of DM85 million by way of making up the difference in costs in postage between the two Germanies. This 5-year old agreement is due to expire at the end of 1982. [Text] [Hamburg DPA in German 1721 GMT 11 Dec 82 LD]

MITTERRAND, MAUROY SLIP IN POPULARITY RATINGS

LD162338 Paris Domestic Service in French 2300 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Francois Mitterrand's and Pierre Mauroy's popularity ratings have taken another slide, according to an IDOP poll published this morning by FRANCE-SOIR. A total of 37 percent of the French people are satisfied with President Mitterrand, who thus loses 6 points, and 46 percent are dissatisfied.

As for Pierre Mauroy, 33 percent are satisifed with him, and he thus loses 4 points.

COMMENTATOR ON POLISH MARTIAL LAW SUSPENSION

PM141201 Paris LE FIGARO in French 15 Dec 82 p 4

[Bernard Margueritte dispatch: "Jaruzelski Has Been Unable To Break Down the Poles' Hostility"]

[Text] Warsaw -- In early December 1981 General Jaruzelski took the final decision to introduce martial law. What were his objectives at that time?

The main avowed and unavowed goals of the general and his friends were as follows:

-- to prevent a Warsaw Pact intervention planned as the ultimate step during the bloc leaders' meeting in Moscow on 5 December 1980. The aim was to safeguard Poland's existence as a state;

-- to put an end to total economic bankruptcy, the state's disintegration and anarchy, and to prevent civil war;

-- to regain firm control of the situation;

-- to resume a policy of national accord among all those who accept socialism and of controlled structural reforms under the government's leadership;

-- to prevent the party being taken over by the "hardliners" who were becoming increasingly aggressive and to prepare for demonstrations in Warsaw on 17 December; and

-- to eliminate any possibility, however small, of a direct accord between the Soviets and the Polish opposition. Moreover, direct contacts had been established in Gdansk at that time, the Soviets probably trying to increase their pressure on the party leaders in that way.

Which of these objectives have been attained after 1 year of martial law? Some of them clearly have: Foreign intervention and civil war have been prevented. The party "hardliners" seem to have been placed out of harm's way, even if they still have considerable influence and are still hampering the government's action.

Aside from that, it seems possible to make the following observations:

1 -- The government has regained control of the situation: The repression has enabled the authorities to regain control of the situation externally and physically. But the general knows full well that the calm is merely apparent. As Catholic Deputy Zablocki said when addressing the Sejm Monday: "Active resistance is becoming passive resistance. There is still a long way to go between that and confidence in the government and readiness to cooperate with it."

The vast majority of the Polish population is still hostile to the government and loyal to Solidarity.

2 -- The economic collapse has been halted, but the recovery is slow in coming: Martial law has ended anarchy and the strikes. But although it has stemmed the bleeding, it has not made it possible to cure the patient. The workers are working without enthusiasm, absences for alleged sickness are even higher than during stoppages for strikes in 1981; inflation continues since, out of political concerns, the government has given the workers higher wage increases than those obtained under Solidarity pressure the previous year.

In addition, martial law, centralized and militarized, has prevented any real reform and has sparked off Western economic sanctions which have increased the stagnation.

A Deeper Gulf

1 -- The process of national reconciliation has collapsed and the reforms are failing: In these spheres, the consequences of martial law have been disastrous. Let us cite Mr Zablocki again: "During this year when, in keeping with the nature of martial law, the citizens' rights have been reduced and the normal mechanisms of dialogue have been destroyed, the gulf between the population and the government has grown deeper. And moreover, "the feeling of the alienated nature of the government has spread in broad sections of the country."

The state has thus escaped anarchy but at the same time has been weakened by the fact that an increasing number of citizens have stopped identifying with it. This, the clandestine opposition magazine KRAG writes, may lead to a situation in which the nation will dissociate itself so much from the state that depriving it of that state could prove to be an easy operation.

The real partners for dialogue, especially Solidarity, have been eliminated. In these conditions, reconciliacion and national accord are more remote than ever. On this point, KRAG writes: "Before 13 December (1981), accord was difficult to achieve, but such a possibility actually existed. This was a great opportunity which, although it has not been completely wasted, is at least in mortal danger." As regards the reforms started in specific spheres, especially in the economy, they have been seen to be ineffective in the militarized and centralized martial law system and to be a trap when there is no confidence between the government and the governed.

Thus, it is easy to understand why General Jaruzelski has now decided to suspend martial law. The awareness of having the situation under control was certainly important. The date 10 November was decisive: The failure of Solidarity's strike call gave the government the apparent success it was waiting for and enabled it to abandon martial law while saving face with the conviction that there were no longer any serious risks.

But at the same time, the general is well aware that the Polish state is ungovernable in martial law conditions. The country's resistance has, in fact, proved to be an insurmountable obstacle. The government realizes that without the population's participation, there is no chance of steering Poland out of chaos and stagnation. Therefore, the suspension of martial law is also a tribute to the opposition's firmness.

LE MONDE ON MAUROY, JOBERT KUALA LUMPUR TALKS

[Alain Rollat dispatch: "Kuala Lumpur Government Says It Is Prepared To Increase Cooperation With France"]

[Text] Kuala Lumpur -- the Malaysian capital has been a vast construction site for several years. New blocks continue to proliferate all around the old (Jame) Mosque. A new international metropolis has been born and is constantly growing. Although lower than it was, the Malaysian growth rate is still higher than 5 percent per year. That is bound to attract [French Premier] Pierre Mauroy, who said in Reunion 4 days ago that he was "dreaming" of a 3-percent growth rate for France.

It is not surprising that the Malaysian leaders should currently be among the most courted in Southeast Asia. Indeed, their country is one of the most promising in this region of the world for potential investors. Not only is Malaysia one of the most promising countries in this region of the world, not only is it one of the main producers of raw materials (tin, silver, rubber, timber), with a strong currency, but it is one of the most solvent countries on the road to industrialization and, unlike its principle neighbors, its population front is calm because it has less than 15 million inhabitants. The French economy has everything to gain from attempting to establish a bridgehead there. This is the objective of Mr Mauroy's visit.

The premier and the French delegation had an initial series of exchanges of views with the Malaysian leaders Monday, 13 December. Mr Mauroy and Foreign Trade Minister Jobert first discussed the international situation during a limited working session with Prime Minister Mohamed Mahathir and Deputy Prime Minister Hitam Musa. The government chief explained to his host that after 20 years' absence, France wishes to rebalance its foreign policy toward Southeast Asia, as has already been demonstrated by Mr Mitterrand's successive visits to Japan and India. He reaffirmed France's support for Malaysia's nonaligned policy and stressed the areas of agreement between the two countries, especially as regards the conflicts affecting this part of Asia.

When proposing a toast at the end of the day, Mr Mauroy said: "Our two countries are anxious to help reduce tension. We have been forced to adopt firm positions primarily to condemn the occupation of any country in the world by foreign troops. And, to be more specific, I will mention Afghanistan and Kampuchea. We will not stop demanding the implementation of the UN resolutions demanding withdrawal from territories occupied by force and illegally.

"We want the formation of a zone of peace, freedom and neutrality for this Southeast Asia region. However, such a development can only be obtained through sustained dialogue among all parties. France is prepared to make its contribution to that when the time comes."

Nonetheless, France and Malaysia have different assessments of the Kampuchean question. Paris stands by its doctrine -- France recognizes states, not governments -- whereas Kuala Lumpur unreservedly supports the opponents of the pro-Vietnamese regime in Phnom Penh and advocates a referendum organized by the United Nations to enable the Kampuchean population to freely determine its future.

Mr Mahathir said in reply to Mr Mauroy that his government particularly wants to increase its cooperation with France since it is feeling the pressure from its big Chinese and Japanese neigbors. "France is respected in all countries of the region," he stated. Mr Mahathir also expressed his concern at the resurgence of protectionism resulting from the economic battle between the United States, Japan and the EEC countries.

In particular, he regretted the fact that France is now demanding that all import documents reaching its border be written in French.

Mr Mauroy explained that of all the industrialized countries, France is the one which "imports most from the Third World countries in proportion to its trade and its economic potential" and "the only one never to have adopted nontariff protectionist measures."

During the wider exchanges of views which followed these talks, Mr Jobert particularly stressed the different projects for which French companies have made proposals and are awaiting budget decisions from Kuala Lumpur. In particular, the Malaysian Government is due to give its verdict during the first 6 months of 1983 on the purchase of 200 locomotives and 400 cars (Fr600 million), on a plan to develop the north-south railroads and to construct an east-west railroad (several billion francs), on the construction of 6 hospitals (Fr500 million) and on the installation of a thermal power station (Fr1.1 billion). As regards the construction programs, one contract was already signed on Friday, 10 December, for the construction of 4,400 apartments by the general electricity company.

The French enterprises are also interested in other short-term projects which will require decisions before the end of 1983. In particular, they concern the construction of a gas treatment factor in (Kerth) (Fr1.2 billion), a refinery in Malacca (nearly Fr3 billion), a steelwords (fr3.5 billion), a pulp factory, and winning the deal to organize urban transport in the capital. It is a total of around Fr10 billion which is at stake in all the short-term projects in which France hopes to play a part.

FANFANI GOVERNMENT GETS CONFIDENCE VOTE

AU161554 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 16 -- The new four-party government led by Christian Democrat Premier Amintore Fanfani came through its second vote of confidence in Parliament today, following the ballot taken in the Senate Saturday. The cabinet is a coalition of Fanfani's Christian Democrats, the third ranking Socialist Party and the two minor Social Democrat and Liberal Parties. The Republicans, whose secretary led the two preceeding Rome governments, did not join the new coalition and abstained in the vote held in the lower house this afternoon.

Senate Elects New Vice President

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 17 -- The Italian Senate Wednesday elected the Socialist Alberto Cipellini as its new vice president. The senators then approved a bill regulating state funding of tourist agencies involved in research and staff training activities. It was also decided that from now on daylight savings time will begin and end in Italy each year at dates set by presidential decree.

BULGARIA LINKED TO DRUGS-ARMS DEALING RING

AU161210 Rome ANSA in English 0810 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Trento, December 16 -- A total of 214 people have been arrested in connection with the massive drugs and arms trafficking ring uncovered recently in northern Italy. Investigators here confirmed Wednesday that Turkish national Seifi Sewke was arrested yesterday in Trieste and Syrian Nour al Din Vakkas was arrested in Athens.

The ring, uncovered by Trento Magistrate Carlo Palermo after two years of investigations, is believed to be the biggest ever uncovered in Europe. Investigators believe Middle East drug traffickers, international terrorists, Sicilian mafia bosses and Turkish organized crime leaders met in Sofia and [word indistinct] drugs as payment to buy and resell heavy weapons, including helicopters and artillery.

Syrian Henri Arsan, arrested two weeks ago in Milan, is suspected of being the boss of the entire racket.

It was learned here Thursday that Nour al Din Vakkas is the brother of Abdu Salah al Din Vakkas, arrested early this year in Athens and suspected of having attended a "summit" meeting of arms traffickers held in Sofia in January 1981.

Another suspect arrested two weeks ago is Renato Gamba, owner of an arms factory. Gamba's name has been linked with the discovery Tuesday night of a massive arms cache near Milan's Malpensa Airport. The shipment was sent from the United States to Gamba.

BULGARIAN TIE TO MORO SLAYING TO BE PROBED

AU161738 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Excerpts] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 16 -- Italian investigators will probe a possible tie in between the spring 1978 kidnapping and killing of Aldo Moro, a former premier and the chairman of the Christian Democrat Party at the time, by Red Brigades Terrorists and the mushrooming Bulgarian connection allegedly involved in the attempt on the life of the pope last year and political violence in Italy, according to new speculation in the nation's press today.

IL GIORNALE NUOVO said today that, "One of the many initiatives to be undertaken by investigaters will be to pin down the names of diplomats or officials in Eastern European embassies here, especially in the Bulgarian Embassy, who owned or rented homes on the seaside near Rome".

The account then pointed out that, "the mystery of the sand found in the cuffs of the trousers Moro was wearing at the time of his death now returns as a very pertinent issue". When Moro's body was found, investigators speculated that the sand had been planted in the cuffs by his Brigade captors to provide police with a false trail, the daily recalled.

LA REPUBBLICA, a left-of-center Rome paper, told readers today that it learned from Rome judiciary sources that keys for an apartment in Prague were found in a house in Torvaiancia (a town on the coast near Rome, Ed) used by the Red Brigades, keys which belonged to Red Brigades leader Mario Moretti". [quote marks as received] The account said that investigators arrived at this finding thanks to statements made by terrorists who had turned states evidence.

LA STAMPA of Turin recalled rumors which made the rounds in the period Moro was held by the Brigades to the effect that he was confined either in an embassy in Rome or in a villa on the Rome coast. The paper said that the work of the investigators in this area will be "complex and might turn out unproductive but it is still seen as necessary".

IL MESSAGGERO of Rome, on the other hand, sought to deflate billowing speculation and urged that "there is the risk that the big smoke screen thrown up by spies will hide the truth".

FANFANI, CRAXI ON SOFIA TIES; ENVOY EXTENDS STAY

AU162055 Rome ANSA in English 1940 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 16 -- The Italian foreign, defense, interior and justice ministers will be on hand to answer questions when Parliament begins a debate Monday on the mounting Bulgarian connection in what is believed to be a broad conspiracy to destabilize Italy. Prime Minister Amintore Fanfani announced the presence of the four ministers at the debate today during the lower house confidence debate.

Fanfani also announced that he has instructed the Italian ambassador to Sofia, who was summoned back to Rome Saturday, to prolong his stay in Italy.

"The gravity of the problem does not escape us", Fanfani asserted, "But the awareness of a connection between the judicial aspect of the affair with the problem of internal security of with international links obliges us to not yield to impulse".

The prime minister added that his government is soliciting "severe controls by the judiciary, the parliamentary inquiry commission into the Moro slaying, the Propaganda-2 secret lodge and terrorism".

Socialist Party Secretary Bettino Craxi termed Fanfani's "a correct stance", adding that Italy and Bulgaria are moving towards a "freeze in relations" which does not necessarily imply "an irreversible break". Craxi observed that in such situation one must proceed "gradually".

A few days ago, in an article appearing in the Socialist Party mouthpiece L'AVANTI, Craxi had come out in favor of an immediate break in diplomatic relations with Bulgaria.

BULGARIAN AIRLINE IN ROME ISSUES COMMUNIQUE

AU170904 Rome ANSA in English 0822 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 17 -- Balkan Air last night issued a communique labelling "unjust" and "slanderous" reports in various Italian newspapers to the effect that the Bulgarian national airline was involved in the plot to assassinate the pope.

The office has not violated any law of the Italian Republic the communique stated.

A Balkan Air official in Rome, Sergey Ivanov Antonov, was arrested on November 25 for suspected complicity in the shooting of John Paul II.

Since Antonov's arrest there has been growing suspicion here that the Bulgarian secret service played a fundamental role in organizing the attempted assassination of the pope.

Antonov Lawyers To Bring New Evidence

AU170940 Rome ANSA in English 0804 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 17 -- Defense lawyers for Bulgarian citizen Sergey Ivanov Antonov will bring new evidence before Judge Ilario Martella who is heading the investigation into the attempted assassination of the pope last year, and will call for the immediate release of their client, it was learned here today. Antonov, an official with the Balkan airlines office in Rome, was arrested [word indistinct] on November 25 on suspicion of complicity in the shooting of John Paul II on May 13, 1981.

Antonov's lawyers apparently have found a colleague at Balkan Air who will testify that he was in the office at the time Turkish gunman Mehmet Ali Agca opened fire on the pope in St. Peter's Square. (Agca is serving a life term in Italy for the crime).

On Monday, the Chamber of Deputies will debate charges that the Bulgarian secret services were involved in the assassination plot. The deputies will hear reports from the defense, foreign affairs, justice and interior ministers on the latest developments in the investigation.

Meanwhile, the Rome's district attorney last night opened a probe into press leaks having to do with Agca's alleged accomplices.

ITALIANS HELD IN BULGARIA FACE TRIAL 22 DEC

AU170909 Rome ANSA in English 0816 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Florence, December 17 -- Two Italians arrested in Bulgaria in August on charges of spying will be brought to trial on December 22, their lawyer reported here.

The lawyer, Rodolfo Lena, said he would be leaving for Bulgaria in a few days and that although he had spoken over the telephone to the lawyer in Sofia Dragomir Stavkov. he was unable to learn the basis of the accusations against Paolo Farsetti and Gabriella Trevisin.

VATICAN WILL NOT QUIT CSCE OVER BULGARIA DISPUTE

AU151950 Rome ANSA in English 1910 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Excerpt] (ANSA) Madrid, December 15 -- A spokesman for the Vatican delegation to the Madrid Conference on European Security and Cooperation [CSCE] today denied rumors that the Holy See was thinking of pulling out the sessions here to protest Bulgaria's possible hand in the attempt to assassinate the pope last year.

If Bulgaria proved to be implicated in the assassination bid, the matter would reflect negatively on bilateral relations between the Holy See and Sofia but would be no reason to abandon the Madrid conference, the spokesman emphasized.

DALLA CHIESA MURDER SUSPECT TO BE RELEASED

AU161200 Rome ANSA in English 0808 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Palermo, December 16 -- Nicola Alvaro, the mafia suspect in jail since October 5 on charges of having been the hit man who killed Palermo Prefect Carlo Alberto Dalla Chiesa, his young wife and bodygard, will soon be released for "lack of evidence".

The decision was reached Thursday by investigating Magistrate Giovanni Falcone, who heads the probe into the Dalla Chiesa murder September 3.

Alvaro's release is a direct result of the arrest for perjury of the man who had been touted as the prosecution's key witness, Giuseppe Spinoni, who had identified Alvaro (a former cell mate) and the Catania mafia clan of Benedetto "Nitto" Santapaola as the hitman and masterminds of the Dalla Chiesa ambush.

The false witness was questioned by Falcone Thursday. It has been learned that prosecutors have asked for psychiatric tests of Spinoni, who has in the past repeatedly reported to authorities his suspicions about alleged killers and kidnappers.

BALSEMAO DISCUSSES U.S. AID WITH REAGAN

LD170006 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] In Washington today, Pinto Balsemao and Ronald Reagan examined the possibility of U.S. military aid to Portugal being raised from $65 million to $90 million. At the same time, preliminary negotiations began with the United States on the use of military bases on the Portuguese mainland for refueling the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force -- this in addition to the ongoing negotiations on renewing the agreement on the Lajes Airbase in the Azores. According to Balsemao, there are no problems in these discussions.

Also, according to the Portuguese prime minister, who met today with the U.S. secretary of defense, the possibility has not been ruled out of our government agreeing to the request of Lebanese President Amin al-Jumayyil for Portuguese troops to take part in a multinational peace-keeping force in Lebanon. The reply might be affirmative, Pinto Balsemao said, if a series of difficulties connected with the costs of our participation are solved in the meantime.

Urges U.S. Investments

[Text] Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao today called for U.S. investment in Portugal and assured businessmen that in terms of legislation and the movement of capital, everything is free and open. Balsemao met leading officials of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce at the end of his 2-day visit to Washington. We need technology and job-creating investments, the prime minister said in a television interview. Pinto Balsemao is expected in Lisbon at 0600 tomorrow.

LAW ON NATIONAL DEFENSE, ARMED FORCES IN FORCE

LD162324 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Excerpts] The law on national defense and the armed forces came into force today. The date is being marked at a public ceremony currently being held at the Armed Forces' General Staff attended among others by Minister of Defense Freitas do Amaral and Chief of the Armed Forces' General Staff Gen Melo Egidio.

With the coming into force of the law on national defense and the armed forces, the system regulating the functioning of the military undergoes substantial changes. From today, the armed forces come under the direct administration of the state through the Ministry of National Defense as follows: The president of the republic, the government, the Supreme Council of National Defense and the Supreme Military Council.

Under the terms of the new law, the armed forces ensure -- in keeping with the Constitution and legislation currently in force -- the carrying out of the military component of national defense. Their general mission is the country's military defense against any outside threat or aggression.

From today, the government has 5 days in which to propose to the president of the republic the retention or replacement of the present military chiefs. In order to take this decision, the government will hold a plenary meeting on Tuesday. On Monday, the prime minister and the minister of defense will receive in separate audiences the chiefs of staff of the three services of the armed forces.

Army Chief, Defense Minister Comment

LD162348 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Excerpts] The law on national defense came into force today. Here is a report by Helder Fernando from the Armed Forces' General Staff on the ceremony marking the events:

Gen Melo Egisio, chief of the Armed Forces' General Staff, was first to speak. He said the new law on national defense intorduces substantial changes into the organization and functioning of the armed forces.

[Begin Egidio recording] Under the terms of the new law, wider powers with regard to the armed forces are now ascribed to the organ of sovereignty emobdied in the government in the person of the minister of defense. From now on, the minister of defense is politically responsible for the formulation and execution of the military component of national defense policy, in addition to other jurisdictions over the armed forces which without a doubt constitute an important [words indistinct]. [end recording]

Defense Minister Freitas do Amaral spoke next. He took the view that today is the day when the transition period -- which started in 1974 -- has really come to an end.

[Begin Amaral recording] Implementation of the law on national defense and on the armed forces, which the government intends to effect with the necessary caution, entails a whole series of decisions, new concepts and new bills which will require a particularly intense effort by the appropriate bodies. [end recording]

With regard to the external component of the country's defense policy, Freitas do Amaral emphasized greater participation by Portugal in NATO; the speeding up negotiations on foreign aid to Portugal -- notably by the United States and the FRG; the development and intensification -- with in limits imposed by the financial resources available -- of military cooperation with those Portuguese-speaking African countries wishing such cooperation; the definition of a policy on exports of arms and ammunitions, including tighter monitoring of the observance of conditions and embargoes imppsed by the Portuguese authorities. Finally, Freitas do Amaral spoke about the government's new responsibilities in light of the new law on national defense and the armed forces:

[Begin Amaral recording] For us, these responsibilities will be neither greater nor heavier than in any other NATO country, but the special circumstances of our recent past advise us to proceed with particular caution. Nonpartisanship, which the Constitution demands from the armed forces, must be matched by the organs of civil power refraining from any political or partisan manipulation of the military. [end recording]

DENMARK

DEFENSE SAVINGS TO TOTAL 320 MILLION KRONER

PM161531 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 11 Dec 82 p 16

["B.J." report: "Defense Savings Agreement Reached"]

[Text] The Social Democratic Folketing group and the Folketing groups of the four government parties have now approved the agreement between the government and the Social Democrats on defense savings totaling 320 million kroner -- 140 million in 1983 and 180 million in 1984.

The actual shape of cuts in the defense services will now be left with the special 11-man committee which monitors the defense agreements. The committee is comprised of Defense Minister Hans Engell and representatives of the Social Democrats, Liberals, Conservatives, Center Democrats and Christian People's Party.

The agreement was reached on the assumption that the savings will be made in such a way as to have the least effect on the defense forces' efficiency and be carried out in such a way as to avoid job losses.

The Social Democratic members of the 11-man committee will produce a comprehensive catalog of possible savings, and the possibility has not been ruled out that savings in 1984 could go above the agreed figure of 180 million kroner.

For 1984 in particular, the major burden of savings is expected to fall on the defense forces' materiel purchases. The Social Democrats are especially concerned that the cuts could affect Denmark's fisheries inspection program.

The defense savings could hit the contruction program for replacements for the Navy's submarines, which will require investments of between 3 and 5 billion kroner over a number of years.

The Social Democrats had originally proposed savings next year of 200 million kroner and of 400 million in 1984. "We considered it important that we reach agreement with the other political parties which traditionally support defense legislation and therefore agreed to a fugure of 320 million kroner," Social Democratic Folketing Group Deputy Chairman Ritt Bjerregaard said after the group had approved the agreement.

As well as the agreement for savings totalling 320 million kroner, the agreement with the government also contains a passage which states that the special 11-man committee will also look into the possibility of further defense savings in 1984, Ritt Bjerregaard said.

HUFVUDSTADSBLADET ON TIKHONOV'S VISIT

PM161637 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 12 Dec 82 p 4

[Jan-Magnus Jansson editorial: "A New Bridge Built"]

[Text] If you ask what was the most important aspect of Chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers Nikolay Tikhonov's visit to Finland last week there comes the natural answer: It was a new bridge built between Finland and the Soviet Union at the highest government level.

In fact, 5 years have passed since a Soviet Government head paid an official visit (then described as a "friendship visit") to Finland -- the year was 1977 and the visitor was Aleksey Kosygin, who also paid his respects a little later that same year on the 60th anniversary of Finland's independence. In that same year, Tikhonov, then first deputy prime minister, also visited Finland.

As everyone knows, Kosygin was the man among the Soviet elite who took a special interest in relations with Finland, while Brezhnev concentrated on global political questions. It is difficult to assess the extent to which Tikhonov -- who now has not only the same official position as Kosygin had, but also the same involvement in administrative and economic questions and the same matter-of-fact air of a businessman -- will also come to carry the responsibility for Finnish-Soviet relations. It is possible that the Soviet Union's top man, Yuriy Andropov, because of his special knowledge of Finland and the problems of the northwest Soviet Union, will leave his mark more indelibly than his predecessor on the treatment of relations with Finland. However, as yet we know nothing for sure about this.

Not only Tikhonov, but also his retinue during the visit deserve attention. It contained First Deputy Foreign Minister V.F. Maltsev, a former Helsinki ambassador, in other words, a man who really knows Finland. Another noteworthy name is that of First Deputy Foreign Trade Minister N.D. Komarov, Nikolay Patrolichev's closest man. It can be noted here that Patrolichev himself arrives in Helsinki today to sign the protocol for next year's trade exchanges. Since it is known that Patrolichev's health is shaky, the visit is a remarkable gesture by a man who, without phrase-making, can be described as an active and durable friend to Finland.

Because of historical circumstances, people in Finland have been in the habit of associating meetings at the highest level between Finnish and Soviet leaders with spectacular events and announcements and decisions on important questions of detail. Such an assumption is no longer justified. Our political relations with the Soviet Union flow along such regular channels that controversial news is a rarity, and the detailed implementation of plans for economic relations is the province of expert bodies or is looked after directly between Finnish firms and their corresponding Soviet organizations. The two governments' function almost seems to be to discuss the situation in general terms, compare views, draw up general guidelines for economic cooperation and leave the rest to the experts, as well as to concentrate on creating the sort of personal contacts which could be of use in future situations.

After the visit, a very detailed communique, confirming the stable elements in Finnish-Soviet relations was published.

Here we must be allowed to reiterate our hope that attempts will be made to halt the trend toward ever-longer communiques (and not only those which deal with Finnish-Soviet relations). It is almost impossible for the general public to make such long and detailed texts come alive.

The political section of the communique confirmed the continued good relations between Finland and the Soviet Union unaffected by the personnel changes; the statement on Finnish policy, which is traditionally given a close reading in Finland, is exactly the same as those in communiques texts of the last few years. The areas where Finland's and the Soviet Union's views of world politics coincide are mentioned tactfully and precisely, such as disarmament and international tension, the Madrid conference and the conditions under which the United Nations has to work. On the subject of the Nordic nuclear-free zone, the communique notes the Soviet Union's positive attitude.

Bearing in mind that 1983 -- when NATO could realize its decision for the deployment of new medium-range missiles in Europe -- will, it is generally feared, be a troubled year for foreign policy, it is of course good that the present communique should help to preserve the fruits achieved so far in Finnish-Soviet relations.

As far as the important trade relations between the two countries are concerned, it seems as if the meeting was more of a survey of current problems rather than an attempt to arrive at final solutions. The numerous references to the joint long-term program up to 1995 are especially striking. The program is a large umbrella under which there is room for statements on ship and machinery deliveries, oil and natural gas, nuclear power stations and so on -- all things which might be expected to affect the balance of trade. However, a special question in the foreground is the construction of extentions to the natural gas network, on which subject the communique noted that concrete talks on an extension of the gas pipeline on the Finnish side have begun.

However, the general tone of the economic section of the communique is what is most important. The communique's signatories expressly stress that they are striving to keep trade at its present high level. This is natural, but from the point of view of Finnish firms, it is important that this is the course adopted rather than the reduction of the level of Finnish exports, which theoretically is another alternative to bring about balance.

Among the visit's other good signs was the tone in the friendly, but jargonless and concrete speech which Tikhonov made at the president's dinner on Thursday [9 December]. The statement that relations between countries must amount to more than words and emotional outbursts and that the tradition from the days of Brezhnev and Kekkonen belongs "not only to the past, but also to the present" in the relations between the two countries has been noted.

Tikhonov described the relations between Finland and the Soviet Union as a laboratory for new forms of cooperation. Bearing in mind the world situation, we should be thankful that such a laboratory exists. It is tempting to say that the relationship between Finland and the Soviet Union is something of a miracle in today's world. Nevertheless, "miracle" is not the right word because it points to fortunate circumstances beyond the control of those involved, or even to the intervention of supernatural powers. No, the good relations between Finland and the Soviet Union have come about as a result of people's rational, farsighted and politically broadminded activities in the two countries.

BRIEFS

SOVIET TUG CREW RESCUED -- A Finnish sea rescue helicopter this morning picked up the crew of a Soviet tug which had gone aground in the eastern part of the Gulf of Finland. The three officers of the tug, the Pluton, stayed on board the tug, however. The Soviet tug went aground yesterday evening south of Haapasaari Island. The vessel got stuck in the shallows and was in danger of breaking up in the severe storm. The tug had a crew of 11 men. During the night it was not possible to take any rescue action because of the strong winds, gusting at times up to 33 meters per second, and a snow storm. DENKTAS REJECTS PROTEST OF SEA 'VIOLATIONS'

[Text] Lefkosa [Nicosia] -- Head of state Rauf Denktas has warned the Greek Cypriot administration once again, saying: "It is the Turkish Cypriot people living on these lands and the responsible government which it has chosen of its own free will that are responsible for the land, sea and airspace of the TFSC."

Commenting yesterday on the complaint lodged by the Greek Cypriot administration with the United Nations against Turkish warships calling at Morphou Bay and on the speech delivered by Greek Cypriot Andreas Iakovidhis at the conference of the law of the sea, head of state Denktas once again stressed that Turkey was the sole protector of the Turkish community in Cyprus.

Describing the Greek Cypriot complaint to the United Nations on the visit of the Turkish warships to Morphou Bay as ludicrous," Dentkas continued: "Our fatherland is the sole protector and guarantor of our existence, security and freedom in Cyprus. It is legitimately safeguarding, and will continue to safeguard, our territorial waters with its ships, our airspace with its planes, and our borders with its troops. We deem it useful to repeat that the Greek Cypriots' authority does not stretch as far as Morphou Bay or over the territorial waters of the TFSC. Their allegations that this is an intervention is inappropriate and their complaint to the United Nations is ludicrous."

Referring to the law of the sea conference, head of state Denktas stressed that the statements made by the Greek Cypriot administration in southern Cyprus regarding the coasts of northern Cyprus are invalid. He added that what a Greek Cypriot had to say at such a conference is [not] binding on the TFSC.

Head of state Denktas went on: "No Greek Cypriot authority can conduct business regarding Cyprus without the consent and participation of the Turkish Cypriots.

This is what the 1960 agreements and the Constitution stipulates. The Greek Cypriots should know that subsequent developments and realities have not changed this Constitution. Decisions taken without the participation of the Turkish Cypriots cannot by any means be binding on the entire island. They are not binding on the TFSC at all." Addressing the UN law of the sea conference at Montego on behalf of the Greek Cypriot administration, Andreas Iakovidhis said that "Cyprus, which had extended its territorial waters to 12 miles in 1964, is pleased to see that this practice is now being consolidated."

Turkey, the United States, Israel and Venezuela have stated that they will not approve of the outcome of this conference.

ROMANIA HOLDS BUSINESSMAN; REPRISALS THREATENED

[Text] The government may soon be pressed into freezing all imports from Romania, following the detention of a Cyprus businessman, whom authorities say is being kept as a "hostage".

Fresh moves in the row over Mr Andreas Kaisis were made yesterday by the Cyprus Chamber of Commerce and the Federation of Employers, who said his detention "may lead to the painful demand for freezing imports, something which will be a blow to bilateral trade relations".

Mr Kaisis, chairman of the car manufacturing concern KMC Motors (Kaisis Motor Corporation), went to Bucharest a month ago today. His company said he had been pressed into signing an acceptance of what he owes, but the Romanians refused to commit themselves about what he claims for faulty deliveries and shortages.

The chamber has made direct appeals to both the Romanian Trade Ministry and the Romanian Chamber of Commerce. Until yesterday there were no new developments, and the government spokesman said every effort was being made to secure the man's release and repatriation. It says in its statement that holding Mr Kaisis is contrary to human rights principles and the ethics of international trade, and any differences could be settled through free negotiations.

The employers federation said that even if Romania had justice on its side, its actions were a blatant violation of human rights of a Cypriot citizen.

Romania exported 4 million Cyprus pounds to Cyprus during the first nine months of this year, while Cyprus exported only 330,000 Cyprus pounds. The chamber says that provided Mr Kaisis is allowed to leave, it will place its good offices at the disposal of the parties to help settle the dispute.

In its statement the federation appeals to the Romanian authorities to show respect for human rights and the feeling of the Cypriots, and seek a settlement through the legitimate and internationally accepted means.

PAPER: ARMENIAN MOVEMENT SEEKS GREEK SUPPORT

NC171004 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 17 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] The Armenian Popular Movement has called on all Greeks to stand at the side of the Armenian people in a joint front against fascism and occupation.

In its statement, the movement denounces the fascists in Ankara for implementing a satanic plan to annihilate the Armenian resistance. The statement further refers to the current anti-Armenian hysteria of the Denktas regime, which is aimed at isolating the Armenians from their natural allies among the people. The statement also denounces the criminal, dictatorial Evren regime, which, encouraged by the Zionists and Begin, who remain unpunished, is provoking and murdering Armenians.

-- In the Netherlands it murdered the Armenian patriot, intellectual Noubar Yialiman, publisher of the newspaper PAIKAR.
-- It attempted to murder two cadres of the Armenian Popular Revolutionary Movement in Athens.
-- It tried to connect the issue with that of the Arabs in order to cause problems between the Arabs and Armenians.

In conclusion, the statement declares the Armenian people's unshakeable decision to continue the struggle until their return to Turkish-occupied Armenia.

TURKISH OFFICIAL ON MISSING PERSONS ISSUE

TA151145 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1030 GMT 15 Dec 82

[Text] Dr Latife Birgen, the Turkish Cypriot representative at the Joint Missing Persons Committee, has said that the draft resolution submitted by the Greek Cypriot side to the UN Third Committee in a bid to eliminate the existing committee and form a new body to deal with this issue was not well received and suffered substantive amendments in the UN committee. Birgen said that the UN Third Committee resolution stated that the joint committee was the only body that could solve the missing persons problem. She added that the last resolution of the Third Committee, but on the contrary, called for the continuation of its activities. The result of the UN Third Committee deliberations on the subject has put an end to Greek Cypriot efforts to exploit this subject, she said. Birgen expressed the hope that the Greek Cypriots will learn the lesson emanating from their application to the UN Third Committee and will not delay their presence in the joint committee.

PAPANDREOU HONORS KLIBI AT LUNCHEON 15 DEC

NC161151 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0800 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou discussed the Middle East problems and other bilateral and international issues with Arab League Secretary General Chedli Klibi at the political office yesterday.

Addressing Mr Klibi during a luncheon given in his honor, Prime Minister Papandreou stressed that the present Greek Government has formulated a particular relationship with the Arab nation in its foreign policy. Mr Papandreou further said that the foreign policy that Greece is following today is genuine, multifaceted, serves peace and supports all peoples struggling for freedom, national independence and self-determination.

PAPANDREOU DISCUSSION OF ECONOMIC POLICIES

NC162029 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Implementation of a self-sufficient development course which will reflect democratic programming; increased investments; increased productivity, and the achievement of the great institutional changes for the workers are the immediate goals of PASOK's government. Their achievement requires vigilance, patience and self-control. This was underlined by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou in addressing the Greek people tonight on the progress of the economy and the government's income policy.

At the start, the prime minister recalled that the economic situation inherited by the government of change was particularly bad, not only because of the general world economic crisis, but because of the policies pursued by the New Democracy governments.

Our first duty, he added, was to restore the lost real income. We achieved this by implementing a courageous income policy in 1982.

Continuing, he underlined: By the end of the year, inflation will drop from 25 percent to 21 percent; the deficit in the balance of foreign payments will be perceptibly reduced; and the GNP will show a total increase of 1.3 percent. Unemployment in our country is the lowest among nearly all the European countries, where the situation is frightening.

The income policy for 1983 does not envisage a freezing of wages but is an (?innovative) policy which will result in the full coverage of any losses suffered by the workers by 31 December 1983. In January 1984, there will not only be a corrective amount, but wages and salaries will be increased in conformity with the increase in the GNP during 1983. This, the prime minister stressed, I consider to be a certainty.

Continuing, Papandreou said the government is socialist, and as a result protects the interests of the workers, the non-privileged ones. For this reason, its strategic goals concern the interests of the working people and the working citizen.

For the government to change, Papandreou added, the question of economic development is not just a quantitative one. It is also a matter of quality and, finally, a political matter. It is a question of national survival.

In closing, Andreas Papandreou gave assurances of a confident future and said: We have the necessary courage to proceed toward the realization of our vision, to speak the language of truth and to take the necessary measures that will guarantee our country's progress.

GOVERNMENT ASKS BULGARIA TO EXTRADITE CELENK

NC171047 Paris AFP in English 1036 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 17 (AFP) -- Turkey today formally requested the extradition from Bulgaria of Turkish underworld figure Bekir Celenk, who is also wanted by the Italian police in connection with last year's attempt to kill Pope John Paul II, a Foreign Ministry spokesman said here today. He said Turkey had also asked Bulgaria to "furnish explanations for the reasons behind Mr Celenk's arrest and to keep him under detention until a decision was reached on the extradition request."

The 49-year-old Mr Celenk, accused by Turkish authorities of being the man behind most of the arms and narcotics smuggling in Turkey, allegedly offered three million German marks (one million dollars) to Mehmet Ali Agca to shoot the pope. Mr Agca is serving a life sentence in an Italian jail for having shot and wounded the pope in St. Peter's Square in May, 1981.

Mr Celenk escaped from Turkey after the military coup of September, 1980. Authorities threatened on several occasions to strip him of his nationality unless he turned himself in. Officials here could not say whether or not the threat was actually carried out. If Mr Celenk lost his nationality, the request for his extradition would not be accepted by Bulgarian authorities.

TERCUMAN WARNS OF 'LAW OF SEA' CONSEQUENCES

NC160748 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 13 Dec 82 p 4

["This Is The World" column by Zafar Atay: "Athens-Wisdom-the Aegean"]

[Excerpts] The Turkish delegates attended the law of the sea conferences regularly and defended the view that the Aegean and "similar seas which possess special characteristics" should be considered in a different framework. However, the delegates, whose attention was focused on the oceans, finally established certain principles without making any distinctions.

The passage containing these principles is of paramount importance to Turkey: "States will be able to proclaim their territorial waters to a distance of 12 miles without impediment." This is a fatal blow to Turkey. At the final session held in New York, Turkey declared that it did not accept the convention.

Greece is among the countries which have signed the convention. This is not important. What is important is what Greece might do from now on.

If, on the basis of this convention, Papandreou extends Greece's territorial waters from 6 to 12 miles, the world will collapse on him.

For many years now, Turkey has been stating its position clearly. Such a change in the Aegean will be construed as a reason for war. Turkey has reached this point not because it is a warmongering state, but because it is determined to protect its legal rights. Surely Turkey cannot say "Yes" to an action which would extend territorial waters in the Aegean from 6 to 12 miles. This would entitle Greece, which possesses over 3,000 islands -- some, mere rocks -- to block all passageways.

We still hope that Athens (Papandreou) has not lost its head to the extent of extending the territorial waters in the Aegean to 12 miles.

ICFTU DELEGATION MEETS TURK-IS LEADERS

TA161602 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Istanbul, Dec 16 (AA) -- The delegation from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) headed by Secretary General John (Vanderveken) met with leaders of labor unions affiliated with the Turkish Confederation of Labor (Turk-Is) in Istanbul Thursday.

(Vanderveken) told reporters his confederation has followed with interest the activities of Turk-Is, and their current visit to Turkey demonstrated this interest.

On the trial of officers of the Confederation of Revolutionary Labor Unions "DISK", (Vanderveken) said he had the impression from the hearing his team attended Wednesday that the trial was conducted in a highly civil manner, and he hoped to obtain permission to attend a few more hearings. The ICFTU team met with Ercument Tahiroglu, a defence lawyer in the "DISK" trial.

The new order issued Thursday says contacts with representatives of foreign institutions shall be carried on according to existing legislation.

OFFICIAL REPORTS ON OVERSEAS WORKER REMITTANCES

TA161545 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1510 GMT 16 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 16 (AA) -- Remittances by Turkish workers abroad were highest in 1981, when they reached 2.5 billion dollars, member of the Consultative Assembly Imren Akyut told a seminar in Ankara.

Ms Akyut noted total remittances by workers since 1964 totalled 15.7 billion dollars, more than total foreign economic aid for the same period which was 9.6 billion dollars.

Half of the workers remittances, however, was invested in landed property, one fourth in small business, one fifth in durable consumer goods and only 5 percent in industrial enterprises.

Aykut called for government support for the enterprises set up by savings of Turkish workers, which faced difficulties and needed urgent aid.

Turkey's unemployment problem could be solved only through more investment, but the proportion of private investment to public had gone down from 98 percent in 1975 to 38.6 percent in 1981, Aykut noted.

USSR DEMANDS WITHDRAWAL OF BRITISH NAVAL ATTACHE

LD171358 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1345 GMT 17 Dec 82

[By Andy Webb, PA political staff]

[Excerpt] Russia today demanded the withdrawal of the Naval Attache in the British Embassy in Moscow, in retaliation against the expulsion from London of the Soviet spy, Captain Anatoliy Zotov.

Britain's ambassador to the Soviet Union, Sir Iain Sutherland, was summoned to the Soviet Minstry of Foreign Affairs and told the attache, Captain Alexander Richardson, must leave the country within a week.

The Foreign Office in London said Sir Iain "protested strongly at this wholly unwarranted action."

A spokesman said: "The Soviet action against Capt Richardson was clearly linked to the expulsion of Capt Zotov. We take a very serious view of the matter and we are considering the Soviet action."

The Foreign Office had anticipated that the Soviets might take retaliatory action after Capt Zotov was asked to leave on December 1, but it made clear that any such move would be totally unjustified.

Foreign Office officials were unable to give any reasons offered by the Russians for today's explusion order.

PAHR: NO 'UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER' TO U.S.

AU211105 Vienna NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG in German 21 Dec 82 p 3

[Kurt Seinitz report on NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG interview with Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr in Vienna on 20 December]

[Text] Vienna -- In the negotiations which will be opened today in Washington by State Secretary Lacina, Austria is interested in reaching a mutually satsifactory solution with the United States, but no "unconditional surrender" will be signed, as some gentlemen at the U.S. Defense Department perhaps imagine. This was stated yesterday by Foriegn Minister Pahr in an interview with NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG.

The United States has the right to codetermine what happens with its technology exports to Austria, but as far as Austrian export policy is concerned regarding technology which has been developed in Austria itself, Austria cannot make any commitments. Pahr: "In this case, we would have to alter our economic system which, however, should remain just as free as that in the United States."

Pahr is convinced that there are sufficient reasonable people in the U.S. State Department and Department of Commerce who understand the situation. But, should it become necessary -- Pahr said -- he himself would go to Washington to discuss the latest misunderstandings between the two countries with Secretary of State Shultz. Generally, Pahr believes that the policy of neutrality is becoming altogether more difficult in the current world political climate of confrontation dominated by the motto: "Whoever is not for us, is against us."

NATIONAL PEACE MOVEMENT ADOPTS 'LINZ APPEAL'

AU211119 Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German 21 Dec 82 pp 1-2

[Summary] Linz -- On Sunday, the All-Austrian Peace Conference adopted by an overwhelming majority the so-called "Linz Appeal," which will basically determine the further work of the peace movement in Austria. Similar to the "Krefeld Appeal" in the FRG, the "Linz Appeal" is to act as a uniting, mobilizing element for the entire peace movement.

The appeal that is to be signed by supporters calls on the Austrian Government to oppose the deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles in Europe, and together with other states, to adopt specific and effective measures to prevent such deployment as a first step toward a Europe free of nuclear weapons.

In the annex to the appeal, the urgency of the drive is explained by referring to the NATO dual decision to deploy new intermediate-range nuclear missiles in West Europe as of the fall of 1983. It is argued that Pershing-II and cruise missiles are not weapons serving deterrence, but weapons suitable for a nuclear first strike, weapons that are designed to make it possible to wage and win a "limited" nuclear war. The annex also explains why such an appeal was adopted in neutral Austria: "The borders of neutral Austria cannot protect us from the dangers of a nuclear war. Therefore, neutrality commits Austria to oppose deployment of such nuclear weapons. The planned deployment also constitutes a direct threat to the Austrian population, as it has been proved that there are plans to turn Austria into a nuclear battlefield in the event of a nuclear war."

After more than 200 peace activists from a wide range of idelogical groups adopted this appeal, it is now necessary that it be signed by as many Austrians as possible.

OFFICIAL SPOKESMAN ON ANDROPOV MISSILE PROPOSAL

LD211526 Hamburg DPA in German 1448 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government will analyze the disarmament speech by Soviet party leader Yuriy Andropov "with great care and in great seriousness" and "as always," urge its partners to make a similar examination. This announcement by Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff in Bonn today was in response to proposals by Andropov, who announced in Moscow that the Soviet Union wants to retain only the same number of medium-range missiles as Great Britain and France possess. A condition for this would be the West's refraining from counterarming.

Sudhoff combined the Federal Government's readiness to examine the proposals with clear scepticism regarding the possibility of preserving the balance of forces if the Soviet proposal were implemented. Andropov's words "sound very nice," but could mean the cementing of Soviet superiority. The Federal Government had only press reports of the speech at its disposal today. On the basis of this information, it was also conceivable, said Sudhoff, that Andropov's proposals were simply a clarification of the plans already made known last week and submitted in Geneva.

Reaction of Parties

LD211600 Hamburg DPA in German 1312 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- Andropov's speech has met with various reactions in Bonn. In the view of the defense policy spokesman for the CDU/CSU Bundestag parliamentary group, Willi Weiskirch, Andropov was trying to divert attention from colossal Soviet arming by accusing the United States of making direct preparations for war. In a statement, Weiskirch said that there could be no question at all of any military parity between the United States and the Soviet Union -- the upholding of which Andropov was urging -- especially not in the field of nuclear medium-range missiles. That is why if there was a freeze on such weapons, as Andropov demanded, it would mean the cementing of Soviet superiority.

In the view of the deputy chairman of the SPD Bundestag group, Horst Ehmke, the new general secretary made a proposal requiring careful consideration at an important time for the continuation of disarmament talks and thus for the fate of the world. Ehmke conceded, however, that there would naturally be objections from the West to this proposal, for example, at the fact that Andropov was proceeding from the basis of the number of missiles and not from the number of warheads. Anyone in the West who rejected this proposal precipitately would be shouldering a heavy political responsibility. "We Social Democrats call on the Western alliance to thoroughly examine the proposal."

The FDP Bundestag parliamentary group welcomed the signal that Andropov was possibly prepared to make a radical reduction in SS-20 missiles. The FDP group's spokesman on security policy, Karl-Heinz Popp, said in a statement that Andropov's speech gave rise to the hope that after years of a unilateral arms build-up of nuclear medium-range missiles, the Soviet Union was now seeing the philosophy of an arms balance at a lower level in a fresh light. A balance for safeguarding peace in the field of nuclear medium-range weapons must also be the criterion under which Andropov's ideas should be carefully examined, should they change from a signal of possible readiness to a real Soviet offer, stressed Popp.

Commentator's View

DW220959 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2130 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Ruediger Lentz commentary in the "Tagesthemen" program]

[Text] The change in the Kremlin has now paid off. Whoever had considered the new Soviet general secretary to be merely a tough hawk found himself mistaken today. Yuriy Andropov showed himself to be an interlocutor of the West who is receptive to disarmament.

The offer from Moscow is the most far-reaching disarmament proposal by the Soviet Union in the past few years. Whether this is a result of the West's adherence to the NATO dual decision or simply emerges from Soviet commonsense may be open to speculation. What is definite, however, is that although the 25-percent reduction by both sides of all means of delivery for strategic nuclear weapons is less than U.S. President Reagan's proposed 50-percent reduction, it still is essentially more than the mere 10-percent reduction agreed under the SALT II treaty.

Even more sensational is Andropov's proposal to limit the number of Soviet nuclear missiles in Europe to a level of about 150. Even if this number is multiplied by the three warheads on the SS-20's, all that would remain in the Soviet nuclear silos is 450 warheads, and that would be the lowest number since the mid-sixties.

Granted, the Soviet proposal is not without a hitch. It is intended to prevent any U.S. counterarming in Europe, and thus to perpetuate the Soviet monopoly on medium-range weapons, although at a considerably lower level. In rare unanimity, London and Paris, both independent nuclear powers in Europe, were the first to reject Andropov's proposals. Margaret Thatcher and Claude Cheysson let the Kremlin know that their missiles are immaterial to the balance in Europe.

Britian's and France's negative attitude, however, cannot be that of the rest of West Europe. It is in our foremost interests to work toward reducing the unquestionable Soviet missile superiority, even if in so doing we fail to achieve a complete zero solution on both sides. Adhering too inflexibly to this negotiating position by the United States is in no way in keeping with West European security interests.

Following Andropov's proposals, Washington would be well advised to again study the NATO counterarming decision of December 1979, as it is expressly written in that decision that the West's requirement to deploy medium-range missiles will be determined by the results of the negotiations. Stripped of all the trimmings, this can only mean that both sides must climb down from their maximum positions if a lasting compromise is to be attained prior to the fall of 1983.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN ON RELATIONS WITH GDR

DW220859 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 21 Dec 82

["Excerpt" from press statement by FRG government spokesman Diether Stolze in Bonn -- recorded]

[Text] Within the framework of the Basic Treaty, it has been possible to settle a number of practical and humanitarian problems and to develop and promote cooperation in some fields. In this connection, there have been developments favorable to the people in both states, especially the people of Berlin. However, there were also serious setbacks and many expectations continue to be unfulfilled.

Unfortunately, we are still far away from normalcy and good neighborliness. No one can reconcile himself to the GDR's inhuman barriers along the borders.

The Federal Republic seeks a reasonable and cooperative relationship with the GDR. It is interested in comprehensive long-term agreements with the GDR for the benefit of the people.

CHANCELLOR KOHL ON HAMBURG ELECTION RESULTS

DW211215 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2130 GMT 20 Dec 82

[Interview with Chancellor Helmut Kohl by reporter Kleinmann, place not given -- recorded]

[Text] [Question] The Hamburg elections were the last landtag elections prior to 6 March. Do you think that the decision resulted simply from local causes?

[Answer] No, that would be absolutely wrong. We suffered a defeat in Hamburg and we as the CDU didn't achieve our election aim. Belittling the matter doesn't help at all -- I am no friend of such maneuvers anyway. Naturally, these were local elections of a very strong local Hamburg character, but, naturally, these elections also created a challenge for us, the Federal Government and the CDU of Germany, and we must and we will face this challenge.

[Question] The SPD has clearly won votes in Hamburg and the CDU has lost votes. Against whom was this aimed? Against the Hamburg CDU, against the top candidates in Hamburg, or against you and the new Federal Government?

[Answer] Your description isn't quite correct. We have again scored about 400,000 votes, some 2,000 less than that, and in the summer, on 6 June, under very favorable circumstances, we scored 413,000 votes. It turns out more and more clearly that there is a threshold of about 400,000 votes for us in Hamburg. In the history of Hamburg CDU elections results, this is a very good election result, but it is insufficient because the Social Democrats have achieved a much better result in their old stronghold. I believe -- this is also the opinion of my Hamburg friends -- that we may have contributed to this involuntarily because the discussion about the inability to rule over the Hanseatic city has certainly prompted some of the Social Democratic electorate to say: We don't want to have a city that cannot be ruled. This brought about an absolute majority for the SPD. That is a special Hamburg problem.

[Question] This wasn't the only argument, however, because the election campaign arguments for the Hamburg SPD were supplied by the changes of laws in Bonn. Do you conclude that the necessity to make sacrifices, which you quoted so often, isn't so popular after all?

[Answer] I don't conclude that. I believe that we will naturally have to do quite a lot of work in the coming weeks to explain to the people what has been decided on last week, which is just the beginning on the way to improvements of our economy, to the stimulation of investments and to a halt to and reduction in unemployment. The time for that was just too short. The Federal Government has been practically in office since my election on 1 October and it began its work 1 week later. In these few weeks we have worked almost around the clock! However, it has thus far been impossible to explain to the people what must be done in view of the bad legacy, the millions of unemployed, the great number of bankruptsies and all the negative economic developments we have had to face. This will be the important task of the coming weeks. We will do it.

SPOKESMAN: ECONOMY APPEARS TO BE STABILIZING

LD211658 Hamburg DPA in German 1435 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl sees "certain indications" for a stablization of the economy. The chancellor is not, however, expecting a rapid change in economic trends, said government spokesman Diether Stolze today following the cabinet meeting in Bonn. The government was pleased to note, however, that the economic situation had not deteriorated any further.

According to the government spokesman, the Federal Government largely shares the economic assessment of the federal bank. A real increase in the GNP can be expected in the second half of 1983. There also appears to be prospects for a further fall in the rate of inflation. Stolze further stressed the federal bank's reference to private consumption, which has not declined any further.

One of the chancellor's main concerns continues to be providing enough jobs for young people. Federal Chancellor Kohl has therefore renewed his appeal to all those responsible in industry to ensure adequate employment for young people. At the same time, he has drawn attention to the increase in the number of training places to 631,000, or 4.2 percent more than in the previous year.

CHEYSSON ON ANDROPOV PROPOSAL, POLAND, U.S.

Initial Reaction to Andropov

LD211510 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] A cautious reaction by Claude Cheysson following the proposals made by Soviet leader Yuriy Andropov regarding strategic weapons. In the view of the French external relations minister, the idea of maintaining the same number of missiles in Europe as Great Britain and France is a way of diverting the conversation from the real topic of the imbalance of forces in Europe.

Claude Cheysson expressed shock over the fact that the Soviet Union should take French nuclear arsenals into account: The French nuclear weapons have never been included in the Geneva calculations, added the minister.

Rejects Proposal

NC211459 Paris AFP in English 1454 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 21 (AFP) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson today rejected a proposal from Soviet leader Yuriy Andropov to cut Soviet nuclear missiles in Europe to the quantity deployed by Britain and France.

Speaking on French television soon after Communist Party Secretary-General Yuriy Andropov made the offer in his keynote address to a special joint Central Committee and Supreme Soviet session to mark the 60th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union, Mr Cheysson said he was "shocked" at the proposal.

The proposal was a ploy to divert talks from "the real issue," Mr Cheysson held. He added that France had never accepted that the French nuclear strike force be included in "Geneva calculations" -- a reference to U.S.-Soviet nuclear arms limitations talks due to resume in the Swiss city at the end of January.

Mr Cheysson recalled that the French nuclear force was not integrated into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). "We are independent," he asked, "does Mr Andropov want us to integrate into the Atlantic alliance? Does he want our missiles under American command?"

Noting that "for some years, the Soviets have been accumulating in Europe terrifyingly fast and accurate nuclear weapons that can only reach Western Europe, the minister said that "unfortunately" a planned NATO deployment of 572 missiles next year "might be necessary to redress the balance."

Mr Cheysson said that equilibrium was the key to peace and reiterated his government's support for the U.S.-proposed "zero option," which calls for the dismantling of Soviet SS-20 missiles trained on Europe in exchange for NATO scrapping its scheduled deployment.

(Meanwhile, in Bonn, the ruling Christian-Democratic parliamentary defence spokesman said that Mr Andropov was trying to "draw attention away from the Soviet Union's enormous rearmament effort." Willi Weiskirch said that Mr Andropov's suggestion would amount to "consolidating Soviet superiority."

(In London, spokesmen at the prime minister's office and the Foreign Office said it was too soon for any formal comment on the latest Soviet proposals.

(But Soviet Ambassador Viatcheslav Dologov had a meeting at his request with Douglas Hurd, minister of state at the Foreign Office, to discuss the ongoing disarmament negotiations at Geneva, a spokesman added.)

(West German Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff said later that Bonn would give "serious" consideration to Mr Andropov's missiles proposals. But he said that Moscow would not be contributing much to a security balance if the Soviet Union insisted on keeping part of its strategic forces aimed at Europe. In a reference to Mr Andropov's proposals to limit Soviet nuclear missiles in Europe to the quantity deployed by Britain and France, the spokesman said it appeared that Moscow was hoping to maintain its monopoly on Euro-strategic arms. If the Soviet Union is hoping to maintain its advantage in such a crucial sector, then Bonn would consider the proposal as "politically unacceptable.")

Statements on Issue

[French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's interview on Antenne 2 in Paris on 21 December]

[Text] [Question] Do you think that Mr Andropov's proposals this morning on the reduction of arms are different from the preceding ones?

[Answer] I do not know. To be able to know this, it would be necessary to be present at the table where these proposals are clearly made. It is true that there is a need for a reduction in the volumes of strategic arms. The strategic arms are the intercontinental arms which can cross oceans and with which the United States and the Soviet Union can threaten each other. There is a need to reduce these. At the moment, each of the two partners possesses arms with which it can destroy the others five or six times over. These arms can be reduced by more than 25 percent. What shocks me is to immediately introduce the French nuclear arsenal. This was given a minimum dimension. This nuclear arsenal would no longer be dissuasive if we reduce it. We have therefore never agreed that the French nuclear arms be included in this reasoning, in the Geneva calculation.

[Question] Exactly. To what do we owe this idea of including France in Mr Andropov's proposals?

[Answer] I am afraid it is an attempt to change the conversation from the true subject: that is, for some years now, the Soviet Union has been accumulating in Europe nuclear arms that are formidable because of their speed and precision and which can reach only Western Europe and therefore, there is now an imbalance in Western Europe in this connection compared with the countries belonging to the integrated military structure of the Atlantic alliance. Mr Andropov is trying to turn attention away from this imbalance.

[Question] Mr. Minister, very soon -- that is by the end of 1983 -- there will be American Pershings on European soil?

[Answer] Unfortunately, this could become necessary in order to reestablish the balance I have just talked about, which is the key to peace. Have these Soviet arms been accumulated in Eastern Europe or not? Yes, a means to reestablish the balance; their supression is what is called the zero option. [sentence as received] Or they may be reduced to only a small number. What Mr Andropov is proposing is to introduce arms of a completely different nature. This is not acceptable. In the circumstances, the only thing to do is to introduce the Pershings and the cruise missiles into Germany, Italy and elsewhere.

[Question] Would you allow the French rockets to be counted?

[Answer] No, because they do not belong to the Atlantic alliance system. We are independent. Does Mr Andropov wish that we should integrate them into the Atlantic alliance and that the use of our rockets should depend on the American command?

'Condemnation' of Polish Regime

LD211530 Paris Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] The French minister of external relations, Claude Cheysson, has renewed his condemnation of the Polish regime. The head of French foreign affairs considers that the relaxation measures announced by Warsaw for the end of the year are much less than France had hoped for. Claude Cheysson indicated, however, that this condemnation did not signify that France should no longer have relations with Poland.

Further on Poland

PM211415 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Dec 82 p 6

[Unattributed report: "Mr Cheysson: A Cloak of Darkness Has Fallen Over Poland"]

[Text] The arrest of Mr Lech Walesa was raised in the Senate on Thursday, 16 December, by Mr Pierre Mauroy, who was answering questions to the government.

At the request of Mr Chauvin (Val-d'Oise), chairman of the Centrist Union group, the senators had decided to suspend the session to protest at that measure, to the embarrassment of the Communist group. When the session resumed, the premier stated in particular: "The situation in Poland is unacceptable and I would like to express the government's indignation. In Poland, Lech Walesa represents the move toward more rights, freedoms and hope. It is impossible to put an end to rights, freedoms and hope. The French Government is on the side of fights, freedom and hope."

After the premier's statement, External Relations Minister Cheysson gave the following details: "We had been allowed to hope for an easing of tension as the sorry anniversary of 13 December approached; the Polish Sejm is to pronounce on General Jaruzelski's proposal on 18 [December]. In the final analysis, what has been decided amounts to very little. The amnesty decreed is very limited. The internment measures have merely been suspended. The premier has expressed the emotion we feel at the news of Lech Walesa's arrest by the police. It was apparently not a real arrest. Nonetheless, a cloak of darkness has fallen over the country. The false letter from Lech Walesa which was published over there shows the nature of a police system."

Relations With U.S.

AB211537 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1300 GMT 21 Dec 82

["Excerpts" from French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's statement to the Anglo-American press on 6 December, place not stated]

[Text] Before giving a precise reply to the question concerning the relations between France and the United States, I would first of all like to say what the Atlantic alliance is. The Atlantic alliance is a group of dispositions aimed at ensuring a common defense in the face of the totalitarian regimes of the East. Why a common defense? Because we have the same idea of the world and of society. The Atlantic alliance is the outcome of a common analysis of the final goal of society which -- for the Americans, the British, the French and the others -- is based on the respect of the human being and his value.

On our coming to power, I was therefore somewhat astonished by the surprise shown by certain people as if the French Socialists were not fundamentally humanist. Our socialism was directly inherited from Jaures and the humanist period. We are therefore completely in the Atlantic camp. There is no doubt at all about this. That we do not want to see the East-West conflict engulf the whole world and affect the countries of the South is one thing. But when there is tension between the East and the West, we are resolutely and definitely on the side of the West. Who can doubt this? There is no doubt at all about this. Besides, I believe that there is no longer any doubt about this.

The second remark about the Atlantic alliance and France's position is this: We are for the defense of man, of freedom and of order in the free world. We want to avoid war. We want to make war impossible, and we therefore think that we need a totally dissuasive defense system. I have uttered the important word which is dissuasion. The problem is not to improve the conditions of war, to tame war and to make it less painful. The problem is to make it impossible and to dissuade those who might think of it. Our entire defense system is based on the idea of dissuasion. It has nuclear armament at its very center because, for the moment, we are not in a position to propose conventional dissuasion. We will not be able to dissuade if we maintain the conventional system. We may be able to increase our force, but we will not be dissuasive. An opponent may try to win in a conventional war.

As you can see, these are topics on which the French are extraordinarily close to the Americans, and we are demonstrating it in our human and political efforts. We are demonstrating it in the denunciation of certain abuses of totalitarianism and, as you know, no Western country has denounced as clearly as France foreign occupation in Kampuchea, Afghanistan and elsewhere and the overarmament which threatens Western Europe and Soviet influence in the events in Poland. This is a fundamental basis of agreement and alliance. Of course, differences and divergences have appeared in this alliance. We are not on the same side of the Atlantic. We do not have the same dimensions and our interests are not always the same. In periods of crisis and recession, each of us thinks first about his market, his unemployed and his chances of development. We are of the same family since we belong to the same family of thought and ideas, but disputes exist in a family. And besides, the best disputes take place in a family -- you will agree -- because we know one another better and see one another more often.

You have raised various issues. Some disputes are inevitable. Your steel industry is facing difficulties just as ours. You are therefore anxious to protect it. This is not good, but it is natural. And to protect it, you are taking more or less imaginative measures. And we counterattack by taking imaginative measures on our side. And we finally agree on a solution which is not the best one. No, the solution we have reached is not good. Neither is it bad... I believe that this dispute concerning steel is natural, that it is due to the nature of things. The striking thing is that all the Europeans stood together, but the Germans had a less advanced position than that of the French and particularly the British. We stood well together because we knew that our voice is stronger when we speak as Europe than when we do as countries. I think we held together well on the question of steel.

The affair of the gas pipeline was quite a different one, and I must confess to you that I have not yet understood this gas pipeline story. I have not yet understood it because no one has yet explained to me what Washington was really thinking when it attacked us concerning the gas pipeline. They began by telling us that we should not depend on the Soviet Union for our energy supply. The reply to this is that in fact the gas we will receive from the Soviet Union must not represent an excessive percentage of our energy supply. In the case of France, we added, moreover, that this gas supply could be interrupted at any time.

Each enterprise that will buy this gas must have a readily available alternative source of supply. We have also been told that it was necessary to make it difficult for the Soviet Union to make foreign payments by not giving it resources. This is an interesting argument which should be seriously examined. This is so because to imagine that a totalitarian country can be made to yield by cutting off its resources is to return to the argument that was often heard in history but which has never worked. It works with the democratic countries but not with the totalitarian countries. If this is really the objective, I wonder why wheat is sold to it so cheaply. We have also been told that this is tied in with Poland. If this is the case, then I no longer understand anything at all. The gas pipeline will not be completed for 4 or 5 years. Would the gas pipeline be good if the situation were good in Poland and bad if the situation were bad in Poland?

I really do not understand. I have therefore never understood the American Government's main reason in opposing the gas pipeline. In any case, we have signed and the Americans and the others know that when the Western countries sign an agreement, they must honor their signature. Against whom were the sanctions taken? Not against the Soviet Union. We are surprised that it should be taken against the Europeans. This affair has ended. The sanctions have been lifted. Let us stop talking about them and let us hope that they will leave no trace. This will take time. Let us not have any illusions about this. I must again observe that Europe held together in this affair and this was good.

[Question] Mr Minister, what do you think about the leadership of the Atlantic alliance? How do you propose to organize this "leadership' and what do you think of Ronald Reagan's "leadership?"

[Answer] There is no imaginable "leadership" in an alliance of free countries. We did not sign the Warsaw Pact but the Washington treaty. We are in an alliance and not in a bloc. France does not accept any "leadership," and besides, does not wish to impose any "leadership" whatsoever within the European Community. It is an alliance between free and equal countries. It happens that one of them is more powerful, heavier, more technically advanced and therefore has particular responsibilities, but this does not give it any right whatsoever to lead the alliance. France -- there can be no doubt at all about this because of our membership in the Washington treaty -- does not accept any leadership within the alliance.

[Question] Mr Minister, if France does not accept any "leadership" from any country within the alliance, do you think that the alliance will work in a more efficient manner?

[Answer] I believe there has never been true leadership by one country of the others in the alliance and I am surprised that this concept of American "leadership' has developed in recent months. This seems very surprising. At the very time when we are talking about freedom and the rights of every people, when we are contesting the right of the Soviets to influence the Poles -- this is a weak word -- should it be the time to line up behind a country? Certainly not! Consultation is a word which is perfectly appropriate to us.

In recent years, even in the French language, the concept of "concertation" is used. It does not matter if it goes a little further than consulation. The machinery for consultation exists. Our predecessors saw it quite well. First, there is the system of the alliance, NATO, which holds two annual meetings of the Atlantic Council at the foreign ministers level. Sometimes there is a summit, like the last one in Bonn, which comprises -- for those in the integrated system, of which we are not a part -- meetings of defense ministers, as well as a permanent consultation between the ambassadors charged with this issue in Brussels on problems of defense, strategy -- the part of the political analysis from which a strategy is mapped out, and a system of defense.

We, the OECD members -- this time we are going beyond the countries of the alliance because there is Japan which, despite the fact that it is not formally an Atlantic ally, is part of the same defense of the free world, of economic order -- have all the structures that enable all consultations and studies.

You know that talks were held in Washington in recent months. A certain number of studies were envisaged. I note that almost all of these studies are already being considered by the OECD and this is satisfactory. If further economic studies should be undertaken, we believe that this will be made possible through the OECD, either between all its members or through the intervention of a secretariat or a particular committee. Then we will have a special system to examine production and exchanges in fields that could strengthen or contribute to the military potentiality of the East European countries. Nobody ever talks about this, but this is known by all. And we are very satisfied that last January decisions were made between Comecon members who, as you know, have since then set their machinery in motion by holding regular meetings that enabled a first revision of the lists, an improvement in procedures and their speedy implementation, and an extension of the conditions of examination from the political ministries to the defense ministries. All this seems very good in our eyes. Then does there remain any topic for which consultation does not presently have an established machinery? Well, shall we place this machinery within the existing framework? Finally and especially, true consultation is of a political nature and true consultation consists in thinking of others, in telephoning them and in seeing them...our ability in this field is considerable.

One of my aides reckoned that when Alexander Haig and I were holding similar positions, we had more than one contact a day -- either through letter or by telephone. That is true consultation. True consultation means listening to the other person. The last time I went to Bonn, I met with a man I very much admire -- Arthur Burns, the U.S. ambassador to the FRG. We held a lengthy discussion on the state of relations between the European countries and the United States. At the end of the discussion, I tried to sum up what I talked with him about for 1 hour and I told him: What is striking to us in Europe and is worrying us is the lack of interest Washington has for what we think. If we quarrel over a certain topic, this is natural, If we have divergent views and we do not succeed in reducing them, this is part of the life of a family. But, for decisions to suddenly come from Washington and which we have never heard of, for arguments that have never been compared with ours to be put up -- this worries us very much. I will not place myself on a sentimental plane where I will have many things to say, but I will place myself on a political plane; this is dangerous. I am not at all saying that the United States must always follow what we are saying. Of course not...but at least it should listen to and inform us. But, believe me, for several months now this is not so. Then we suddenly hear of such and such an orientation. When things go well, we learn of decisions a few hours before they are made public. That is what is lacking most in consultation today. Yes, we must consult more frequently. The crisis over the pipeline project would have never existed if we had really talked to one another, if we had known exactly what the Americans wanted. I think we would have answered all the arguments; I am even very convinced of it. And maybe they would have been able to convince us of something, I do not know. But it is not possible in a fundamental alliance such as the Atlantic alliance that we do not talk to one another. This is the most serious thing. And it is not by creating new administrative machineries that the situation will improve; it is quite the contrary.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] In December 1979, it was decided that if the Geneva negotiations on disarmament in the field of medium-range missiles did not succeed, there would be, at the end of 1983, a first installation of Pershing medium-range missiles in Germany and an installation of cruise missiles in Italy, then a cruise missile installation in Germany, in the Netherlands etc... the decision was made. It has not been changed. The Soviet attitude persists and they continue to install missiles, and their medium-range nuclear forces are a dangerous advantage.

Will this advantage disappear with success in the Geneva negotiations? This is what we wish. But if this does not succeed, the December 1979 decision must be implemented. France is not part of this decision because it already has its medium-range nuclear weapons. But France will not isolate itself from its allies, and the first foreign policy statement made by the president of the French Republic on 10 May bore on this topic during the visit by Chancellor Schmidt.

As these declarations have been made in a very clear manner, it would be dangerous if they are not implemented. Then the Geneva talks on medium-range missiles must lead to clear results. For example, to zero option or to the installation taking place. Anything short of that would be very dangerous and serious.

We will have regimes before us which are different from ours, and we must be totally credible through what we tell them through our deterrent force. If we lose our credibility by not implementing such a clearly expressed decision as that of December 1979, we will thus seriously increase the risks for the future.

Remember what happened in the 1930's? Remember that the blazing statements made by the English and the French when Strasbourg was under gunfire, etc, were later followed by great silence, and this probably misled the subsequent enemy. Let us never forget that situation. We must be credible if we want our deterrent capacity to impress. To be credible when such a serious decision as that of December 1979 has been made, it must be implemented. So, a successful outcome of the Geneva talks would be the ideal. Otherwise, the missiles must be deployed.

[Question] At the beginning of the year, there was France's fear for the FRG, for German militarism, neutralism...I would like to ask if that is France's (?ulterior motive) in initiating strategic talks with the FRG, and what you think this will result in?

[Answer] On the subject of your suggestion, a while ago we spoke of 1983 as the year when the decision must be made to deploy missiles if the Geneva negotiations are unsuccessful or if they do not achieve concrete results.

You must realize what this represents for the countries that are to implement the decision, the Netherlands and Germany; Italy, however, lies a little farther from the front. You must also realize the implication of the very intelligent declarations -- allow me to say too intelligent declarations -- made by some of your countrymen pledging "no first strike" or "no early strike." Too often the average man takes that to mean that the great, gigantic force of the United States will only be used after part of Europe has been crushed.

I do not mean at all that this is the reasoning -- please do not make me say what I have not meant. I do not mean at all that is the reasoning of any American official. Not at all, but that is how it is interpreted, naturally.

[Question indistinct]

[Answer] General Rogers has spoken of "no early strike," and technically his position is fully understandable. I do not say that I agree with him; that is not the point. Technically, the position is fully understandable. But for the average man, that means "well, to start with we will let them take over a few hundred kilometers. Thereafter, the 'early' will be over and the execution will follow."

That is not the general's reasoning, not at all. But that is how he has been interpreted. It is therefore a very difficult year for all those who have to plant a Pershing in their garden or in their neighbor's garden.

It is thus understandable why this period is one when the pacifist and neutralist movement is likely to be stronger, which we are afraid of. We wish it were otherwise, but the reasoning in this regard is more of an individual matter. In fact, I believe that we have never sufficiently explained to the public that, as I said earlier, the problem is not to improve the conditions of war, but to make war impossible, and that presently the only fully deterrent tool is nuclear arms. I do not know an alternative deterrent, and this has not been amply stated.

So you can feel those reactions, this great concern in public opinion not only in the FRG, but also in the Netherlands and everywhere else. This we understand. This seems to be the right time for us to show our European partners, our German partners in particular, our complete solidarity, to show them that in spite of our independent nuclear deterrent power, we do not want to become a nuclear Switzerland. We do not at all believe we can say now: "We are French, we are eating our cheese, we have enough of it in France," and then forget the rest of the world. So we are holding, and will continue to hold permanent strategic talks with the Germans. We will examine any decision with them affecting them and made within the framework of the Atlantic alliance in general before it can be carried out -- whether on the stationing of our forces in Germany, or on a greater mobility of intervention equipment. And...it seems more important now than ever before -- allow me to use this vulgarism -- for us to latch on to the Germans at a time when they are to carry out an extremely difficult decision if the Geneva negotiations are unsuccessful.

[Question] Mr Minister, U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz is expected or has already arrived in Europe on a tour of European countries. What do you expect from his talks with your EEC partners, as he will be meeting them on Friday when the EEC meets? He is expected in France next week. So what do you expect from the visit, first, at the European level, and second, at the bilateral level?

[Answer] I answered the essential part of this question a while ago. For me, any consultation, any true consultation, implies greater intimacy. Since his appointment, George Shultz has had a very busy agenda in Washington. This will only be his second large-scale tour abroad, the first being in Latin America with President Reagan while the second is this European tour. Many months have therefore gone by without him directly meeting principal European officials. He has met some in Washington. But visiting them, listening to them in their countries for a whole day, examining problems such as the FRG's or France's rights is not the same thing as receiving a French or a German official in Washington. So I hold the view that it is highly advisable for a man of George Shultz's quality to acquaint himself with our difficulties, to listen to us, if I should use the expression used just a while ago.

I said a man of George Shultz's quality because I do want, in front of newsmen, to praise a man for whom I have great respect and admiration. So I will now mention my own appreciation of him, which is very remarkable.

I will only mention his experience as a former secretary of the treasury, a former businessman, a man who knows very well the political reality which brought the U.S. President to power. He is a man with great capacity in view of his experience and his personal authority, which is quite remarkable. The fact that this man should acquaint himself with and become impregnated with the problems of Europeans for a few days is -- according to me -- by far the most important thing to do. And then, we will of course discuss various problems. Already, we have examined them across the Atlantic: the Middle East; East-West relations, which I brought up some time ago; what can we expect, what must we expect from the new authorities in Moscow and Poland? Also, I hope that we will be able to examine economic problems within the framework of the international situation which I spoke of just a while ago.

SOVIET CRITICISM OF REPORTING ON USSR NOTED

LD221024 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Our national radio and television are decidely in the focus of attention. After the statement by the French Communist Party Political Bureau denouncing the way Radio France and the three television channels handle news, it is the turn of the Soviet Union's Paris embassy to criticize the journalists of these radio and television companies. The chairmen and managing directors of the TF1, Antenne-2 and FR3 channels have just received a letter from the Soviet Embassy denouncing the way in which the television news programs report what is happening in the Soviet Union. For its part, the official agency TASS accuses French radio and television of waging a vast campaign of falsifying facts and stupefying the population.

USSR AWARDS GAS PLANT CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT

NC212127 Paris AFP in English 1816 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Moscow, Dec 21 (AFP) -- France today won a 2,709 million franc (387 million dollar) contract to build a gas desulphurisation plant in the Soviet Union, French trade sources said here. The accord was signed by Soviet External Trade Minister Nikolay Patolichev and Jacques Celerier, a representative of the French firm Technip.

The plant forms part of the Soviet "Astrakhan" project to extract and process gas in the area north of the Caspian Sea.

The plant will be built by Technip in association with the French firms Creusot Loire and Heurty. Delivery will start in 1984 and payment will be in cash.

The contract has doubled Soviet purchases from France this year to 5,000 million francs (714 million dollars).

ELYSEE SPOKESMAN ON TALKS WITH BENDJEDID

PM201333 Paris LE MONDE in French 19-20 Dec 82 p 3

[Paul Balta report: "I Clarified With Mr Mitterrand Matters of Concern to the Two Countries"]

[Text] Kassaman (the oath), the Algerian national anthem, which was also the National Liberation Front's national anthem, was played for the first time in Paris on Friday, 17 December, when President Chadli Bendjedid arrived for a brief working visit. It will be played again in the fall of 1983 when the head of state returns, for an official visit this time. The decision in principle on that visit, announced by Elysee spokesman Michel Vauzelle, was taken during the lunch given by Mr Mitterrand in honor of his Algerian guests and their entourage.

"There are no clouds, not even a slight mist, in Franco-Algerian relations. They are as good as can be expected," Mr Bendjedid said as he left the Elysee, before, however, specifying that he had "clarified with President Mitterrand matters of concern to the two countries."

The most delicate point concerned the turning back of Algerian nationals on their arrival in France. It is because of these incidents that French Ambassador in Algiers Guy Georgi has been summoned to the Algerian Foreign Ministry eight times in 3 months. It is apparently because they despaired of achieving success by diplomatic approaches that the Algerian leaders took the risk of giving some publicity to the affair.

During the talks, Mr Bendjedid reaffirmed that his country, which suspended emigration in 1973, "has no desire to export labor to France." On the contrary, he stressed that Algeria, which created a National Committee for Reintegration in 1980, wants the skilled workers it needs to return. Mr Mitterrand, for his part, gave directives for the question of people being turned back to be settled within 2 weeks. Since the two sides were agreed on guaranteeing freedom of circulation while protecting France against the entry of "false tourists," Mr Vauzelle announced that a delegation will leave for Algiers and the other Maghreb capitals next week for consultations to draw up rules to ensure that these principles are respected.

Since Mr Mitterrrand raised the question of the sale of property belonging to French nationals who have lived in Algeria for a long time, President Bendjedid said that, to the best of his knowledge, the problem has been solved and that the French Foreign Ministry was informed of it 2 weeks ago. According to him, the Algerian state will buy any property put up for sale and immediately transfer all the revenue from the sale to France. Since similar promises have been made in the past but their implementation hindered at the administrative level, it is to be hoped that there will be no further obstacles this time.

Mr Mitterrand also raised the problem of the private rights of French nationals living in Algeria (divorce, custody of children, cemeteries and so forth). In that connection, Mr Vauzelle expressed the hope that "considerable progress" might be made before the end of the year.

"An Atmosphere of Confidence"

President Bendjedid welcomed the smooth execution of economic contracts, "which are following their normal course." Nonetheless, he expressed the desire for an improvement in the accompanying cooperation (transfer of technology, training and so forth), which does not yet seem to be running smoothly in the field. Mr Mitterrand gave instructions for the Joint Technical Cooperation Commission, which is due to meet on 20 December, to tackle the point.

The question of the Franco-Moroccan military maneuvers was also settled. The Algerians had been offended by those exercises and had pointed out that the United States had informed them 1 month in advance that it, too, was carrying out maneuvers with the Moroccan forces. In fact, the maneuvers carried out by the two countries were not on a comparable scale; furthermore the Franco-Moroccan maneuvers were a routine matter but Algiers' attention was drawn by the fact that Rabat, unlike the previous occasions, placed them in the spotlight by alerting the press.

In the international sphere, the two presidents discussed the Near East and African matters. Mr Vauzelle specified that Mr Mitterrand emphasized the idea of the independence of nations and peoples and, in particular, the Saharan people's right to self-determination, the OAU's role in ensuring respect for the Africans' independence and "anything which might help break the superpowers' Iran grip."

Finally, Mr Vauzelle stressed "the exceptional atmosphere of confidence and friendship reaffirmed in a spectacular way" between the two countries during this visit. The Algerians echoed that statement. "There is no longer any misunderstanding," a delegation member told us. "This meeting has given a new impetus to friendly and trusting cooperation. Thanks to it, the ball is continuing to roll as usual."

JUNBLATT URGES MORE ACTIVE FRENCH LEBANON POLICY

PM200943 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Dec 82 p 5

[Unattributed report: "Mr Junblatt Wants France To 'Have a Clearer Policy in Lebanon'"]

[Text] Lebanese Progressive Socialist Party leader Walid Junblatt, who arrived in Paris on Sunday, 12 December, had a meeting on Monday with Mr Francois de Grossouvre, aide to the president of the republic and regarded as one of the preferred interlocutors of prominent Lebanese figures visiting Paris. Mr Junblatt, who will be received by External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson on Thursday, expressed the wish, when speaking to the Diplomatic Press Association on Tuesday, 14 December, that France should have a "clearer policy in Lebanon" and not follow the U.S. lead. "France," he said, "understands Lebanon better than the United States does and, with a clearer and more active policy, it could work more effectively for our country's independence."

The young Druze leader advocated the strengthening of the multinational force in Lebanon and its deployment in "regions controlled by the Israelis and Phalangists." "The multinational force," he added, "ought to play a more effective role and be more independent of the United States. President Sarkis believed the famous American guarantees. Some 2 or 3 months ago, Washington promised that the Israelis would withdraw from Lebanese territory before the end of the year. In fact, nothing has happened. The Israeli conditions are becoming increasingly tough.... The UN interim force in Lebanon must be given a more active role."

Mr Junblatt also condemned the Phalangists' "hegemonist" designs in the Lebanese mountain region where fighting between Druzes and Maronites has killed between 200 and 300 people in the past 6 weeks, according to him. "The Phalangists," he said, "represent a section of opinion, but also have a totalitarian plan which is likely to draw the Christians into a dangerous adventure. Indeed, on the pretext of protecting Christian interests, they are trying to protect the Christian community's ruling class."

Turning to the rapprochement which has been started with President Amin al-Jumayyil, Mr Junblatt described him as "moderate" and expressed the view that he might succeed and save Lebanon, "if he has the necessary guarantees to successfully accomplish his task." He stated that he was not "hostile in principle to peace with Israel, but not at the expense of Lebanon's freedom and independence and of concessions which would amount to giving a 'bonus to aggression.'" He also said he opposes Lebanon serving as "a springboard for giving Israel access to the Arab world."

Finally, Mr Junblatt mentioned the attack which was recently made on him. "That attack," he said, "was to be expected. It was perpetrated by extremists who want to avenge Bashir al-Jumayyil's death. I have no specific proof, but I accuse the Phalangists and Israel of trying to kill me."

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES DEBATES TIES WITH BULGARIA

AU201608 Rome ANSA in English 1550 GMT 20 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 20 -- Relations between Italian and Bulgaria, strained over recent probes into international terrorist plots, particularly with regard to the attempt to assassinate the pope in Rome last year, were debated in the Italian Chamber of Deputies today. The debate, urged by all Italian political forces, was opened with reports from Justice Minister Clelio Darida, Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio, Interior Minister Virginio Rognoni and Foreign Affairs Minister Emilio Colombo.

Darida outlined the various stages of the probe into the shooting of John Paul II on May 13, 1981. He also reported on the uncovering of a colossal arms and drugs trafficking ring which has so far led to the issuance of over 200 international arrest warrants.

The justice minister also briefed the M.P.s on the case of Luigi Scricciolo, an Italian union official who had contacts with the Bulgarian secret service and with Italian Red Brigades terrorists. With respect to the shooting of the pope, the minister noted that Turkish gunman Mehmet Ali Agca, currently serving a life sentence in Italy for firing the bullets at the pontiff, was under heavy guard to protect his life. It was learned that Agca spent 50 days in Bulgaria, between July and August of 1980.

Agca has fingered three Bulgarian citizens as accomplices in the plot to kill the pope. Ilario Martella, the Italian judge investigating the attack on the pope, has accused the trio of complicity in the assassination. The three are Sergey Ivanov Antonov, the head of the Balkan Airline office here who is currently under arrest in Rome, and two Bulgarian diplomats -- Todor Ayvazov and Zhelyu Kolev Vasilev -- who have returned to Sofia.

The following Turkish citizens have also been implicated in the case: Omear Bagci, Musa Cerdar Belebi, Bekir Celenk and Oral Celik. They are all linked in one way or another with Turkey's extreme rightwing organization "gray wolves". Bekir Celenk and Oral Celik are still at large.

Bekir took part Saturday in a press conference in Sofia in which he denied any connection to the assassination attempt. Italy has requested his extradition.

The justice minister reported on the giant arms and drug trafficking ring which uses Sofia as one of its key contact points. Italy has indicted 77 persons in the case so far. The minister said it was singular, to say the least, that Bulgarian officials who are so careful to keep an eye on foreign citizens, were unaware of trafficking of such enormous dimensions.

Darida said that the investigations were prying into the role played by Scricciolo in alleged political and military spying for Bulgaria. The UIL union official is also accused of taking part in armed gangs and of contacting the Red Brigades to obtain the verbal testimony NATO General James Lee Dozier gave to his Brigades captors. The American general was kidnapped by the terrorists a year ago and later freed by Italian police.

The Scricciolo probe is currently focusing on the eventual penal responsibility of two Bulgarian citizens -- Ivan Darichev and Simeon Guernev -- employees at the Bulgarian Embassy in Italy. These two are suspected of passing on information on NATO's structure and Italy's military defense, Darida said.

More on Debate

AU210845 Rome ANSA in English 0825 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 21 -- Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio told the lower house Monday that the assassination attempt against the Polish-born pope in May last year was "a true act of war in time of peace, a precautionary and alternative solution to the invasion of Poland", in a session given over to allegations of Bulgarian involvement in the shooting of the pope, in Italian political violence, and in an arms and drugs ring uncovered in the nation.

The ministers for justice, the interior, defense and foreign affairs discussed the government's handling of the growing list of implications of Bulgarian involvement in criminal activity, at the center of three separate investigations here, in response to a backlog of M.P.s queries. Their statements were followed by declarations on the developments made by party spokesmen.

The justice minister, Clelio Darida, reconstructed the investigation into the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II and discussed the positions of the Turkish and Bulgarian nationals implicated in the attack. Turkish terrorist Mehmet Ali Agca, sentenced to death in Turkey for killing a newspaper editor, is serving a life term in Italy for the shooting.

Speaking of the widespread investigation underway in north Italy into a huge traffic of arms and drugs, the minister said, "Sofia represents one of the principle points of contact for the suppliers of drugs and arms".

The minister named the Berlin Cafe and the Vitosha Hotel in the Bulgarian capital as two of the more important meeting places of international drug and arms traffickers.

Moving on to one of the other two investigations which have reportedly turned up the Bulgarian connection, Darida outlined progress made in the case of Luigi Scricciolo, the head of the foreign bureau of the socialist-dominated UIL Trade Union Federation at the time of his arrest last February. Scricciolo is charged with aiding and abetting Red Brigades terrorist kidnappers of American Army General James Lee Dozier, abducted December 17 last year and freed at the end of the following January by anti-terrorist police. The former union official is also charged with attempted espionage for Bulgaria.

In connection with this case, the justice minister said that investigating magistrates are now attempting to assess the criminal responsibility of two Bulgarian employees of the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome, Ivan Darichev and Simeon Guernev. The pair were said to have been seeking information on NATO and Italy's defense system.

Scricciolo allegedly contacted the Brigade kidnappers of the American general, who was second in command of NATO ground forces in Europe at the time.

Virginio Rognoni of the interior, in his response to queries raised in Parliament, insisted that the Rome government has never underestimated the problem of possible international links to domestic terrorism. "For some time", the minister said, "there has been proof of ties among the various terrorist movements in the nation and between these and the terrorism which moves within the Arab-Israeli conflict and, in general, in the Mideast region".

With reference to the trio of investigations -- into the shooting of the pope, the arms and drug traffic and the Scricciolo case -- Rognoni said there is no doubt of the connections to Bulgaria.

The defense minister, in his remarks to the house, appeared to substantiate the theory that the bid on the pope's life was planned in the context of a design to destabilize Poland, to cut short the free trade union Solidarnosc movement and return the Eastern European state firmly to the Soviet orbit. After describing the assassination attempt as a "precautionary and alternative solution to the invasion of Poland", the minister said, "this justifies the most widespread concern for the Bulgarian lead and for the international tensions it can cause".

On the arms and drug traffic, Lagorio asserted that a Bulgarian company was "always present" in these activities and reported that for this reason a ban was placed on the sale of Italian arms to Bulgaria. In remarks on the Scricciolo case which tied in with a statement made by the justice minister, Lagorio said that during the time the American general was in the hands of his Brigade captors, a considerable increase in cipher traffic between Italy and Bulgaria was noted and the Italian counterespionage service interpreted this surge in volume as an indication of a corresponding upswing in the "activism" of Bulgarian undercover operatives in Italy.

Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, the last member of the cabinet to speak to the house Monday, insisted that the government "did not understimate the seriousness of indications which were emerging and will handle the findings of the investigations in a concrete and responsible fashion". On the diplomatic steps taken and planned, the minister declared that "they have not been and will not be influenced by excessive caution but are closely bound up with a political judgement which will be reached on the basis of certain and ascertained facts".

From the floor, the whip for the Socialist Party, one of the partners in the four-party cabinet, declared that "it is evident that Italy is seen as the soft underbelly of the alliance system" and asserted that, "what the Socialists said 2 years ago has been confirmed even in the prudent report from the foreign minister".

From the opposition, a spokesman for the fourth-ranking neofascist MSI, just after the third-place Socialists in Parliament, reaffirmed his party's demand for breaking diplomatic relations with Bulgaria and the recall of the Italian ambassador to Moscow.

An M.P. for the Radical Party, the smallest but most outspoken in Parliament, accused the foreign minister of seeking to "safeguard commercial relations with the Eastern European countries". The Radical M.P. then said that "any other parliament would have already fired the four ministers".

A Liberal Party spokesman, whose party is one of the junior partners in the Rome coalition, reiterated the party position against severing diplomatic ties with Bulgaria and the Social Democrats, the other minor party in the cabinet, called for a freeze in these ties with the Eastern state described as a "strong arm" for Soviet destabilization policy.

The opposition heavyweight, the Communist Party, second in size only to the premier's Christian Democrat Party, recommended that "the campaign to demonstrate that all the leads passed only through Sofia should not be furthered" and called for a full assessment of all the facts surrounding the Bulgaria connection.

RED BRIGADES DOZIER KIDNAPPERS APPEAL SENTENCE

NC212154 Paris AFP in English 2124 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Venice, Italy, Dec 21 (AFP) -- The appeal of 16 Red Brigades members sentenced to heavy prison sentences for kidnapping American General James Lee Dozier in November 1981 opened here today as police investigated an alleged Bulgarian role in the affair.

Repentant member of the left-wing terrorist group and head of the commando which kidnapped General Dozier, Antonio Savasta, has told police that Bulgarian intelligence had proposed liaising with the Red Brigades over the Dozier kidnapping. Mr. Savasta will be questioned now on the part played by unionist Luigi Scricciolo, who was arrested recently and charged with being the connection between the Red Brigades and the Bulgarian secret services.

Mr Scricciolo is alleged by investigators to have handed over to the Bulgarians documents of the Red Brigades' questioning of General Dozier, who was held in a Padua apartment for 442 [as received] days before being rescued by Italy's anti-terrorist squad.

Mr Savasta and his girl friend, Emilia Libera, benefited from reduced sentences because of their cooperation with police. They were sentenced, respectively, to 16-and-a-half and 14 years in prison. The heaviest sentence of 27 years went to a hard line member of the group, Cesare di Lenardo.

Some 1,357 terrorists have been jailed since the successful end of the Dozier affair, which gave Italian police a massive breakthrough in its battle against left terrorism.

PERTINI ON BULGARIA, HUMAN RIGHTS, SUPERPOWERS

AU210916 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 21 -- Head of state Sandro Pertini declared that his major concern centers on "the two superpowers who are rearming when the survival of mankind is at stake" in his traditional Christmas message to the diplomatic corps in Rome assembled at the presidential Quirinale residence. In his statement, Italy's 86-year-old president touched on terrorism at home, human rights conditions in Poland and Latin America and dissidence in the Soviet Union.

With reference to allegations of Bulgarian involvement in political violence in Italy and in the attempt on the life of Pope John Paul II last year, Pertini declared, "one day we will know who unleashed terrorism in Italy. I saw who unleashed it because, fortunately, terrorism is on the decline in our country... In prison, we have some 300 terrorists who have turned states evidence and are talking".

Speaking of the pontiff and his country of birth, "he is thinking of his country, Poland, and I am near him".

He asserted that human rights in Poland and elsewhere have always been of vital interest to him. "This is a right which I support. We protested and we are still protesting what happened and is happening in Poland and Afghanistan. But if one wants the right to protest for these two countries, one must also protest against what happens in some Central and South American states and in South Africa. In this area, we have our cards in order because we have always let our protests be heard", Pertini added.

Pertini went on to recall for the diplomats accredited to Rome his initiatives for the Soviet dissident, Anatoly Sharansky, and the letter he wrote in this connection to the Soviet president of the time, Leonid Brezhnev.

"That head of state replied with a letter which really surprised me", the president said and added, "He told me that that was a domestic matter which concerned only his country.

"No sir", the Italian statesman firmly countered. "When he signed the Helsinki Final Act (at the end of the European Conference on Cooperation and Security in 1979) he put his signature to a statement of human rights of the United Nations and for those acts, one must respond to the entire world...".

After referring to his priority concern for hunger in the world, the head of state said that he was mainly worried about the survival of mankind in the midst of the present arms buildup by the Soviet Union and the United States.

"Europe could do much in this area, could become a mediator between the two superpowers", he said and added, "but today Europe is not making its voice heard or, at least, not loud enough in this direction and its role is not what it could be".

COLOMBO COMMENTS ON GENEVA TALKS POSITIONS

PM201003 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 16 Dec 82 pp 1, 10

[Letter to LA REPUBBLICA from Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo: "There Must Be Parity in Missiles"]

[Text] Dear Editor, I read with interest LA REPUBBLICA's report today headlined "Something Has Happened in Geneva, But Italy Hasn't Noticed" concerning Italy's -- and in particular the Foreign Ministry's -- stance regarding the Geneva negotiations on medium-range missiles. Since, to our satisfaction, your newspaper constantly follows issues such as those of disarmament, which are central to our policy, I consider it opportune to specify certain points that constitute the basis of the government's position on the Geneva negotiations.

Italy has perceived the bargaining element that can be deduced from the Soviet proposals and has emphasized it, as other governments have. The Foreign Ministry's comment in fact states that they could constitute a step in the right direction and open up positive prospects for negotiations, since they imply a political willingness to accept NATO's proposal to concentrate negotiations initially on Soviet and U.S. medium-range missiles -- a willingness that has hitherto never been expressed at the negotiating table.

I do not believe it is consistent with Italy's positions to state that "Italy was left alone in defending the zero option on the Euromissiles and in rejecting any alternative solution that would open the way to a reduction of the Pershing II's, the cruise missiles and the SS-20's."

In fact for Italy, as for all the NATO countries, the zero option is the optimal solution inasmuch as it would eliminate an entire category of missile systems -- on both sides, of course -- which have particularly destabilizing characteristics, especially for Europe. This was confirmed again at the latest meeting of the Atlantic council. However, it is obvious that the optimal solution may prove unattainable, at least in the first phase. Therefore we have never ruled out -- as is stated, for that matter, by all Atlantic council communiques since 1979 -- taking into consideration constructive alternative proposals from the Eastern bloc. I myself, reporting to Italian journalists in Brussels on the results of the 10 December Atlantic council meeting -- as ANSA faithfully reported -- stressed that "the NATO countries confirmed the zero option, which implies the abandonment of the deployment of Euromissiles in exchange for the destruction of the Soviet SS-20 missiles, and also the willingness to consider any other constructive proposal."

As far as the merits of the proposals are concerned, it seems to me that, for them to be defined as constructive, they would have to be based on the principle of equality. If there is a "zero" for one side, there must be a "zero" on the other side too. If there can be no "zero" in the Eastern bloc, then the same would have to be agreed for the West. Unfortunately the recent Soviet indications reported by the NEW YORK TIMES presented in a somewhat simplified form, moreover, do not yet seem to be moving in that direction, for the reasons amply laid down in the Foreign Ministry's comment.

However, we and our allies assess any indication of movement on the Soviet side with the utmost attention, though in the case in question the disclosure originating from Washington has not been confirmed by the Soviet side, as far as I know.

MOZAMBIQUE ENERGY MINISTER CONCLUDES VISIT

AU181948 Rome ANSA in English 1933 GMT 18 Dec 82

[Text] [ANSA) -- Rome, December 18 -- Mozambique's Minister for Industry and Energy Antonio Branco concluded a visit to Italy today after talks with leading businessmen and Italian Government officials, including Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Industry Minister Filippo Maria Pandolfi.

A communique from the Mozambican Embassy here described the meetings as "very important" for a "balanced development of political and economic relations" between the two countries. The statement added that this was all the more important at a time when Mozambique needs "vast solidarity" because it is facing "attacks from the South African Armed Forces, which are trying to destabilize its economic growth".

POPE RECEIVES HUNGARIAN FOREIGN MINISTER

AU171924 Rome ANSA in English 1910 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Vatican City, December 17 -- For the second time since the communists came to power in Budapest a pope has received a high-ranking member of the Hungarian Government. John Paul II today granted a audience to Hungarian Foreign Minister Frigyes Puja.

On June 9, Pope Paul VI received Janos Kadar, first secretary of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party. It was believed that today's talks in the Vatican centered on church-state relations and key international problems.

At the present time, church-state relations in Hungary are considered the best among the Eastern European nations.

Hungarian Primate Laszlo Lekai, archbishop of Esztergom, has been accused by some of being excessively compliant with the Budapest regime. However, reports that the pope frowned on Lekai's alleged submissiveness were denied in an interview the primate granted to ANSA at the beginning of December.

LEBANESE AMBASSADOR INVITES POPE TO VISIT

AU172141 Rome ANSA in English 1920 GMT 17 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 17 -- the New Lebanese ambassador to the Holy See Nasri Salhab, who arrived here from Beirut today, said that the pope could come to Lebanon whenever he wished. "The pope does not need official invitations to visit Lebanon; his presence will always be a blessing for us", Salhab said.

The pope has several times over the past six months voiced his desire to travel to that mideastern country. In fact, there had even been semi-official talks that he would make the trip over the Christmas holiday period. However, this week the Vatican press office announced that John Paul would spend both Christmas and the New Year holidays in the Vatican, only travelling to Riti, a city not far from Rome, on Sunday, January 2. Ambassador Salhab arrived here to replace Antoine Fattal who has been the Lebanese representative at the Vatican since 1977.

Referring to the situation in his homeland, (Salhab) said that while hotspots of tension still exist, he hoped that Lebanon would soon achieve full normalization.

POPE WARNS OF DANGER OF NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION

AU181945 Rome ANSA in English 1930 GMT 18 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Vatican City, December 18 -- The threats which nuclear proliferation poses for the world were once more evoked by Pope John Paul II today in a speech here to an international symposium promoted by Italy's National Nuclear Physics Institute. But the leader of the world's Catholics also underscored the "nobility and utility" of scientific including nuclear, research, even though he said men involved in this field must show a great sense of responsibility.

"When you hear people talking about nuclear and subnuclear energy", he said, "you cannot avoid thinking of the destructive effects of modern arms".

"There is no doubt that they are one of the gravest threats for mankind. People of all social and cultural horizons do not cease to point this out. My predecessors, and I myself, have often called the attention of politicians and scientists to this grave danger, above all if governments do not have the wisdom or will to contain the production and accumulation of these terrible machines of death."

In other points, the pope asserted the legitimacy and good that may derive for humanity from studies on the peaceful application of nuclear energy. But he made it clear that technology in this field "requires increasing prudence, information and cooperation in order to serve human needs in terms of nutrition and energy."

POPE MESSAGE CONTAINS VEILED REFERENCE TO POLAND

NC201554 Paris AFP in English 1545 GMT 20 Dec 82

[Text] Vatican City, Dec 20 (AFP) -- Pope John Paul II has compared the absence of dialogue between a government and its people to a "state of war," in a message to be read on New Year's Day. "When unfortunately dialogue between government and people is absent, social peace is threatened," he said in a prepared text to mark the 16th World Day of Peace. "It is like a state of war."

In a veiled reference to his native Poland, the pontiff said dialogue was "fixed and sterile" where "certain parties" regard struggle as the moving force in history and "discernment of the enemy the ABC of politics." He warned against the attitude of people or their leaders who "concede nothing," claiming already to be the "measure of justice."

The will to power by leaders, he continued, often coincides with an "exaggerated and out-of-date concept" of state security and sovereignty.

The pope is scheduled to visit Poland next spring for ceremonies marking the sixth centenary of the black virgin icon at Kestochowa. An earlier visit was postponed because of Poland's continuing state of siege.

Polish authorities have said they will suspend martial law at the end of this month. The pope, in his New Year's Day message, called the dialogue for peace the uppermost "challenge for our time."

THATCHER VIEWS ANDROPOV MISSILE REDUCTION OFFER

LD211706 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1647 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] The effect of the new offer by Soviet leader, Yuriy Andropov, to cut the number of ss-20 missiles would be to reduce security for Britain, Mrs Thatcher said in the Commons today. Pressed to comment at question time on Mr Andropov's first major speech as Soviet leader, Mrs Thatcher said "from what we know of the speech, what he is proposing is to reduce the number of SS-20's by a proportion. But the effect of what he is proposing is to leave the United States with zero intermediate-range nuclear missiles, while he has a very considerable number left. That does not seem to me to be able to keep the essential balance which is required for our security."

Mrs Thatcher went on: "We require in this country not the peace of Poland, or the peace of Czechoslovakia, or the peace of Stalin, but we require peace with freedom and justice."

Mrs Thatcher was told by Labour's Martin Flannery, MP for Sheffield, Hillsborough, that the government should stop accusing the anti-nuclear lobby of sympathising with the Soviet Union. "Do you realise the massively-growing peace movement springs from the fact the whole world is terrified of a mistake being made by either side which could plunge us all into a nuclear Armageddon?" he said.

Pym's Reaction

LD212312 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2304 GMT 21 Dec 82

[By Chris Moncrieff, PA chief political correspondent]

[Text] The Government tonight remained totally sceptical about the offer by Soviet leader Yuriy Andropov to cut the Soviet Union's number of SS-20 missiles.

Both Mrs Thatcher and Foreign Secretary Mr Francis Pym have warned that Mr Andropov's proposals would leave the United States with no intermediate range nuclear missiles while Moscow had plenty left.

Mrs Thatcher has told MP's that Mr Andropov's proposal does not appear sufficient to maintain the balance essential for Britain's security. Mr Pym has been even more forthright about the Moscow initiative. Tonight he reacted sharply to the way missiles figures were being juggled to improve the look of the latest Russian offer. A genuine reduction in arms was what he wanted, Mr Pym said in an ITN interview on news at ten.

"The West has been in the driving seat in putting a zero option, that is to say, no missiles on the Russian side and no deployment of cruise missiles on our side. We have not got any of these things deployed."

"They've got 330 of them, with three warheads each, so that is 1,000 warheads on the SS-20's alone. We want to reduce arms. The only reason why the Russians are at the negotiating table is because we have a commitment to deploy these cruise missiles if the arms control talks do not succeed," Mr Pym said.

"If we had not taken that decision; if we were not going to deploy them; if there was a failure at the arms control talks, the Russians would not be at the negotiating table. And I am sure that people in the peace movement are just as enthusiastic for the Russians to reduce theirs as they are for the West to limit theirs."

Mr Pym said that NATO had been by far the best peace-keeping movement the West had. Since 1945, there had been no war in Europe he said.

"I want to make quite sure that, when we reduce armaments, it is on a balanced basis on both sides, and very final. That's the way to peace. If this means that, in principle, they are prepared to reduce their SS-20's then that is a small step, but, bearing in mind the imbalance which exists -- and the need to have our security protected by a balanced arrangement -- you will realise that the proposals have got to be examined very carefully. It is no good going along with any arrangement which seems, on the face of it, to be very attractive if it is not going to work in the long run."

MINISTER HURD DISCUSSES POLICY ON MIDDLE EAST

GF222048 Doha QNA in Arabic 0850 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Kuwait, 21 Dec (QNA) -- Douglas Hurd, British minister of state for foreign and commonwealth affairs, has stressed that Britain looks forward to receiving the delegation of the Arab countries because it wants to listen to the views of its "Arab friends." He said that Britain still has contacts with King Hasan II of Morocco, the head of the delegation. He expressed his country's hope that the visit will take place during the next few months.

In a statement to the Kuwaiti paper AL-ANBA' published today, he noted that Britain supports the rights of the Palestinians, and this implicitly implies it is up to them to determine their future so if they choose a Palestinian state, they cannot be denied that. He pointed out that there are other options such as union with Jordan. He stressed that Britain believes that Jordan plays an important role in the peace process and supports any agreement that may be reached between PLO Chairman Yasir 'Arafat and King Husayn of Jordan.

Douglas Hurd added that the Arab and U.S. peace plans contain elements which Britain approves, but the Israeli stance is, unfortunately, still opposed to these plans. He emphasized that if Britain succeeds in making little progress in the direction of reconciliating the two plans, then the United States will be in a position that would allow it to pressure Israel. He noted that Britain uses its influence with the Americans, particularly in matters dealing with reaching appropriate solutions on the issue of the West Bank and in attempting to bring together the Arabs and the Americans.

Hurd added that Britain knows what it will do in order to make progress in the direction of reaching a settlement in the Middle East. He indicated that what will be done is a reconciliation between the Fes plan and the Reagan plan.

ROLANDHIS INTERVIEWED ON VISIT TO FRANCE

NC212041 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Interview with Cyprus Foreign Minister Nikos Rolandhis by Pavlos Pavlou of the Cyrpus Broadcasting Corporation -- date not given -- live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, the Cyprus problem, Cyprus' relations with France as well as Cyprus' relations with the EEC, were the main issues of your talks [with French leaders]. Can you give more detail on the content of your talks?

[Answer] Mr Pavlou, I went to France at the invitation of Foreign Minister Cheysson on an official visit. This is the first official visit by a Cypriot minister and for this reason it is rather significant. France is a permament member of the Security Council and one of the currently great countries. I had about 3 hours of talks with Cheysson exclusively on the Cyprus problem. He was very much interested. We dwelt on all details -- the past, the future, prospects opening up and the methods which should be used. Specifically, he told me that his interest increased ever since he had the chance to come to Cyprus. Recently he passed through twice on short visits while going to Lebanon. He had the opportunity to lay his finger on the mark of the nails [allusion to doubting Thomas meaning to "see for oneself"], and in fact I believe that this is very useful. I saw a similar usefullness in the case of the 29 ministers who came in the summer for the Nonaligned Conference here in Cyprus. To come to Cyprus to see the occupation, the people who live under occupation, the troops, is of great significance.

[Question] After all, Cheysson has been invited by you to visit Cyprus.

[Answer] He has been invited and judging by what he said he will come next year. He will be here in 1983 because France plays a significant role in the area, the area of the Middle East and the eastern Mediterranean, and we are in this area. Consequently it has an interest.

[Question] Mr Rolandhis, you also had contacts and talks with Poher [Alain Poher, president of the French Parliament] and Chandernagor. Can you refer to these contacts, too?

[Answer] I discussed the Cyprus problem again with Poher who, as is well known, is a humanist. He showed interest in the issue of the missing persons. We sat for 1 hour and talked about this issue. With Chandernagor, who is minister for European issues, we discussed the well-known issue, our issue with the EEC, who essentially is interminable. As you know we have many problems with the EEC which are not of our doing. We have an agreement since 1972 and rightfully we ask that it be implemented. Normally we should have entered a customs union by the end of 1982. Nevertheless, we have not entered because France and Italy especially have domestic problems with their own farmers and thus prolong the implementation of our agreement until the Community's agricultural policy has been defined along with what is called the Community's Mediterranean aspect, that is, the Mediterranean countries' interest, the countries of North Africa, the Magreb countries, and also Israel and Turkey. Before advancing Cyprus' issue, they want to see what repercussions these countries will have on the EEC. Undoubtedly this is unfair to us, but this is the position of France and Italy. I think that in 1983 we shall have some small improvement after negotiations have been held, and then we shall aim at the period after 1983-84. Something positive that Chandernagor told me on this issue is that they expect within 1983 the study for this Mediterranean dimension to have been completed. As a result, these countries, these two countries, will be in a position to make decisions.

[Question] Mr Minister, you have expressed satisfaction with your visit in general and already you have commented on this fact. My question concerns the following: It is well known and you have mentioned it that both Italy and France have put forth some obstacles on the issue of our agricultural produce. Was this issue touched upon during your contacts and if so...

[Answer] [Rolandhis interrupts] Most certainly this was the object of the talks, but difficulty continues to exist, there is a practical difficulty. They cannot promise us many things. Please note that the representations we have made toward France we have also made in the past toward Italy many times, at various levels. A few weeks ago in Luxembourg I had the opportunity to again discuss the issue before the Ministerial Council when we had held a special meeting on Cyprus. Unfortunately, we have not been able yet to break this barrier, but we continue trying because we believe that the promotion of the issue of the customs union should be one of the goals of the Cyprus Government. The other countries, France and Italy, understand our problem but they mention that they have their own major issues. Naturally we say: Why are we to blame for this? Why should we be blamed if you have problems? Why should we pay for this? Nevertheless, we have not been able to solve this problem thus far.

[Question] Mr Rolandhis, more generally concerning the Cyprus problem. We are at the end of the year. In retrospect how do you evaluate the progress of the Cyprus problem?

[Answer] Pavlos, I prefer to look forward, but I will tell you in retrospect, in general, how I see the problem. We have done everything we could on the Cyprus problem this year and the years that passed. On the one hand we have dialogue, the intercommunal talks. This is a difficult procedure especially when one talks with the Turks who are excessively intransigent. They have the power and they rely on it. Essentially the dialogue has not produced substantive results, it has produced very few things. Yet as a whole I believe this procedure has proven to be useful and beneficial. After all, this is the position of the international community, the Western countries, the Eastern countries and the nonaligned. I cannot think of even one case when I was told that they do not consider the dialogue to be the correct procedure. After all, the dialogue is a procedure, it is a vehicle to take us, to carry us, to a result. The dialogue is not the substance. Substance is what we exchange, the thoughts, the positions, that is the substance. As regards the Cyprus problem's international aspect, I believe, without wishing to exaggerate, that Cyprus has some perceptible presence everywhere. We are not a great country, we are not a great power, we cannot see ourselves outside the framework of our size; but within this framework I think we have achieved much. I will enumerate some of these achievements: This year, for the fourth time we are vice chairman of the UN General Assembly, we are vice chairman of the nonaligned, we are members of the nonaligned coordinating office, we are the chairman of the nonaligned's European group, we were twice general speaker, which is a very significant position. In Europe, our role is well known. We contributed to the start of the Madrid conference, we, with three other foreign ministers. In the Council of Europe, Cyprus' voice is heard constantly as it is in the Commonwealth.

[Question] Our role in the case of the Middle East problem was significant, something that was appreciated...

[Answer] We brought 65 countries here on the Middle East problem. A conference was held, 29 foreign ministers came. In our bilateral relations, which essentially are an international aspect [as heard] we have extended the embassy network by 50 percent.

We had about 30 new accreditations, 26 new consulates; that is, Cyprus' network, both toward the outside and from the outside toward Cyprus, has increased terrifically, to a terrific extent. Our embassies are active constantly in all directions to enlighten governments and people through newspapers and other mass media. We do these things continuously. What the future has in store for us is difficult for one to say. Naturally to speak of a political future we must put the elections behind us, because then we shall have a government with a new 5-year mandate. In Greece, there is a government with a significant balance in its mandate. It has about 4 more years and I believe that after the elections some concord will prevail in Cyprus so that we may deal as a whole with our national issue which is a national not a government issue. Both governments, Cyprus and Greece, should see how they must work so that they can bring about the desired result.

As I said in the past, many times, the solution of the Cyprus problem lies with Ankara. They hold the key, they have the power, they have the troops. Consequently, what is done to influence the Turks a little is of great significance.

[Question] Consequently, looking ahead, any development depends on the upcoming elections and on one or two other significant events of 1983 which perhaps we can now comment upon, Mr minister. These are the Nonaligned Conference and our recourse to the United Nations.

[Answer] Immediately after the elections we shall have two important events; as you have said one will be the nonaligned summit conference in New Delhi. Certainly Cyprus will participate through its president. This is an important conference for us and I hope we shall be able to secure a strong resolution that normally should be based on the resolution we secured last year in Havana during the foreign ministers' conference early in June, which I attended. After the nonaligned summit conference, we shall resort to the United Nations early in September as we agreed with Papandreou. The recourse should take place sometime then. Naturally, after these two significant international events, both of which are most significant and happen to follow one another, we should see what measures should be taken in the practical field along with the international efforts so that the Cyprus problem can be promoted further.

SPOKESMAN REFUTES DENKTAS' VIEWS ON PARTITION

NC212100 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] In a statement he made this evening, the government spokesman replied to Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas' allegation that the cornerstone of the Makarios-Denktas agreement is that the two partner-people who will comprise the federation will live in their regions and under the administration of their own federated states.

The spokesman said that this statement by Denktas blatantly distorts both the letter and the spirit of the Makarios-Denktas agreement. This agreement, he said, refers to the areas that will be under the administration of each community, but at no point does it mention that the area which will be under Greek Cypriot administration will be exclusively inhabited by Greek Cypriots and that the area which will be under Turkish Cypriot administration will be exclusively inhabited by Turkish Cypriots. The spokesman stressed that the interpretation given by the Turkish Cypriot leader is arbitrary, and added that neither Ethnarch Makarios nor President Kiprianou ever accepted the definition of two areas on the basis of racial criteria.

SPOKESMAN HITS KLIRIDHIS' COMMENTS ON DEFENSE

NC212057 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Commenting on a statement Democratic Rally Chairman Kliridhis made yesterday in connection with Cyprus' defense shield, the government spokesman said that Cyprus' defense is being strengthened methodically and systematically on the basis of the advice and recommendations of experts. He added that the responsible officials are fully aware of their responsibilities in connection with this sector, which is of fundamental significance. The spokesman criticized the Democratic Rally's leadership for having factionalized the very sensitive issue of the defense shield.

DENKTAS MESSAGE ON MARTYRS, STRUGGLE WEEK

TA201701 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 20 Dec 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that if the opportunity presents itself, the Greek Cypriots are capable of implementing the Akritas plan and annihilating the Turkish Cypriots even 50 years from now.

Denktas issued a message on occasion of the Struggle and Martyrs Week that will begin tomorrow. He said that the massacre committed by the Greek Cypriots in Taskent [Vouno], Tatlisu [Akanthou], Terazi, Sandallar [Sandalaris], Murataga [Maratha] and Atilar [Aloa] in a bid to implement the Akritas plan should not be forgotten. Noting that the principles of the Akritas plan should be explained to the youth, Denktas added: This is because those who have prepared and implemented this plan are still leading the Greek Cypriot community. The Greek Orthodox Church, that introduced a meaning and spirit to the plan, is still [word indistinct] those who pursue the national cause in the Greek Cypriot sector and calling on the Greek Cypriot leadership to observe the directives of Greek Prime Minister Papandreou. Denktas said: Individuals and nations can ensure their rights if they assess with a cool head the intentions and plans of those around them and their capabilities in implementing these plans. He recalled Greek Cypriot efforts dating back to 1825 to Hellenize the island. Noting that the [word indistinct] cause of the Greek Cypriots is to annihilate the Turkish Cypriots, Denktas said that [words indistinct]. He added: Those who claim that the Cyprus issue is one created by outside intervention should not forget that this problem dates back to 1825 when the Greek Cypriot leadership and Greece wanted to expand [words indistinct], that it is based on the Megalo idea, that the current Greek prime minister claims that Cyprus is Greek land under occupation, that the Greek Cypriot leadership and Kiprianou — who is proud to [words indistinct] Makarios who considered the destruction of the partnership spirit as a step toward enosis despite the 1955-58 struggle and the 1959-60 agreements — are still struggling to (?do away with) the partnership administration through their ideas on minority and majority groups.

Denktas said that if the realities are (?accepted), the future need not be dark. He added that peace in Cyprus depends on a strong Turkish Cypriot community and on the Greek Cypriot realization that it cannot be fooled.

ROGERS STATEMENT ON LIMNOS ISSUE PROTESTED

NC521313 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 21 Dec 82 p 4

[Text] According to informed sources, the Greek Government has sent a protest to NATO in Brussels about the "unacceptable statements" recently made in Washington by Allied Supreme Commander General Rogers on the issue of Limnos Island and the Turkish violations in the Aegean. Apart from this, according to a statement made by Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos, the Greek Government is closely following the entire issue and will in no way accept Turkish claims that the Athens FIR extend to 6 miles. According to the minister, the Greek Government will demand complete respect of Greece's sovereign rights as they have existed for the past fifty years.

1983 BUDGET APPROVED; PAPANDREOU MAKES STATEMENT

NC221154 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 0700 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] The Chamber of Deputies approved the 1983 state budget early today. A total of 285 deputies voted: 166 in support of the budget and 119 against. Furthermore, 273 deputies voted in support of the defense outlays and 11 voted against. One deputy abstained.

Before voting started, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou addressed the chamber. Addressing the New Democracy deputies, Papandreou said, among other things, that they will suffer a huge defeat because they came as critics, but will leave defeated and condemned not only by the chamber but by the entire Greek nation.

New Democracy, the prime minister added, implemented a policy which had really undermined the country's foundations. In 1982, the year you all forecast would be calamitous, Papandreou underlined, we managed to raise the low income level of the lower-income earners and the pensioners. We managed to give women farmers a pension worthy of them. We managed this while, at the same time, we proceeded with the stabilization of the economy which we inherited from you.

We advance into 1983 with optimism, the prime minister added. We will continue our social policy, the social reformation of Greek society. We will give the Greek worker in the city and the village, the factory and the office, the ability to have a decisive opinion on the country's progress.

PRESIDENT EVREN MAKES VISIT TO INDONESIA

Joint Communique Reported

TA201602 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1545 GMT 20 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 20 (AA) -- President Kenan Evren of Turkey and President Suharto of Indonesia have condemned acts of international terrorism as a serious threat to the world community regardless of their origin, and called for bilateral and multilateral cooperation in a campaign against terrorism. The call was made in a joint communique issued simultaneously in Jakarta and Ankara Monday as President Evren left Indonesia after a four-day official visit.

The two presidents agreed to develop and diversify further economic, industrial and technical cooperation between the two countries, and welcomed the signing of an agreement for such cooperation. They also agreed to strengthen cultural ties under an existing cultural exchange agreement.

Expressing concern over international (?disputes) that threaten world peace and stability, they called for maintaining a dialogue between parties for [word indistinct] to cooperate.

For a just and lasting settlement of the Middle East problem, the two presidents called for Israel's withdrawal from Arab lands it has occupied since 1976 and for recognition of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian people, including their right to their own independent state. They also believed the PLO should fulfill its function as the sole representative of the Palestinian people.

Expressing concern over the loss of human and material resources due to the 2-year old conflict between two Muslim states, Iran and Iraq, the presidents hoped for a speedy and peaceful settlement, and reiterated their support for the efforts of the Islamic peace committee.

They confirmed their view that a political settlement in Afghanistan should be based on its sovereignty and independence and the principle of self-determination by the Afghan people, while stressing the need for a political settlement in Kampuchea that would allow its people to choose their own government without external pressure or intervention.

They hoped the Democratic Kampuchean coalition would be a step toward such a settlement, and praised the efforts of "ASEAN" with regard to Kampuchea and to the stability and welfare of Southeast Asia.

President Suharto accepted with pleasure President Evren's invitation to visit Turkey.

HURRIYET HITS GREEK VIEW ON AIRSPACE REGULATIONS

NC220844 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 17 Dec 82 pp 1, 9

[Text] Ankara, (HURRIYET) -- Turkey has once more openly confirmed its determination not to recognize Greece's 10-mile airspace fantasy over the Aegean. The Council of Ministers has taken a decision which devastates Greece's dreams. Regulations governing flights over border areas have been published in the Official Gazette, a fact which shows how determined Turkey is on the Aegean.

According to these regulations, the Turkish planes will fly as far as the territorial waters of neighboring countries in view of the fact that international law considers airspace over open seas as usable by all countries. In light of this situation, Turkish planes will be able to fly over the Aegean as far as Greece's 6-mile territorial waters.

The international law and relations expert of the Turkish state made this statement to HURRIYET in connection with the recently issued regulations:

"The width of the airspace of every country is equal to the width of its territorial waters. According to international law, no state can claim to have airspace wider than its territorial waters. In view of the fact that Greece's territorial waters are 6 miles, its airspace should also be confined to 6 miles. Nevertheless, Greece had declared in 1931 that it had extended its airspace to 10 miles. This action by Greece runs counter to the rules of international law referred to above. Turkey has never recognized Greece's 10-mile airspace limit.

"Not only Turkey but other states too have directly or indirectly objected to Greece's behavior. For example, NATO planes flew outside Greece's 6-mile limit during NATO maneuvers and indirectly proved that they did not recognize Greece's 10-mile airspace limit."

According to regulations published in the Official Gazette, the flight of foreign planes over Turkey's territorial waters and airspace has been reasserted.

According to these new regulations, foreign planes will not come nearer than 10 kilometers to the east of the Rize, Erzurum, Van and Baskale line on the Turkish-Soviet-Iranian land borders. On the Turkish-Bulgarian-Greek land borders, they will not come nearer than 10 kilometers to the west of the Canakkale, Ortakoy and Corlu Terkos Lake line.

Foreign planes will not fly nearer than 40 kilometers to the land borders of other neighboring states and not nearer than 10 kilometers to Turkish territorial waters in the Mediterranean, the Aegean and the Black Sea.

VOTCP REPORTS BILEN SPEECH AT KKE CONGRESS

TA211240 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee Secretary General Bilen delivered a speech at the 11th Congress of the brotherly Greek Communist Party [KKE]. He started his speech by saying: On behalf of the TCP Central Committee and the Turkish communists I greet, with the warmest feelings, the 11th Congress of the KKE, this lofty forum. I convey our people's greetings of brotherhood and friendship to you, and through you, to the Greek working class. You have showed us your sincere interest and brotherly hospitality. We thank you very much.

Comrade Bilen then said: Today, the entire socialist community, headed by the Soviet Union, the world communist, worker and national liberation movements are carrying out a struggle to fulfill a very difficult duty. That struggle is to stop the arms race instigated and promoted by the expanisionist U.S. imperialists and the NATO bosses. That struggle is to prevent a thermonuclear war that would lead to the annihilation of mankind. That struggle is to make peace permanent, to continue developing the detente process. Our country's [as heard] and our peoples' fate and future are in such a struggle now.

Comrade Bilen pointed out that the Reagan administration and the aggressive imperialists were stepping up their provocations against peace and detente, making decisions to produce new nuclear weapons and pursuing a dangerous path to upset the military balance and attain supremacy. He added: Reagan and his like are exerting pressure and undertaking intensive activities in order to use our countries, our lands and certain ruling reactionary circles in pursuing these policies. We are not alone in the struggle. No matter how monstrous it becomes, imperialism is no longer able to have its demands met as it used to in the past. Lenin's country and powerful socialist countries are behind the people in this struggle. Soviet Defense Minister Comrade Marshal Ustinov's clear and categorical answer to Reagan's efforts to upset the balance, to achieve supremacy in arming and to impose their demands added new strength to the peace struggle of the world's people.

At one point in his speech, Comrade Bilen stated that the Turkish and Greek peoples have had much experience in struggling against imperialism, domestic reactionaries, brute force and dictatorships; that the Turkish communists were always very pleased with the KKE's victories in its harsh struggles and with its development; and that these victories and gains have been sources of strength for the Turkish communists in their own struggles.

Later, Bilen said: Undoubtedly, the expansionist imperialist U.S. circles' and the NATO bosses' policies regarding the eastern Mediterranean, our region, are inseparable from thier worldwide policies. [words indistinct] and the crazy Reagan administration are pusuring complementary policies. On the one hand, they try to base themselves more on our lands, to expand their aggressive bases and to build new ones. In this process they resort to different methods; they (?reward), they force, they increase their provocations, they use their local agents more intensively, they organize intrigues. The United States has always depended on the most reactionary forces both in Turkey and Greece and through their mediation it managed to make Turkey and Greece NATO members. It has always tried to make use of the conflicts among the reactionary ruling circles in the two countries. It is doing the same today. It is [words indistinct] against Greece.

In his speech, Comrade Bilen discussed the anti-imperialist popular movement, the [word indistinct] growing against the bases and NATO in Greece. He discussed the increasing oppression of the progressive forces by the junta in Turkey and the bloody terror -- that puts to shame the torture used in the middle ages -- being used against the detained communists, progressive patriots and especially against the Kurdish people in the eastern provinces. He added: The Pentagon and CIA support this system of terror and oppression in Turkey, the attitudes of the collaborationist and monopolist bourgoeisie and of its striking force, the junta. The expansionist U.S. circles [words indistinct] a plan like the Camp David agreement. Our people, the Tcp, are continuously struggling against these intrigues and against the imperialists' policies of provocations and of "divide and rule" against the people. The TCP is warning our people against these things.

It gives priority to the struggle for peace and detente. A popular resistance against the junta's policy of following Washington's orders and the struggle to create a national democratic front have become even more burning urgent issues today.

Later in his speech, Bilen stressed that the Turkish and Greek peoples' struggle for peace, freedom, democracy and social progress were identical, that our people do not want aggressive U.S. bases, nuclear warheads or arsenals in Anatolia and that the TCP is opposed to the agreement under which the Rapid Development Force will be able to use the bases in Turkey, to the establishment of aggressive bases in our country and to the deployment of medium-range missiles in central Europe.

In the concluding part of his speech, Bilen said, in summary: The TCP has always sought with unwavering determination the withdrawal of the Turkish war troops and of all foreign military forces from Cyprus' ruling rights, territorial integrity and independence must be complete. The two communities lived together for many years and they want to live like that again. The interests and desires of the Greek, Turkish and Cypriot people are indentical. Their common enemy is one. The Aegean question which is being discussed now must be resolved on the basis of the Helsinki Declaration and by keeping in mind the sovereignty and national independence rights of the peoples of both countries.

We are categorically opposed to chauvinism and to the policy of provoking people against each other, regardless of how this policy is pursued. The conflicts can be resolved very well outside NATO, without imperialist interference.

The brotherly ties between the TCP and the KKE are continuing to be strengthened on the most stable foundations since the days they were founded.

What ties us to each other most of all is Marxism-Leninism and the principles of proletarian internationalism. Both parties attach special importance to, and protect as the apple of their eye, the great Lenin's party, the Soviet state and its determined policy of peace and friendship of the peoples. Furthermore, there is a tradition of united struggle and, sometimes, united work among the old generations of our two parties. For example; in the 1920s, among the heroic communists who were members of our party's Istanbul committee was Comrade Kalimenos. He was the committee secretary. He was expelled from Turkey by the police. He then went to Greece. Years later we found out that this comrade was executed by a firing squad together with (Galoyannis).

We follow the developments in Greece with great attention. You achieved great success during the last elections. That success is the concrete result of the principled, determined, stable and Leninist policy of unity. The KKE is an experienced party which fulfills the (?best) requests of the Greek proletariat and of all the people, which [words indistinct] and gives alternatives. Your 11th Congress is being held under complicated conditions both in Greece and in the international scene. We wish you great success [word indistinct].

Solidarity with the TCP and with the Turkish democratic forces was expressed in the most sincere and warm way in the congress documents, in Comrade Florakis' report and in the delegates' speeches.

Comrades, (?let us not) leave this as mere words. We (feel) this sincere and warm solidarity concretely. The TCP Central Committee and the Turkish communists extend their deepest love and respect on the occasion of this internationalist solidarity. Long live the KKE! Long live Marxism-Leninism! Long live proletarian internationalism!

VOTCP: TCP'S BILEN SENDS MESSAGE TO CPSU

TA211618 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Turkish Communist Party Central Committee Secretary General Bilen's message to CPSU Central Committee on the 60th anniversary of the USSR; date not specified -- read by announcer]

[Text] To the CPSU Central Committee:

Very dear comrades, on behalf ot the Turkish Communist Party [TCP] Central Committee, the Turkish communists, the Turkish working class and workers, I greet the Soviet communists and the Soviet people with the loftiest feelings on the 60th anniversary of the USSR, the world's first federal multinational worker-peasant state. The creation of the USSR is the result of the Great October Socialist Revolution. The Red October Revolution put an end to all kinds of exploitation, of social and national oppression. It released the reins for the nations' and the peoples' historic creativity. It established the power of the working class. Private ownership of the means of production was destroyed. This became the basis for the free development of all the nations and peoples in voluntary unity and solidarity. The establishment of the USSR is one of the loftiest accomplishments of the Leninist Bolshevik Party. The USSR is the lofty monument of the CPSU, equipped with a multinational structure, with a determined internationalist ideology, with policies, organization and labor principles. It is a living gift of Lenin's ideas and principles. It is the concrete confirmation of Lenin's uncompromising attitude against nationalism, chauvinism and all kinds of national (?nihilism). Not only did the Soviet peoples establish a developed socialist community, but they also frustrated the imperialists' attacks. During the great motherland war, these brotherly nations and peoples displayed the most heroic deeds of mankind. This army is a unique and lasting symbol of the unification of the Soviet people under the guidance of the CPSU.

The establishment of the USSR was the foundation of an unprecedented cultural development in the world. Not only did science, technology and cultural workers create a brand new Soviet person, but they also led to the creation of a brand new Soviet culture. This Soviet culture whose essence is socialist, its national forms variable and its morality internationalist, brings together the peoples and nations of the USSR and also creates respect in the world. It is an inspirational source to the peoples' freedom struggles.

The brotherhood of the Soviet peoples and nations and their unity which is based on Leninist principles are [word indistinct] in the Soviet Constitution. That Constitution is the constitution of the broadest and most stable socialist democracy. The popular state of the Soviet Union is based on such a democracy. Regardless of his nation, everyone has equal opportunities and equal rights to speak and take decisions at all levels of society. Socialist democracy has become firmly established with the Soviet Constitution.

The Soviet Union has made the principles of peace declared by the Red October and the lofty Lenin the basis of its policies and has incorporated them into its Constitution.

The 25th and 26th CPSU Congresses have set up the program for this struggle of peace. The establishment, growth and development of the USSR and its persistent and Leninist peace strategies and policies are of vital importance for the survival of humanity.

The most aggressive, and imperialist circles -- first and foremost the U.S. imperialists -- are trying to escalate armaments, to cause confrontations and to drag the world into a nuclear war.

In the struggle against this dangerous situation, the USSR constitutes the strongest and greatest security of peaceful forces among the world peoples.

Comrades, the establishment of the USSR and its development for the last 60 years are a great source of inspiration for [words indistinct] peoples as well as our country's working class and people. Turkey is one of the countries where social and national discrimination has reached bitter and large proportions. The relentless pressure on the Kurdish people is one such notorious example. The same kind of pressure is being exerted upon the working class and its political and syndical organizations, restricting their economic, social, political and democratic rights and liberties.

Our people daily are concerned with the bitter results of the policies pursued by the reactionary ruling circles which blindly follow the NATO and U.S. imperialistic policies in contradiction with our national interests.

Comrades, the USSR has played also a historic role in the Turkish Republic's struggle to become a sovereign state. Lenin's country has been the greatest support in our people's struggle and victory against the imperialist aggressors. The Soviet Union continued to extend its diplomatic support to Turkey in the days after our country's national independence was obtained.

A large number of installations which make up the foundations of our national heavy industry have been established with Soviet assistance.

Since its establishment, the USSR has pursued a healthy, trustful, consistent and honest policy toward Turkey. In contrast with imperialist countries, it is conducting its relationship with Turkey based on equality, mutual benefit and on respect for each other's sovereignty. These Soviet policies also reflect the aspirations and wishes of the Turkish working class and of our people at large. Realistic circles in our country approve of these Soviet policies. The promotion and strengthening of the Turkish-Soviet relations are a great contribution to regional as well as world peace.

As in the past, the TCP will continue to do its utmost for the development and consolidation of relations between Turkey and the USSR. Comrades, today the Soviet people of 270 million are marking the 60th anniversary of the foundation of the USSR with its legendary (?developments), its unparallelled initiatives and its historic gains. This is a unique day. The Soviet Union which inspires all the countries of the world with the completely new system is established and developed, [words indistinct] and (?works) for the future of mankind.

Glory to the Soviet people who created this process and the CPSU which directs it. Long live the USSR! Long live the CPSU! Long live Marxism-Leninism! Long live proletarian internationalism!

COUNCIL NOT EMPOWERED TO REPLACE MILITARY HEADS

LD212136 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Excerpt] The Council of Ministers held an extraordinary meeting today to discuss the retention or replacement of the present heads of the Armed Forces.

A cabinet statement released later said that the government took the view that it is not empowered to propose the retention or replacement of the topmost figures in the military heirarchy and left the matter for a future government to decide.

The statement said that because the prime minister has resigned, the government's juridicial capacity is limited, and as a caretaker administration, is not able to make fundamental decisions.

SPAIN

FOREIGN MINISTER ON NATO, SHULTZ VISIT, EEC

LD212040 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1730 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] In his first appearance in the Spanish lower house, Fernando Moran, Socialist minister of foreign affairs, today explained to the Congress committee the priorities of Spanish foreign policy. Mr Moran first referred to NATO. Spain's present position as a country which adheres to the North Atlantic treaty but which is not integrated into the military structure, the Spanish foreign minister said, is accepted by the other member countries of the Western alliance.

With regard to the recent visit to Spain by U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz, Fernando Moran said that during their talks they discussed the bilateral defense agreement awaiting ratification by the Spanish Parliament in particular. He then referred to the process of Spain's incorporation into the European Common Market, a process which he spoke of as being possibly definitive in the first 3 months of 1984. He did admit, however, that negotiations are now at a very difficult stage and this, he said, is because we are entering the final phase of the process. He said that Spain is prepared for painful changes in its economy if there is a quid pro quo in return.

The third point of his report to the congress of Deputies' Foreign Affairs Committee dealt with Gibraltar. With reference to this, he said that the Spanish Government would be willing to enter into a dialogue with the British Government as long as the problem of sovereignty over the rock is present. He said that if the process continues as it has to date, he will have talks with British Foreign Secretary Francis Pym next spring.

'PRELIMINARY' F-18 CONTRACT TO BE SIGNED

LD212030 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] According to reliable sources, the signing of the preliminary contract for the purchase of F-18 aircraft for the future attack and combat aircraft program will not require a formal ceremony, but will be communicated telegraphically to Washington. Defense Minister Narcis Serra will brief the Council of Ministers tomorrow on the decision made by his ministry.

According to the same sources, the Socialist government's intention is to sign the preliminary contract for the purchase of the aircraft from the United States in order not to affect the cost of the program, which would go up if the contract were not signed by the 23 December deadline.

LACINA TO U.S. FOR TALKS ON TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER

AU221206 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 22 Dec 82 p 2

[AZ report: "Lacina To Discuss Technology Criticism in United States"]

[Text] Vienna (AZ) -- On Tuesday State Secretary Lacina left for the United States to discuss with the U.S. authorities there recent criticism of alleged technology transfers to the Soviet Union. The U.S. Departments of Commerce and Defense are the relevant partners in the talks.

BRIEFS

BULGARIAN VISITOR -- Lyuben Gotsev, deputy foreign minister of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, paid a visit to Vienna at the invitation of Ambassador Friedrich Bauer, chief of the Foreign Ministry's Political Section, on 9 and 10 December. He had talks at the Foreign Ministry on questions of the international situation and bilateral Austrian-Bulgarian relations, which were positively assessed by both sides. Gotsev was also received for talks by Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr. [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 11 Dec 82 p 2 AU]

BLOC REFUGEES -- At present there are only 9,194 refugees in Austrian refugee camps or other refugee quarters as against 26,419 a year ago. Of these refugees, 5,105 are from Poland, 1,874 from Czechoslovakia, 792 from Hungary, 748 from Romania, and the rest from other countries. At present, 1,255 refugees live in the Traiskirchen refugee camp, while the rest have been assigned private quarters. [Vienna DIE PRESSE in German 13 Dec 82 p 3 AU]

AMBASSADOR TO BOLIVIA -- Dr Hans Mathe, Austrian ambassador to the Argentine Republic who has also been appointed ambassador to the Republic of Bolivia, presented his credentials to President Hernan Siles Zuazo on 16 December 1982. [Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 18 Dec 82 p 3 AU]

MARTENS ON AFRICAN, MIDEAST, EC RELATIONS

PM211537 Algiers EL MOUDJAHID in French 16 Dec 82 p 16

[Interview with Belgian Prime Minister Wilfried Martens by APS in Brussels -- date not given]

[Text] Question: His excellency Chadli Bendjedid, president of the democratic and popular Republic of Algeria, is paying a state visit at the invitation of his majesty King Baudouin. Mr Prime Minister, what significance do you attach to this first visit to the Kingdom of Belgium by an Algerian head of state?

Answer: President Chadli Bendjedid's visit is not only the first visit to our country by an Algerian head of state, it is also the first visit to Western Europe by an Algerian head of state, and I welcome the honor which the president is thus doing Belgium. This visit -- which is taking place during the year which marks the 20th anniversary of Algerian independence -- has a double meaning for me. First it consecrates the friendship between our two countries and the very close relations which have been established between them. Second, it will be the starting point for a new increase in their cooperation.

Question: This first visit to the Kingdom of Belgium by an Algerian head of state sheds special light on Algerian-Belgian cooperation. What assessment can be made of relations between Algeria and the Kingdom of Belgium?

Answer: Relations between Algeria and Belgium are both intensive and diversified. We have secured agreements in the administrative and legal sphere and in the sphere of economic and technical cooperation, transport and so forth.

Cooperation in development is of mutual interest to our countries, and I must tell you that our trade is very extensive. If I may refer to the 1981 figures, that trade amounts to more than 17 billion Belgian francs, and the initial indications which I have show that the results will be even better for 1982. In making all those points I have said nothing about the visits and many contacts which contribute to mutual understanding between our two peoples.

Question: What do you think the prospects are for developing those relations?

Answer: In my view the prospects for development are very great because the two countries know and trust each other. Moreover this is the context in which the president's visit is taking place, and I am sure that the talks which I will have with him and the scheduled discussions between the competent ministers will take place in a spirit of mutual understanding. It is in that atmosphere that we will make a very open examination of ways of developing our relations in the broadest spheres.

Question: In general, how do you view the possibilities of giving practical content to North-South dialogue?

Answer: I think that the content of North-South dialogue cannot be completely separated from the procedures of that dialogue. The latter have proved very ineffectual over the past 10 years. They must be reexamined on the basis of the need for active participation by all countries from North and South -- and not only the former -- in international actions aimed at achieving world economic recovery and speeding up Third World development. Through this spirit of joint responsibility I think that North-South dialogue ought to comprise at least the following points:

Giving priority to tackling the problem of hunger and the lack of food production close to populous regions.

Pursuing international and national policies aimed at ensuring that the developing countries obtain bigger and more stable export revenue from what they already produce, in other words primarily basic commodities but also manufactured products.

Encouraging wider transfers of knowledge and know-how, especially through investment in the developing countries.

Finding the most appropriate answers to energy supply problems by ensuring greater predictability, which is desirable for the producers themselves, and by reducing the excessive dependence of the importing countries, especially the poor countries.

Increasing the volume of financial resources for development through a combined effort by Northern and Southern countries aimed at optimum utilization of those resources in the Third World.

Finally, it seems to me, by encouraging the increased economic cooperation and trade among Southern countries.

Question: On the same subject, what initiatives could Belgium, an influential EC member, take to promote Euro-African trade on the basis of cooperation based on the new principles governing North-South relations?

Answer: My answer to the previous question, which was rather long, allows me to be brief here because it has already shown you the sphere in which Belgium will try to see what the EC can do to promote dialogue, and especially to encourage Euro-African trade.

As regards the new principles governing North-South relations, I began by saying, and I repeat, that these relations must be based on recognition of the principle of participation by all in international efforts to promote economic development, which is a common interest.

International cooperation must once again be placed in a realistic context in which everybody will accept his responsibilities and will ultimately find advantage.

Question: How do you view the European Ten's specific contribution in the search for a just and lasting settlement to the Middle East conflict? In that connection what is your position toward the PLO?

Answer: In June 1980, during the European Council meeting in Venice, the Ten listed the principles which they thought ought to form the basis of an all-embracing settlement in the Middle East.

As recently as the end of June this year the European Council recalled the conditions in which the permanent restoration of peace and security in the region can be started, in other words by negotiations based on the principles of security for all states and justice for all peoples.

In this context the Ten welcomed the U.S. President's new proposals and the Fes summit resolution, and we pay tribute to the recent action taken by the seven-man committee of which, moreoever, the Algerian foreign minister is a member.

As regards the PLO, you know that the Ten's position is still that it should be associated with negotiations on the Middle East problem. As regards Belgium, I would also like to remind you that the PLO has a liaison and information office in Brussels.

Question: The EC has a direct concern to strengthen peace in Africa, which is shaken by violent conflicts in the northwest with the Saharan people's struggle for independence, and in southern Africa where the Pretoria regime is preventing Namibia from gaining in dependence. Prime Minister, what is the Belgian Government's position in this European context?

Answer: Belgium, together with its European partners, has always supported efforts likely to contribute to a peaceful solution to the West Sahara question. Only recently the Ten warmly welcomed the OAU summit decision to hold a referendum in that region, and they also voted for a resolution in the General Assembly confirming that support.

As regards Namibia, Belgium is still supporting the action taken by the group of five Western countries within the Security Council framework. It hopes that the five will pursue their contacts with all parties involved with the aim of implementing their settlement plan.

GENSCHER ON U.S. ARMS DECISION, ANDROPOV'S PLAN

LD231128 Hamburg DPA in German 1053 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher expressed regret on Thrusday at the U.S. Congress' decision against arms cooperation with the allies. Such cooperation need not be one-sided, Genscher said in an interview with the Deutschlandfunk. After all, arms cooperation is not only a matter of the military results but also "a part of cooperation within the alliance."

Genscher repeated his view in the interview that the Disarmament proposals made by Soviet General Secretary Yuriy Andropov went "in the right direction," as they indicated an admission by the Soviets of their superiority in medium-range missiles threatening Europe. However, it was unacceptable that, with a realization of these proposals, the Soviet side still has a one-sided destructive force of 3000 Hiroshima bombs. Genscher said that it is now necessary to continue to patiently negotiate in order to clearly indicate the interest in removing all medium-range missiles from Europe.

Rejects Andropov's Missiles Proposal

LD221840 Hamburg DPA in German 1800 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] In the opinion of the Federal Foreign Minister Genscher, the new proposals put forward by Soviet party leader Andropov to reduce medium-range missiles in Europe cannot be accepted. Genscher said in Bonn today that if the West agreed to Andropov's plan, not to base American medium-range missiles in Western Europe, while the Soviet Union retained 150 SS-20 missiles, then Moscow's monopoly in medium-range missiles with regard to the United States would be confirmed by treaty. However, Genscher said, the Western alliance will carefully examine the disarmament proposals.

SPD Chairman Brandt regretted what he called rash polemical statements in some Western capitals. He called on the West to analyze how the Soviet proposals could be turned into concrete negotiations.

Bonn Spokesman on Andropov's Proposal

LD211526 Hamburg DPA in German 1448 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA) -- The Federal Government will analyze the disarmament speech by Soviet party leader Yuriy Andropov "with great care and in great seriousness" and "as always" urge its partners to make a similar examination. This announcement by Government spokesman Juergen Sudhoff in Bonn today was in response to proposals by Andropov. He announced in Moscow that the Soviet Union wants to retain only the same number of medium-range missiles that Great Britain and France possess. A condition for this would be the West's refraining from counterarming.

Sudhoff combined the Federal Government's readiness to examine the proposals with clear skepticism regarding the possibility of preserving the balance of forces if the Soviet proposal were implemented. Andropov's words "sound very nice" but could mean the cementing of Soviet superiority. The Federal Government has only press reports of the speech at its disposal today. It is also conceivable on the basis of this information, said Sudhoff, that Andropov's proposals are simply a clarification of plans already made known last week and submitted in Geneva.

Brandt Views Andropov Proposal

LD221336 Hamburg DPA in German 1209 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 22 Dec (DPA) -- SPD Chairman Willy Brandt views the statements by Soviet party leader Yuriy Andropov on disarmament as containing proposals of "importance" and as an altered Soviet position at the Geneva talks with the United States on nuclear medium-range missiles in Europe. This can only be of benefit to the talks, Brandt told the press in Bonn today.

Brandt expressed regret over "hasty polemic reactions in some western capitals" to Andropov's proposals. These polemics are not helpful and contradict the formula of careful examination, which the Federal Government has also used. He called on the West to examine how the Soviet proposals could be introduced into concrete talks.

The SPD leader spoke of "important points of contact" between Andropov's position and the compromise proposal by Paul Warnke, former U.S. chief disarmament negotiator, which the SPD Presidium supported. The latter had urged that the Soviet Union destroy part of its atomic medium-range missiles so that the siting of new U.S. nuclear missiles in Western Europe could be avoided.

Karsten Voigt, foreign policy expert of the SPD Bundestag group, described the Federal Government's reaction to Andropov's proposals as unsatisfactory and disappointing. The proposals are not adequate but nevertheless represent an important step in the right direction. On behalf of the opposition, Voigt called on the Bonn government to urge the U.S. leadership to introduce in turn fresh proposals at the Geneva talks. "The monotonous repeating of the U.S. position at the Geneva talks is no longer enough", said Voigt.

Press Discusses Proposals

DW221143 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German 0605 GMT 22 Dec 82

[From the press review]

[Excerpts] Today's interest is centered on the disarmament offer of Soviet party chief Andropov.

The FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG writes: Whoever makes disarmament proposals is obviously interested in negotiations and in achieving acceptable results. For this reason alone, the offer by Soviet party chief Andropov is pleasant news. This is also true even if we can't just say yes and amen to his offer. His proposals also demonstrate that the determination with which the West is sticking to the NATO dual decision is being taken into consideration by the Soviet leadership. Therefore we can safely count on the same realism which Moscow demonstrated in 1980 in correcting its original threat to no longer negotiate after the adoption of the dual decision.

The daily DIE WELT states: Yuriy Andropov took the floor not as the head of state but only as the CPSU general secretary to honor the 60th anniversary of the Soviet Union. The fact that this event was celebrated on the date of Josef Stalin's birth, of all dates, awakens depressing memories. In his speech the party chief proposed that the Soviet Union retain just as many missiles in Europe as the British and the French have in their nuclear silos. However, what was supposed to appear as a grand gesture, turns out at second glance to be just a new version of old Soviet propaganda tricks. First, Andropov obviously wants to see the American nuclear umbrella -- the actual security guarantee for the free part of Europe -- either riddled or completely dismantled. Once the American missles have disappeared from Europe and the Soviets are facing just the British and the French, the balance of power would look completely different.

The WESTDEUTSCHE ALLGEMEINE published in Essen writes: A key phrase in Andropov's speech shouldn't be ignored, namely the USSR's demand that its equal rights be expressed in weapons of equal value. This demand is in accordance with the current situation in which each side can destroy the other many times over. Just as the Soviet Union must be required not to strive for superiority in Europe, the West cannot strive for worldwide superiority either. Such a course would only lead to an endless arms race. Therefore, continuing negotiations are necessary, although not necessarily in public.

The AUGSBURGER ALLGEMEINE points out: the expenditures on weapons are increasingly endangering the domestic political consolidation of the Soviet Union. Contributions to allied communist countries have reached dizzying heights. The problem of Afghanistan hasn't been overcome yet, and Poland cannot manage on its own. Against this background, Andropov's offer to the United States must be viewed as an attempt to reduce strategic arsenals and to achieve a compromise on medium-range missiles in Europe. The party chief needs a pause in the foreign policy area so as to handle urgent problems at home. So far we can only guess how much political leeway Andropov has.

The NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen notes: Andropov's statements indicate that the Kremlin leadership is fully aware of the dangers of the arms race and that it wants to limit these dangers. Even though important reservations will be expressed by the West, this Soviet move makes us hope for a compromise. It is quite natural for France immediately rejected the idea of stacking its relatively moderate nuclear arsenal up against that of the Soviet Union. If the French potential were to be reduced to zero, which would mean renouncing any nuclear deterrence of its own, the Soviet Union would still have sufficient nuclear weapons to threaten France. For Paris and London their own nuclear missiles are for purely national deterrent purposes. However, the United States, as the protective power of Western Europe doesn't have corresponding counterweapons here. All this shouldn't be a reason for not examining Andropov's proposal and not achieving concrete results in Geneva. That was a quotation from the NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG.

The WESTFALISCHE NACHRICHTEN of Muenster maintains: the new man in the Kremlin, from whom some Western politicians have expectantly awaiting signals didn't emerge yesterday from the shadow of his predecessor. Just as the late Kremlin chief, Andropov skillfully combined threats with temptations. In the best Brezhnev style, he presented a new tempting disarmament offer as the carrot while announcing -- as the stick -- new Soviet missile programs in case the West doesn't agree with his ideas. The aim is clear in both cases: Andropov wants to try at any cost to prevent NATO's counterarmament which is coming increasingly closer. The Western alliance partners would be acting irresponsibly, however, if they flatly rejected Andropov's proposals without closer examination.

The ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz has the following to say: Andropov's proposal is tempting -- the idea of being able to get rid of two-thirds of all systems and thereby also Western counterarmament. This proposal looks attractive at first glance, but it has a hitch. Accordingly the Soviet Union would get rid of its old SS-4, and SS-5 systems which use liquid fuel, have become superfluous due to the SS-20 missiles and were to be dismantled anyway. Simultaneously the Soviet Union would escape the threat arising from 572 new Pershing and cruise missiles. The Soviet Union would probably be prepared to remove several dozen of this newest SS-20 missile, as Andropov put it, while still retaining 200 to 250 of these very dangerous medium-range missiles. The West would have nothing to counter them with except the British and French systems. Accepting these proposals would mean cementing the lead which the Soviet Union has already achieved with medium-range systems. That was a quetation from the ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG of Mainz.

CHEYSSON'S PRESS CONFERENCE ON ATLANTIC COUNCIL

AB221420 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1100 GMT 22 Dec 82

["Excerpts" from French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's press conference concerning the ministerial session of the Atlantic Council on 9 December, place not stated]

[Text] The meeting took place almost exactly as we expected. The December 1979 decisions and the firm positions adopted by those most concerned, particularly the Germans and the Dutch, were very clearly recalled. These positions were that if there is no satisfaction with regard to the first part of the December 1979 decision, the second part would be put into execution: The Pershings and the cruise missiles will be installed. This will be done without any new decision because the decision has already been made. As the Italian minister recalled, it has been discussed in a number of parliaments. It can, therefore, be put into force and no new decision is needed for this. There was, therefore, firmness and precision as far as the purely NATO aspect was concerned. As far as the position of the French delegation on the NATO aspect is concerned, I would say that the French determination in the matter of defense and particularly concerning the main decisions adopted during the past few months by the defense councils has made a very great impression. I am referring to the decisions the government adopted a few months ago concerning a seventh submarine, that is, a new generation submarine which requires considerable scientific and financial effort. In fact, the seventh submarine is more than an additional submarine because the technologies will be very different for a submarine of the generation of those of the 1990's. Decisions were also made concerning the replacement of Pluton by Hades and concerning the ASMP [Medium-Range Air-to-Ground Missile]. Finally, there was a decision concerning the SX system which is, in France, equivalent to the American MX system. These four major decisions, which take us very far within the context of the 10-20 year programs, obviously made a very strong impression here. I was not asked any question concerning the future law on programming. Besides, it would have been too early because it will not be submitted to the Parliament until next year.

In the background, there were exchanges of views on the political and economic situation of the Eastern European countries. These exchanges did not disclose anything which we do not already know, that is there is a new leader in the Soviet Union but there is a great continuity in its policy for the moment. On our side, it is a question of not being closed to discussions and to dialogue. There is no reason, however, to modify the firm position of our alliance in view of the fact that there is no change in the policy of the Soviet Union. We discussed Poland with prudence because no one know what will be announced in the middle of December. Some people thought that nothing will be announced at all. Others thought that will not be very significant. Let us therefore hold on to our comments until 13 December.

Of course, the meeting also discussed matters outside the competence of NATO but which are of great interest as far as security is concerned. Concerning human rights, everybody recalled that the results we expect from the Madrid conference will make it possible to achieve some progress. The fundamental rights which the countries promise to respect are: Freedom of the press and freedom of movement and...We all agreed that the amendments we have proposed for the texts submitted by the neutral and the nonaligned countries are important and cannot be abandoned. We are, therefore, expecting a conclusion from Madrid but this cannot be at the cost of abandoning what we have asked for or at least of our main demand concerning the recognition of human rights.

The problems outside NATO's competence but which affect security include economic relations between the East and West. We agreed that since they have a direct military significance, the topics discussed within the Cocom [Coordinating Committee for Export to Communist Areas] can result in [words indistinct] conclusions. Anything that does not fall within the framework of the Cocom but which is of interest must be studied. Some studies were undertaken after the Versailles conference such as the examination of trade relations with the countries of the East and the corresponding credit facilities. These studies are being made within the OECD. Besides, it is probable -- but no decision has yet been made -- that the OECD will undertake a study of the evolution of energy requirements in all our countries. We have noted -- this was the only new point on today's agenda -- that several politico-economic conferences are scheduled for the end of the spring: The Williamburg meeting at the end of May and the Atlantic Council meeting which has been definitively set for 9 and 10 June in Paris. At that time, it would be good for us to discuss the conclusions of these studies. This is because -- and on this point we and some others have totally agreed -- these studies will result in conclusions that will be submitted to each government which will remain the sole master of its economic policy and its trade relations with the Eastern European countires. It is normal that governments should discuss together what they will do and what they will not do. When there is a political conference, it is normal that people should talk about it. However, this is a consultation and not a system of surveillance, control or coordination which we, the French, cannot at all accept.

We finally discussed matters outside NATO but which are of interest as far as the security of the Atlantic system is concerned. They are matters which are called outside-zone matters. I once again reminded the meeting that we, the French, will never agree that NATO should make decisions concerning outside-zone matters. We therefore had rapid exchanges of views on the international monetary system, Kampuchea, etc... but only by way of information. It is obvious that these are topics on which we cannot adopt any orientation or decision in our position as NATO members.

These were the conclusions of today's discussions. The most striking thing was the common will to demonstrate the cohesion of the alliance within the strict framework of NATO's compentence. I think that it was because all the countries really had the great desire to stress this cohesion that none of them made an attempt to go beyond this competence.

The Spanish delegation did not speak because it decided this morning not to associate itself with the communique. The Spanish delegation asked for time to think about the conditions in which it will generally associate itself with the alliance within the framework of the Washington treaty. In fact, one first of all joins and later negotiates concerning the conditions of work with the partners of the alliance. This is contrary to the system of the Community in which one first of all negotiates and later joins when one agrees with the conditions of membership. The Spanish delegation knows that they have joined but they stress that the conditions for their participation have not yet been decided. Consequently, they were only present but did not take part in work such as that of preparing the communique.

Apart from this, I had bilateral discussions with a number of my colleagues: Greek, Belgian, German and American. I had quite a long discussion with my new Dutch colleague, [words indistinct] Foreign Minister Moran. This was my first meeting with him. The Spanish Government -- and this is understandable -- needs a few weeks respite before opening discussions on the various matters of common interest, but we have already decided the various matters we should discuss in January.

MORE ON CHEYSSON 21 DEC INTERVIEW ON ANTENNE 2

AB231352 Paris Diplomatic Information Service in French 1235 GMT 23 Dec 82

["Continuation and end" of French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson's interview on Antenne 2 in Paris on 21 December -- part one of interview published in 22 December Western Europe DAILY REPORT, page K 2]

[Text] [Question] Mr Minister, there has been some talk about the possibility of a visit by Mr Andropov to France or by Mr Mitterrand to the Soviet Union within the next few months. Are these visits still on the agenda?

[Answer] They are not yet on the agenda. We are not excluding anything, but there is not anything planned for the moment.

[Question] Do you still believe today that something is happening in Afghanistan?

[Answer] There is now a new leader at the head of the Soviet Union. As a new leader, he is taking stock and he has noted that one of the most difficult problems now facing the Soviet Union is that of Afghanistan. The Russians were obliged to send troops there because a communist regime cannot survive without troops. It is obvious that this new leader is going to try to deal with this problem. Once again, whenever a new man comes to power, he attempts to deal with the most difficult problems. This is the reason for our hope.

[Question] The state of siege will be lifted in Poland within a few days. After this state of siege is lifted, will France be prepared to reconsider its position toward that country, especially concerning credit facilities?

[Answer] Unfortunately, the state of siege will not be lifted but suspended. This was the formula adopted by the Sejm on the recommendation of General Jaruzelski, who made it clear that it could be reimposed at any moment. In other words, the measures announced for the end of the year are very inferior to what we expected. All the detainees will not be released and there will be no amnesty.

The military system is being maintained and we have seen how effective it is. Remember the false letter of Walesa published recently. We are therefore very far from returning to a regime of freedom. As a matter of fact, Poland is almost returning to the type of system, regime and constraints known elsewhere in East Europe.

[Question] You believe that nothing has changed? The state of siege has been lifted but this is completely artificial and the situation remains the same?

[Answer] Something will change for the detainees who will be released and naturally we salute this progress. However, it does not change anything as far as the constraints to which the Polish people are subjected are concerned. Does this mean that we should not have relations with Poland? I will not go to that extent but the condemnation of this regime of constraints remains total.

[Question] Have you any information concerning what the press has called the "Bulgarian lead" with regard to the assassination attempt on Pope John Paul II?

[Answer] Like everybody, I read the newspaper with great interest. I have no information other than that given by the newspapers, but we must admit that the reports on this matter are sometimes spicy. Why are they being made only now? It is understandable that people have been wondering.

[Question] In spite of everything, do you believe in the eventuality of a lead. Does that seem possible to you?

[Answer] I find it difficult to answer this question. I think Italians are a serious people. I know my Italian counterpart very well. He would not have taken the steps you are aware of if there were not some Bulgarian elements at stake.

[Question] There is no smoke without fire?

[Answer] There is no Bulgarian smoke without a fire in Rome since Rome reacts to this fire.

[Question] Let us come to the Middle East. France seems to be absent from the negotiations which might take place between Israel and Lebanon.

[Answer] France is not part of this negotiation. What is the purpose of this negotiation? It is the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Lebanon, All: Israeli, Syrian and Palestinian. For a long time we have been saying that Lebanon cannot be reconstructed in an atmosphere of unity and sovereignty under the authority of the elected president unless all the foreign troops there have been totally withdrawn. We are contributing to this in our own way by giving the Lebanese Army the necessary support to enable it take full control of the zone that will be evacuated and by multiplying our contacts with all sides so that the negotiations could be held soon. It is the negotiations between Israelis and Lebanese, between Lebanese and Syrians with the PLO that matter.

[Question] Do you think Amin al-Jumayyil's authority is now well established, well seated in Lebanon?

[Answer] It was extraordinarily -- I would even say almost miraculously -- established the day after his brother's assassination by this election which was held under exceptional conditions. Soon afterward, all the Lebanese rallied behind him. It is now necessary that Amin al-Jumayyil have the opportunity to establish his authority in the whole of Lebanon. I understand those in Beirut are sorry to see that the rest of the country is not free; they have their families in the rest of the country. These families have started fighting among themselves again. Amin al-Jumayyil must have the possibility of reconstructing Lebanon, of reestablishing his authority over the whole territory of Lebanon. The evacuation processs is the necessary precondition to all this.

[Question] After having seen our report on Argentina, would you please tell us of your reaction and your policies as far as human rights are concerned?

[Answer] I find quite marvelous what Mr Rodriguez has just said: The people have no more fear. Have you noticed that there are a series of countries like that which have undergone very strong regimes and which are still undergoing very severe constraints, and yet still the people have no fear?

In Poland, the constraint is great. We have just talked about that, but the people are not afraid; they go on demonstrating. In Argentina, [word indistinct] of this military dictatorship, the military is still in power but the people are not afraid. There is therefore something marvelous. Man is capable of being born again even when he has been crushed by structures, machines and mechanisms, and that we, the French, should expect this so much is also a very comforting element because human rights are everybody's responsibility.

[Question] On the occasion of the departure of Jean-Pierre Cot from the government, certain people wanted to oppose realists and idealists in the field of foreign policy. Which side do you belong to?

[Answer] I do not think it as simple as that. A short while ago, I said that the French Government, France, is committed to human rights. This is not (?the policy) of a man, a minister, it is the policy of the government. Yesterday, we held a meeting with all the European associations which are involved in human rights. We reviewed our actions of the past few months. A dozen international conventions were ratified and their constraints were accepted by France. Some of these conventions are 22 years old. France signed them 22 years ago but did not ratify them. Our interventions in almost all the countries of the world constitute a very clear policy which is demonstrated everywhere, not only in individual cases but also, as Mr Rodriguez said a while ago, in the case of human rights. Everywhere, we have supported this right of expression, it is not a policy of on e man, Jean-Pierre Cot or any other person.

[Question] Do you support the construction by France of a second nuclear reactor in South Africa?

[Answer] The question does not arise now. You know very well that personally I am opposed to the construction of this reactor. I have said several times that if the problem arises one day, it will be examined by the government. My personal stand is known; it has not changed.

BULGARIAN EMBASSY OFFICIAL VISITS ANTONOV

AU212135 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 21 -- For the first time since his arrest November 25, Bulgarian Sergey Ivanov Antonov, accused of taking part in the attempt to kill the pope, has been able to see a representative from the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome, it was learned here today. The Bulgarian Embassy here say that its consul (Stefan Ghenev) visited Antonov yesterday (?and found) him in good health.

Antonov said that (?he was) being well treated and voiced confidence in Italian (?investigators) who he hoped would soon prove he was totally innocent of any involvement in the shooting of the Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Square on 13 May 1981.

In another (?development), the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome today made public the text of the telegram that the Sofia Public Prosecutor Kostadin Lyutov had sent to Italian Judge Ilario Martella.

The telegram invites [words indistinct] the investigation into the assassination attempt, to (?make an) official visit to Bulgaria to make further inquiries there and to be briefed on the results of [word indistinct] (?produced) by Bulgarian authorities.

The correct names were released here today of two Bulgarian citizens mentioned by Italian Justice Minister Clelio Darida in his address to the Parliament yesterday as having committed crimes in Rome while working as embassy officials. They were identified as Ivan (Tomov Donchev) and (Simeon Georgiev). Spelling errors created some confusion in the names yesterday and the Bulgarian Embassy disclaimed any knowledge of the two.

(Simeon Georgiev) was secretary of the Bulgarian Embassy from 1972-1978. (Donchev) [words indistinct] him in 1978 up until last year when he was recalled. The two are charged with military and political espionage.

Italian union official Luigi Scricciolo, arrested for spying on February 4, reportedly had contacts first with (Georgiev) and later with (Donchev) in Sofia and Rome. They supposedly asked Scricciolo to put them in contact with the Red Brigades terrorist organization [words indistinct] information on statements made by kidnapped U.S. General James Lee Dozier while in Brigade hands.

[Ferofindo Posimato), the judge investigating Scricciolo's activities has asked the Italian Foreign Ministry for authorization to issue arrest warrants for the two Bulgarians.

Embassy Denies Scricciolo Contacts

AU220942 Rome ANSA in English 0840 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 22 -- A spokesman for the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome denied Tuesday that Bulgarian diplomats had contacts with jailed Italian trade union leader Luigi Scricciolo "beyond those that could have existed with an official of the UIL trade union in his position as head of its foreign bureau", such as conferences or receptions. Luigi Scricciolo was arrested in February on charges of espionage for Bulgaria. He has confessed that he acted as go-between for Bulgarian agents and the Red Brigades kidnappers of U.S. Brig. Gen. James Lee Dozier.

The spokesman also denied that "the embassy or other Bulgarian agencies" ever organized visits to Bulgaria for Scricciolo.

ARREST WARRANTS ISSUED FOR TURKS IN BULGARIA

AU221948 Rome ANSA in English 1931 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, December 22 -- The Bulgarian lead in the investigations into last years' aborted assassination of Pope John Paul II is increasingly merging with the Bulgarian [words indistinct] agents, more than a million dollars to kill the pope.

Investigating Magistrate Carlo Palermo, who runs the investigation into the arms-drugs racket in Trento, has issued a warrant for Celenk and another Turk, Ismail Oflu, both of whom are in Burgaria. The two latest arrest warrants brings to more than two hundred the number of people involved in the investigation, many of whom are foreigners, 214 are already under arrest thanks to the cooperation of judicial officials in various countries.

But Palermo has said that many of those under arrest, Turks or Syrians, operated prevalently in Bulgaria and added that it was possible to detain them only after they left the East bloc country, indicating that Bulgarian authorities offered no cooperation whatsoever.

Palermo also said that his probe and the one conducted by Rome Judge Ilario Martella into the papal attack are two distinct investigations. Palermo added that the two investigations, while following parallel leads, have nothing in common beyond the "overlapping" of several figures and their operations on Bulgarian territory.

According to Martella, Celenk is involved in the attack against the pope. But the warrant against the Turk has not been served since Celenk is in Bulgaria where he appeared last Friday in a press conference in Sofia together with two other Bulgarians wanted in connection with the shooting in St. Peter's Square; the former secretary to the military attache' of the Bulgarian Embassy in Rome Zhelyu Vasilev Kolev and embassy cashier Todor Ayvazov.

It is observed here that all the charges against the two Bulgarians and Celenk must be proved. However, the Bulgarian link between the two investigations has triggered concern over a murky underworld that pulls the strings of a complicated international conspiracy.

According to press reports, Agca revealed to Martella Celenk's name as well as those of the two Bulgarian embassy officials and Ivanov Antonov, the Balkan Air Rome bureau manager under arrest in Rome.

Celenk and the Bulgarians have all denied the charges. But the latest arrest warrant focuses once again attention on Celenk and the "linkage" of the two probes.

Meanwhile, reactions continued today to Monday's Italian parliamentary debate on the Bulgarian connection. In that occasion, while Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo said that Italy would take steps against Bulgaria only in the face of "ascertained facts", Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio said the attack against the pope was a "cautionary and alternative solution to an invasion of Poland".

Press comments interpreted Lagorio's words an implicit charge that the Soviet Union masterminded the attack through Bulgarian secret agents who hired Agca.

Milan's conservative paper "IL GIORNALE NUOVO" said today that Colombo has decided to inform NATO on the Bulgarian leads, adding that this is the first time Italy turns to the North Atlantic alliance on an issue of domestic terrorism.

CLOSING REMARKS FROM MORO TRIAL PROSECUTOR

AU222108 Rome ANSA in English 1918 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, December 22 -- Rome District Attorney Nicolo' Amato called for 34 life sentences in his closing remarks today to the court where the months-long trial against the Red Brigades kidnappers and assassins of Italian statesman Aldo Moro is coming to a close.

Amato asked the court to hand down life sentences against the "hardliners", terrorists who refused to collaborate with investigators, milder sentences against those who "disassociated" themselves from the Red Brigades and very mild sentences for "repentant" terrorists who agreed to cooperate with the police and supply information.

The trial began on April 14 and continued up to now with a recess of three months in the summer. There are 63 defendants. Moro was kidnapped on March 1978. His five body guards were shot and killed at the time of the seizure. The former prime minister's body was found in the trunk of a car 55 days later, on May 9.

Amato asked the court to hand down life sentences against Mario Moretti, Barbara Balzarani, Prospero Gallinari, Nadia Ponti, Cristoforo Piancone, Valerio Morucci and Adrianna Faranda, among others.

During the trial, Morucci and Faranda repeated they had been opposed to killing Moro. But this position, which was known even before they were arrested, was not sufficient for Amato to ask for a milder sentence.

Yesterday, Amato had stressed the "irreplaceable" role of "repentant" terrorists in uprooting the Red Brigades and described their decision as "meditated and painful", in which they found "dignity and courage".

Amato asked for a six months sentence for Patrizio Peci, the first and most important terrorist to turn state's evidence. According to investigators, Peci's confessions in 1979 enabled them to deal a harsh blow at the Red Brigades and uncover many of the mysteries surrounding the Moro kidnap-slaying.

Amato also asked for: twenty years for Antonio Savasta and Emilia Libera, 19 for Massimo Cianfanelli, 18 for Carlo Brogi, 15 for Ave Maria Petricola. The other requests range from a maximum of 28 years in prison for Alessandria de Luca and amnesty for two minor defendants, Sergio and Claudio Tofani, charged with perjury.

The trial will resume January 4 for the defense's closing remarks to the court.

PARLIAMENTARIANS RETURN FROM ARGENTINE MISSION

AU230902 Rome ANSA in English 0850 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, December 23 -- Italian parliamentarians who have just returned from a mission to Argentina to get first hand information on problems of Italian emigration and missing persons, the so-called "desaparecidos", reported that their mission was largely positive but that another visit to Argentina would be useful. The group was led by Christian Democratic Deputy Ferruccio Pisoni and included Communist Giovanni Giadresco, Socialist Marte Ferrari and Radical Aldo Aiello.

During their five-day stay in Argentina the delegation met with Social Action Minister Adolfo Navajas Artaza, Education Minister Cayetano Licciardo, officials of the two union federations, leaders of the Multipartidaria Commission, representatives of human rights groups, and with families of Italians listed as missing in Argentina. Speaking with newsmen, the Italian M.P.'s said they discussed not only the problem of the missing but also issues pertaining to citizenship, social security, welfare and education.

POPE ISSUES MESSAGE ON WORLD PEACE DAY

AU210909 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Vatican City, December 21 -- The urgency of dialogue at all levels to advert the threats of conventional and nuclear war was underscored by Pope John Paul II in his message for "World Peace Day" to be observed on January 1.

The statement, entitled, "Dialogue for Peace, a Challenge for Our Time", was released Monday in eight languages. Apostolic nuncios will personally turn copies of the message over to the heads of states with diplomatic relations with the Holy See and others will be delivered by apostolic delegates or the permanent observer to the United Nations, who will give copies to the Soviet Union and China.

In his message for the coming "World Peace Day", the pontiff described as obstacles in the way of the dialogue he envisions "the extreme and outworn concept of the sovereignty of the state" and "ideologies which identify struggle as the engine of history". He referred to the "serious responsibilities of the strongest countries which drive other nations towards war or tempt them with commerce in arms".

At the national level, the pope affirmed the need for dialogue between the leaders and the people and warned that without this dialogue, "social peace is threatened or absent and a state of war is generated".

Vatican watchers read a reference to developments in Poland, the pope's country of birth, into this statement.

Appealing to "those responsible for peace" and to all people everywhere, the head of the church of Rome said, "Dialogue is an essential condition for peace (and) is possible despite the obstacles which realism forces into consideration. It is the real challenge for mankind today", he said in his message.

The experience of history, the statement continued, illustrates that over 150 armed conflicts have broken out around the world since the end of World War II. "Limited war is a euphemism" the pope noted and said that these wars have occurred because dialogue did not take place or "because it was falsified and transformed into a trap".

On the international level, the pontiff observed that dialogue must be based "on strong convictions that the good of a people cannot finally be achieved acting against the good of another people".

At another level, the pope said that "temptations to violence and war will always be present in a society where the cupidity of the few deny the satisfaction of the most fundamental rights of the masses of men".

In his closing appeal, John Paul turned to world leaders and expressed "confidence" in the works of international organizations though in the past decade these bodies "have too often been the object of attempts to manipulate them by nations seeking to exploit those occasions".

YEAR-END ECONOMIC EFFECTS REFLECT AUSTERITY MOVES

AU230939 Rome ANSA in English 0816 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 23 -- Inflation ate into the real wages of workers picking up their Christmas bonuses and the government announced that it would not pass on lowered gas prices to the consumer so that the Treasury could use the increased revenues to cut the fiscal drag on wage packets.

Workers who received their traditional double wage packets at the end of the year saw their take-home pay sharply reduced by withholding taxes and inflation so that on the average the amount they received was down 35 percent. Experts pointed to the annual inflation rate in Italy which is 16.3 percent.

The government, in trying to slash the state deficit, currently running at 50 billion dollars, has made resorting to the so-called "una tantum" (one time only) tax a regular habit.

The car owner is the most vulnerable to this sort of taxation. In 1980 and 1981 road taxes and the "super tax" paid for diesel-driven cars were hit with a number of special taxes meant to shore up the country's ailing economy.

Despite the marked drop ikn the dollar's quotation against the lira the government Wednesday decided not to lower gasoline prices. Instead, it will "fiscalize" the drop in price (25 lire a liter, or around 0.18 cents) that consumers could have expected given the prices on European markets today.

The state, by pocketing the difference between the actual price and the real price of gasoline, will take in around 360 billion lire (around 250 million dollars) in a year. The government has decided that this sum will be used for a maneuver to reduce the fiscal drag on wages.

In the past two years there have been three other times when the price of gasoline could have been lowered in Italy. However, only in February of this year did the price to the consumer actually go down. In the two other cases the government kept the sale price at the pump the same and diverted the difference to ENEL, Italy's heavily in debt electric company.

Despite these gifts, the ENEL debt has not been reduced and electricity rates next year will be upped 3.7 percent every two months. In the meantime, Italians continue to pay the highest gasoline prices in the industrial world; 1,165 lire a liter, the equivalent of around 83 cents.

CDS STATEMENT OPPOSES CALLING EARLY ELECTIONS

LD221800 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1230 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] National Council met in Libson last night.

At the end of a 4-hour meeting, which ended in the small hours of this morning, Rui Pena read a statement in which the CDS said that as long as the Democratic Alliance majority holds it is not legitimate to demand or call for early parliamentary elections. It is imperative to resolve the present difficulties with consistence and speed and at the same time to promote the formation of a new Democratic Alliance government, the statement said.

The CDS is now waiting for the name of a new prime minister to be put forward, the statement said, adding: It is essential that the new government be strong and lasting.

The CDS National Council, the statement went on, is confident that the parties grouped under the Democratic Alliance will. by themselves and through an open dialogue at joint meetings, be able to find the best solutions for the country and to build a momentum of determination, hope and progress.

To this end, the CDS National Council proposes a Democratic Alliance summit to analyze the situation and jointly consider adequate measures for the alliance's revitalization. The CDS National Council expresses its full confidence in the party chairman, Prof Freitas do Amaral, to discuss the situation with the Social Democratic Party chairman as well as to discuss appropriate moves designed to form a new government, to strengthen the Democratic Alliance and to provide the best solutions for the country, which has always merited the CDS's full support. The CDS has been firmly committed to this, within the Democratic Alliance, since 1979.

GONZALEZ GIVES GO AHEAD FOR FACA AIRCRAFT

[Text] After a meeting with the minister of defense, Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez gave instructions for the letter of intent on the FACA [future attack and combat aircraft] program to be signed in view of the significant national defense need to maintain sufficient deterrent capability in the immediate future. At the same time, the prime minister gave the minister of defense instructions to renegotiate the program for compensation both in the technical and economic areas.

UNIDENTIFIED ARMS CONSIGNMENT HELD AT AIRPORT

LD221730 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Summary] A Madrid paper reports today that a consignment of 11 tons of handguns and submachine guns was confiscated yesterday at Madrid's Barajas airport. It arrived aboard an Argentine airlines aircraft to be forwarded to Tehran aboard an commercial Iranian aircraft. We asked Inocencio Arias, director of the diplomatic information office, about this:

[Begin Arias recording] "The report contains mistakes. The weapons did not arrive aboard an Argentine aircraft and there is no connection with either Aerolineas Argentinas or Argentina itself. Furthermore, they were not discovered yesterday; they have been at Barajas for about a month. They arrived in Spain illegally from Italy about 4 weeks ago and a few days later the Iranian Embassy claimed them. We naturally told the Iranians that under Spanish law they have to submit a formal application backed with evidence. However, a separate claim to them has also been made by Sudan. Because of all this, the weapons are still being held at Barajas Airport. And, moreover, the quantity is not 11 tons but 14 tons." [end recording]

[Announcer] We have more on this from Hector Arenas at Barajas Airport:

[Arenas] The strange consignment of weapons discovered here 2 days ago in transit from Buenos Aires to Tehran remains guarded by civil guardsmen. It comprises (?60 or 70) submachine guns and 5,000 9-mm Parabellum handguns, and was falsely marked and documented as ordinary machinery. Here is what I was told by the chief customs officer:

[Begin recording] "At 0900 on 21 December, the presence of a (?customs) inspector, of the Aerolineas Argentinas representative and of the Iberia Cargo Terminal chief, we opened the cases and found that they contained (?60 or 70) submachine guns and 5,000 9-mm Parabellum handguns. At present they are being held until the Foreign Ministry authorizes their dispatch to Tehran." [end recording]

[Arenas] The addressee is [name indistinct] in Tehran but there is only a Tehran telephone number for him and he has not yet claimed the goods.

SOVIET EMBASSY DENIES DENMARK MISSILE TARGET

PM221259 Copenhagen AKTUELT in Danish 17 Dec 82 p 2

[Unattributed report: "Soviet Union: No Nuclear Arms Trained on Copenhagen"]

[Excerpt] The Soviet Embassy in Copenhagen has rejected Danish Prime Minister Poul Schlueter's statement in the United States that "there can be no doubt that some of the Soviet Union's nuclear missiles are directed at Copenhagen."

"Since at the present time Denmark does not have nuclear arms on its territory, Denmark has no reason to fear Soviet missiles," the assurance from the embassy said. The embassy statement referred to a statement by Brezhnev in the West German weekly DER SPIEGEL dated 2 November 1981 concerning the "firm and sincere commitment which the Soviet Union has made" in connection with an earlier statement: "'I would like to solemnly confirm that the Soviet Union will never use nuclear arms against countries which refrain from the production or acquisition of such arms and which do not have nuclear arms on their territory." And the Soviet Embassy has given an assurance that the Soviet Union's new Central Committee general secretary, Yuriy Andropov, adhered to this stance in a speech to the Central Committee.

KOIVISTO ON TALKS WITH ANDROPOV; RETURNS HOME

LD222148 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 2000 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] President Mauno Koivisto met Soviet party leader Yuriy Andropov in Moscow today. Koivisto and Andropov discussed bilateral questions and [word indistinct] international politics. Koivisto said after the meeting that it was noted that there are no problems in relations between the countries. At the same time, President Koivisto said that his official state visit to the Soviet Union will probably take place early next summer.

[Begin recording] [Koivisto] Naturally we (?discussed) relations between our countries and we noted that we have no unsolved problems [passage indistinct] I am looking forward with interest to my official visit to the Soviet Union, which is expected to take place next year, possibly at the beginning of the summer.

We also discussed the international situation; in fact the discussion took place in such a way that he presented Soviet views and answered my questions. He managed in this time to brief me very well on Soviet (?approaches).

[Question] This was your first meeting with him. What are your impressions?

[Answer] I gained the same impression that has been gained by others. He is well prepared for his task, is very hard-working and is obviously a very determined person. He has all possibilities to (?manage) his task, which obviously is not one of the easiest in the world. [end recording]

President Koivisto was interviewed by our Moscow correspondent, Yrjoe Laensipuro. President Koivisto returned home about 30 minutes ago.

TWO SOVIET DIPLOMATS ORDERED TO LEAVE FOR SPYING

LD231148 Stockholm International Service in Swedish 1100 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Two Soviet diplomats have been ordered to leave Sweden for engaging in illegal intelligence activities here. They are the Soviet consul-general in the west Swedish port of Goteborg and the assistant military attache at the Soviet Embassy in Stockholm. According to the Swedish news agency TT, a third person is also involved. Unofficial reports say the diplomats had been trying to obtain top secret military information.

The official Soviet news agency TASS, without mentioning the case of the two diplomats, refers in an article today to espionage in Sweden and alleges that U.S. diplomats are collecting economic, political and military information in this country.

Three Soviets Expelled

NC231111 Paris AFP in English 1059 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Stockholm, Dec. 23 (AFP) -- Sweden today announced the expulsion of two Soviet diplomats and a third unnamed Soviet citizen for "illegal activities" connected with Swedish armaments industries. The three expelled were the Soviet consul general in Goteborg, Yuriy Averin, the deputy military attache at the embassy in Stockholm, Piotr Skirokizh, and another Soviet citizen employed in Goteborg, whose name was not given.

They were said to have engaged in "illegal activities connected with obtaining information concerning principally Sweden's armaments industry."

The announcement of the expulsions came as Sweden and the Soviet Union were trying to repair bilateral relations severely strained in October 1981 when a Soviet U-137 submarine ran aground in Swedish waters near a big naval base.

Soviet Ambassador Boris Pankin was today summoned to the Foreign Minister and informed that the two diplomats had "engaged in activities incompatible with their status." Mr Averin and Mr Skirokizh were declared "persona non grata," and were given three days in which to leave Sweden. The Foreign Ministry gave no details of the formal complaints against the two diplomats. However, press reports here said they were accused of attempting to acquire military information from defense plants in Goteborg.

The Soviet news agency TASS, meanwhile, today denounced what it described as the activities of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) in Sweden and in Goteborg in particular. Last April, the present of the Soviet vice-consul here, Albert Leipa, was judged undesirable and his superiors were asked to assign him to a post outside the country. He was accused of spying on Latvian exiles in Sweden.

U.S. ARMS SALES 'DANGEROUS FOR BELIZE'

LD221742 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1442 GMT 22 Dec 82

[By Tom McMullan PA political staff]

[Text] The United States has been told by Britain that a resumption of arms supplies to Guatemala could have dangerous implications for Belize where more than 1,000 British troops are stationed, officials said at Whitehall today. Guatemala has refused to relinquish a long-standing territorial claim to Belize although the territory became independent from Britain two years ago. As a result, Britain agreed to maintain a garrison "for an appropriate period."

After hints by President Reagan that he might be ready to resume arms sales, British officials in Washington contacted the American Administration. It seems that they made clear the British view that a resumption of arms sales could be dangerous for Belize. They were told by the Americans that no decision had been made. If, as expected, Guatemala seeks helicopter spares from the United States, Britain is unlikely to raise objections. But if other weapons are supplied, representations can be expected to the American Administration.

ANDROPOV REMARKS WILL NOT HELP ARMS TALKS

PM221255 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English in 22 Dec 82 p 10

[Editorial: "Andropov's Song"]

[Text] Mr Andropov's first appearance on stage as Russia's new prima donna may have pleased his immediate audience of well-trained seals. They were there to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the foundation of the Soviet empire and here was the new emperor. But those parts of his performance touching on nuclear weapons were directed mainly at the West, in particular Western Europe. His speech was angled towards stoking up anti-American nuclear weapons sentiment. He aimed to portray America as the warmonger and Russia as the peace-lover who would nevertheless match every increase in nuclear weaponry ad infinitum, thus holding up the picture of a horrendous nuclear arms race, for which America would be solely to blame.

"No new arms build-up programmes will force the Soviet Union to make unilateral concessions," said Mr Andropov. This is the second time in public that he has denounced unilateralism (or one-sidedness). Labour Party and Greenham Common visitors please note. Mr Andropov thinks unilateralism is no good -- no good for Russia, that is. He is in favour of it in the West. He would like Britain, West Germany, Italy and the low countries unilaterally to renounce deployment of intermediate-range cruise and Pershing missiles while Russia retains her deployment of SS-20's. That is what his "offer" on these missiles amounts to. Russia would "reduce" their number to equal existing British and French strategic submarine-borne weapons, providing they abandoned cruise and Pershing. President Reagan's offer of no intermediate-range weapons on either side is dismissed as "a mockery." Why?

Computation of nuclear strengths as between Russia and the West is an exceedingly complicated business, bedevilled by technical detail. Yet it is not unreasonable to accept the view of most experts that, during a period of some ten years when America's armoury was practically static, Russia not only caught up with it but in some vital aspects has now surpassed it. Add to that the fact that Russia is a closed society under a dictatorship whereas America is an alarmingly open society under a democratically-elected president and Congress. If only Russia could experience something even remotely like the present American furore over the MX programme! Of course negotiations with Russia must continue and all Russian suggestions examined calmly across the table in Geneva when the talks resume next month. But Mr Andropov's agit-prop song is not much help.

GOVERNMENT PROTESTS NORTH PROPERTY CONFISCATION

NC221728 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1600 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] The Cyprus Government has denounced to the world the illegal action of the Turkish Cypriot leadership in issuing certificates for the final acquisition of Greek Cypriot Properties which are in the occupied territories.

Foreign Minister Rolandhis has instructed all chiefs of the republic's diplomatic missions to denounce to the governments of the countries to which they are accredited this act of the Turkish Cypriot leadership. In addition, the republic's permanent representative at the United Nations, Mousioutas, has been instructed to make a written protest to the UN secretary general and to ask that a relevant official document by the General Assembly and the Security Council be circulated. Furthermore, Mousioutas has denounced to the UN secretary general the conversion into a mosque of the St George church in Kyrenia. A similar protest will be made by the republic's permanent representative at the UNESCO.

Paper Challenges Government

NC231003 Nicosia O AGON in Greek 23 Dec 82 p 2

[From the "Our Positions" column: "Shall We Ask for Settlement?"]

[Text] The meaning of the statement by Serakinci, the so-called interior minister of the Denktas regime, is that "proof" of deposits will from now on be presented at the negotiations table together with mutual claims so that there can be a settlement of accounts and the Cyprus issue may be solved.

It is a fact that on the occasion of the commencement of distribution of "title deeds" for Greek properties, Serakinci said that for every title of "final ownership" issued, an appropriate sum will be deposited into a certain account. When the time comes, these will be presented at the negotiations table and there will be an exchange between the "governments" within the framework of a bizonal federation.

These statements are clear. They can accept no other interpretation than their clear grammatical interpretation. They mean that the Turkish side considers the Cyprus issue solved, and that only the final "details" remain -- settlement of the value of properties. The government must give a clear reply: Will it agree to even sit at negotiations for the sole purpose of settling claims? Will it agree to continue a dialogue, the purpose of which, according to the other side, is simply ratification of its occupation faits accomplis?

The Turkish side leaves no margins for negotiation. It has closed every door to an honorable settlement by withdrawing every object for dialogue. Simple statements in answer to the Turkish positions are not enough.

PAPER CITES ROLANDHIS 'ADMISSION' ON DISUNITY

[Editorial: "From Official Lips"]

[Text] The interview granted by Foreign Minister N. Rolandhis to Cyprus TV was interesting both because of his own position and the stand he took on specific aspects of our national life. On a certain point this interview was also revealing if we can consider something known to everyone as well as confirmed as a "revelation."

In his interview Rolandhis admitted, "In Greece there is a government with a considerable term of office remaining -- approximately 4 years. I believe that after the election [presidential] a certain amount of concord will prevail in Cyprus so that we might be able to deal with our national issue with unity because this is a national issue and not a government issue. The governments of Greece and Cyprus must look to how they will work in order to achieve the desired result."

The natural conclusion which can be drawn from this Rolandhis statement is that at this moment our national issue is not being dealt with in a united manner, and the natural question which of necessity arises is: Why is it that the Governments of Greece and Cyprus must see how they can cooperate after the election?

Our government, which Rolandhis has been a member of for the past 5 years, does not tire of assuring us in the most emphatic manner that between Athens and Nicosia there is a "joint line," that there is "total identification of views," there is "sincere cooperation" and "an agreed upon struggle front." These assurances, however, are now stentoriously denied by the minster's statement. At a time when our national issue will have to wait until after the election in order to be handled in a united manner, and at the time when the Governments of Greece and Cyprus must "look to how they can cooperate" after February, this only means that up to now our national issue was being handled unilaterally and that the work of the two governments was not directed at the "desired result."

The truth is that Rolandhis not only admitted a truth, he simply admitted a reality. He confirmed the deep and eternal rift in relations between Athens and Nicosia. He confirmed the lamentable lack of agreement and division which exists between the Governments of Greece and Cyprus. The "alignment" is now only a form of speech and an empty slogan. Nicosia has shrugged off this alignment and it shrugged off Papandreou's support. Our government chose attatchment to AKEL for the sake of its magic votes instead of marching side by side with the Greek prime minister on a joint national course. For our government, party expediencies overshadowed, degraded and overthrew the national interest. Our struggle now is not for the salvation if Cyprus but for the party victory of its false "saviors."

Over and above Rolandhis' admission of this bitter truth, the minister's words also raise another subject. Rolandhis said that after the election the Governments of Greece and Cyprus must "look to how they will cooperate in order to bring about the desired result."

How can we imagine this post-election cooperation "for the desired result," at the time when our government is and will remain bound and entrapped within the "salvation" and "magical" provisions of the minimum program? This notorious program, which for our government is something sacred, is for Athens unacceptable and contrary to the supposedly agreed-upon joint line. What will happen after the election so that the two governments may "look to how they can cooperate?"

It is difficult for us to believe that after the election Papandreou will rush to join the partnership and that he will bless the "minimum program." Should we, perhaps, suspect that Kiprianou will, after the election, shrug off this election concoction described as the "minimum program" in order to once more fall into Papandreou's embrace and once again kiss the prime ministerial cheeks?

We agree with Rolandhis that "it is difficult to forecast what the future will bring." It is, however, easy for all to feel that our country's future is murky. These ill-omened feelings are gradually developing into desperate convictions which cannot be denied by stentorious and deceiving phenomena, but which are continually confirmed and strengthened by the deafening and macabre Cyprus developments.

DENKTAS ON ESTABLISHING A BIZONAL FEDERATION

TA221228 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has repeated that the intercommunal talks are being conducted with the aim of establishing a bizonal federation, and that its principles had been laid down in his agreement with Archbishop Makarios. The president stressed that the views expressed by the Greek Cypriot press and leadership about the guidelines he had reached with the late archbishop, which were later confirmed by Mr Kiprianou, were not compatible with the facts. The necessity, he said, to establish two separate zones in Cyprus was the outcome of racist policy of the Greek Cypriots and of their efforts to exterminate the Turkish Cypriot community. This fact, Mr Denktas added, made more significant the security which the Turkish Cypriots expected from a bizonal federation.

DENKTAS ON NEW FRAMEWORK TO INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

TA221229 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1030 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that he has no information about a Greek Cypriot newspaper report to the effect that the United Nations secretary general, Mr Perez de Cuellar, is to propose a new framework for a Cyprus settlement. Mr Denktas said that the present intercommunal talks were being conducted within a known framework aimed at a settlement. According to the Greek Cypriot newspaper, I SIMERINI, Mr Perez de Cuellar is proposing a series of radical measures for an early settlement of the Varosha issue and for the reopening of Nicosia International Airport.

CUMHURIYET INTERVIEWS DENKTAS ON AID, TALKS

NC230812 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 20 Dec 82 pp 1, 11

[Interview granted by "TFSC President" Denktas to CUMHURIYET correspondent Ali Acar in Nicosia --/date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: As we understand from your speeches, Fatherland Turkey has met all your needs so far. Can you survive without any further aid apart from military assurances from Turkey?

Answer: It is impossible to survive without any aid at all. It would be an illusion to argue the contrary. But this does not mean that we shall need the same amount of aid every year. We aim at reducing the amount of aid from year to year. It is difficult for us to open out to the world. The fact that the outside world does not recognize us affects our economy adversely. As we do not possess an international airport like Larnaca in the Greek Cypriot sector, foreign planes cannot land at or take off from the TFSC. As a result we are unable to establish trade and tourist ties. As we are still "waging a struggle for liberation," we definitely need Turkey's help.

Question: You say that Greece does not want the Cyprus dispute to be resolved between the two communities and that it is exercising pressure and blackmail in order to pull away the Greek Cypriot community from the intercommunal talks. You are accusing Papandreou of intransigence and demagogy. Do you insist on these views?

Answer: My views in this respect are gaining weight every passing day. The only reason why the Cyprus issue is not being resolved in accordance with the principles Makarios and I had agreed upon is Greece's reluctance and the pressure it exercises on the Greek Cypriots. If Papandreou abandons his attacks on the intercommunal talks, the way to a settlement through negotiations will be opened.

Question: Every now and then the Greek Cypriot side and particularly Papandreou says that the Cyprus issue is being handled not by you but by Ankara. Meanwhile, certain persons living in the TFSC and the two leaders of the main opposition say that the Turkish ambassador interferes with almost everything you do. Can one say that Ankara is playing an effective role in your political life?

Answer: We cannot do without Turkey in the same way that the Greek Cypriots cannot do without Greece. Every day we are exposed to attacks by Hellenism which is "Greece plus Greek Cypriots." This is not an issue only between the Turkish Cypriots and Greek Cypriots. It is also an issue between Turkey and Greece. It is natural for the Turkish Republic to have the right of say on us for it shed blood and lost lives for our sake. It is spending money on us. It cannot be expected to carry us as a hump on its back and yet have no right of any say.

Question: It is a fact that you are interlinked with Turkey. Do you contemplate a new constitution for the TFSC in line with the new constitution in Turkey? It is also rumored that you wish to carry out some changes in the presidential system. If you had all the powers you needed, would you attempt an amendment of the TFSC Constitution?

Answer: How did this come up? Who said I would like to amend the presidential system? No, all these are the opposition's fabrications. Today there is full democracy in the TFSC, like full kebab in a restaurant.

UN'S GOBBI SEEN RETURNING TO 'TALKS' DUTIES

TA230939 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0907 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Lekkosa, 23 Dec (AA) -- Special representative of the UN secretary general in Cyprus Hugo Gobbi will continue in this office, a UN spokesman said Wednesday. The secretary general's assignment to Gobbi as an observer of human rights in Poland was a temporary task, the spokesman said, and would not interfere with the UN role in sponsoring intercommunal talks.

KHARALAMBOPOULOS STATEMENT ON FOREIGN POLICY

NC221325 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] The first round of Greek-U.S. talks on the bases ended and the second round, with fundamental negotiations, will start after the Christmas holidays, said Foreign Minister Ioannis Kharalambopoulos today. The foreign minister held a briefing for Greek and foreign press representatives at noon today. Also present at the briefing were Deputy Foreign Ministers Karolos Papoulias, Ioannis Kapsis and Grigorios Varfis.

Kharalamobpoulos extensively dealt with the activities of the Foreign Ministry. Among other things, he also spoke on the Copenhagen EEC summit conference at which he presented Greek views in a full and emphatic manner. Kharalambopoulos also referred to the talks he had with the British Foreign Secretary Francis Pym, the results of which he described as extremely useful and constructive. He also referred to his meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Shultz and the EEC foreign minister's conference in Brussels.

Referring to Greek-Turkish relations, Kharlambopoulos reiterated that Greece desires sincere good relations with Turkey for the interest of both nations and that within this framework Greece is prepared at all times to continue the moratorium so that on this basis there can be a meeting between him and the Turkish foreign minister, or a meeting at a lower level between representatives from the two countries in order to define the framework of a Greek-Turkish dialogue.

Continuation of the moratorium, he added, means avoidance of provocative actions or statements by both sides. This will define the framework for this dialogue. The moratorium must be observed both during the time required until the start of the dialogue, and during the dialogue itself.

RIZOSPASTIS CARRIES COMMENTS ON KKE CONGRESS

Poland's Romanik

NC221347 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 21 Dec 82 p 3

[Statement to RIZOSPASTIS on the 11th KKE Congress by Jerzy Romanik, member of the PZPR Central Committee Politburo; date not given]

[Text] To start with, I wish to stress and to repeat that the work of the 11th congress has been a major event not only for the internal situation of your country but also for all the world.

The resolutions of the congress respond to the expectations of the Greek Communists and the desires of the working masses and they will contribute to the further development of the workers' and people's movement in general for a happy future for your people. The ideas put forward, the statements by the comrades, and the resolutions have stressed the great importance which the KKE attaches to the struggle for the preservation and the strengthening of peace and for the unity of the international communist movement. The congress has been a forum for strengthening the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

The participation of our delegation has contributed to the strengthening of the cordial fraternal relations between the KKE and the PZPR.

Cuba's Blanco

[Statement to RIZOSPASTIS on the 11th KKE Congress by Miguel Cano Blanco, alternate member of the Cuban Communist Party Central Committee Political Bureau -- date not given]

[Text] I would like to thank, through RIZOSPASTIS, the KKE for its invitation and the interest and attention it has shown for the delegation of the Cuban Communist Party.

We were very impressed by the congress, the dynamism of the party, and by the dignity and the authority of its leaders, headed by the great friend of Cuba and of Fidel Castro, Comrade Kharilaos Florakis.

Our impression from the Greek people are excellent. We wish you many successes in the struggle for unity, the struggle for peace, the struggle against imperialism and for the defense of your country's integrity.

Hungary's Korom

[Statement to RIZOSPASTIS on the 11th KKE Congress by Mihaly Korom, member of the Hungarian Socialist Workers Party Politburo and secretary of the party's Central Committee -- date not given]

[Text] This was a magnificent congress which examined in depth and realistically the questions of both the domestic and the international situation both in its report and during the discussion that took place. We have noted that the Greek comrades are optimistic and we can say that this congress has been a militant congress. Your party has a militant program which considerably contributes to the solution of the problems that the Greek society is facing today.

We also wish to stress that this was an international congress, not only because of the participation of many delegations from communist parties and national liberation movements, but also because it has shown that the Greek communists consider themselves part of the international communist movement. They have examined with a sense of responsibility the questions which are connected with the struggle for safeguarding peace and with a series of other international questions which refer to our joint cause. And most important of all, they sided in favor of the joint struggle of all for the joint goals.

We, as always, now as well as in the future, will be in solidarity with the fair cause of our Greek comrades. I wish great successes in the carrying out of the resolutions of the congress because these resolutions serve the interests of the Greek people and of all mankind. We are certain that at their next congress the Greek communists will have still greater successes to show in the struggle that they are waging for peace, international security, social progress and for the progress of the Greek people.

[Statement to RIZOSPASTIS on the 11th KKE Congress by Miroslav Hruskovic, member of the Czechoslovak Communist Party Politburo -- date not given]

[Text] My impressions from the congress are very good. For us, who live under socialism and occupy ourselves every day with the economy, a congress like yours, with such open and deep deliberations and enthusiasm, serves to give us encouragement and strength. Regarding the gathering at the sports field, I can only tell you that I watched it with tears in my eyes.

PRESIDENT EVREN MAKES VISIT TO SOUTH KOREA

Economic Protocol Signed

TA221603 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Serdar Dinli report from Seoul -- recorded]

[Text] Today is the 11th day of President Kenan Evren's visit to the Far East. He completed his talks in Korea today, talks which revolved mostly around economic issues. Tomorrow he is to go to another friendly and brotherly country, Bangladesh.

President Evren's scheduled visit to the cemetery in Pusan, where the Turkish soldiers who fell in the Korean War are buried, was cancelled today due to snow that started falling early this morning. After changing this schedule, Evren held contacts and visited sites in Seoul. He visited the National Museum and was briefed by officials this morning. He toured an electronics factory near Seoul this afternoon. This factory is among the 50 largest electronic factories in the world.

Evren then held a news conference where he talked about his visit, saying that there was a great difference between the Korea he knew in 1958 when he was in the Turkish brigade and the present Korea. He expressed his appreciation of the progress made by Korea during that time. He pointed out that Korea now has a developed industry in several fields, [word indistinct] businessmen and labor, adding that Turkey had also achieved important progress during the same period. He stressed that because of its common sense and calmness, the Turkish nation had managed to put an end to the critical days and started to walk toward the future in peace, security and stability.

Evren stated that during that past 2 years, Turkey had lowered its rate of inflation from more than 100 percent to less than 30 percent, raised its growth rate to 4.5 percent and its foreign exchange reserves to more than $1 billion.

Evren said that regardless of their political and economic systems, Turkey was trying to develop its relations with all countries respecting the principles of territorial integrity and independence. He noted that there were no political problems between Turkey and Korea, that the relations between the two had always been conducted within the framework of friendship and understanding. The president told the Korean press members: I am visiting your country in order to further strengthen this friendship.

The president said that his visit constituted the first link in the chain of high-level contacts between the two countries, expressing the belief that the meeting he held with the Korean president had enabled the further strengthening of the relations between Turkey and Korea.

President Evren pointed out that economic relations between Turkey and Korea had weakened during the past few years, adding that the economic cooperation between the two could be raised to the desired level in a short time if the two countries had a chance to know each other better.

He then stated that all countries were now going through a difficult economic period and that the political tensions in the world were threatening world peace. He stressed that every country must make active contributions to the establishment of peace, stability and cooperation in its own region. He said that Turkey was determined to direct its foreign policy within that framework and that he believed that Korea had the same aims regarding its own region.

Meanwhile, a protocol was signed today in connection with the joint Turkish-Korean economic committee meeting held in Seoul yesterday. The protocol was signed by Turkish State Minister Sermet Rifik Pasin and by Korean Commerce and Industry Minister Kim Tong-hui.

The protocol says that the necessary potential has been found to increase the trade between the two countries that had weakened in recent years, and that it is necessary to diversify the goods being traded. The protocol also envisages cooperation in investments in third countries and the organization of mutual vessel and airplane services.

Evren has thus ended another leg of his Far East tour. The aims of this tour can be summarized as "the development of Turkey's economic and commercial relations with friendly and brotherly countries, and strengthening cooperation in these fields. We believe that the visits have so far made the necessary contributions toward the achievement of these aims. The president will leave Seoul tomorrow morning to visit another friendly country. We will report to you from the capital of Bangladesh tomorrow.

ULUSU ADDRESSES CITIZENS IN EAST ANATOLIA

TA230936 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0855 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Tunceli, 23 Dec (AA) -- Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu said he was optimistic about the course of the economy in 1983. Addressing citizens at the eastern Anatolia town of Tunceli Wednesday, Ulusu said his government intended to bring to the relatively underdeveloped areas the fruits of economic growth. More specifically he promised that the training school for agronomists, closed down because of disturbances before September 1980, would be reopened, and urban renewal undertaken in Tunceli itself.

Ulusu warned citizens gathered that there might be "domestic and foreign enemies" who would try to provoke people back to the pre-1980 turmoil; but declared anyone "attempting to divide the people into artificial groups," would find the great majority of the nation and the armed forces in his way. The prime minister had addressed citizens and inaugurated a new sugar mill in the adjoining province of Mus Tuesday.

SOVIET AIRLINER HIJACKERS SENT TO YOZGAT

TA221552 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1530 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 22 Dec (AA) -- Three hijackers of a Soviet airliner were sent to Yozgat, and housed temporarily at the state hospital to wait for completion of legal procedures before emigrating to Federal Germany, officials said Wednesday. The hijackers, (Arthur Schiller), brothers (Boris and Vitali Schmidt), were acquitted Monday by a local criminal court of hijacking a Soviet airliner and forcing it to land at Sinop on 7 November.

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER ISSUE, LACINA TRIP REPORTED

AU231340 [Editorial Report] Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 23 December on page 1 carries a George Possanner report entitled "Technology Transfer: Lacina's Clarification Mission in Washington," reporting that Austrian State Secretary Lacina has begun talks with Washington officials regarding accusations of illegal technology transfers to the Soviet Union via Austria.

"The most important meeting took place at the State Department. It offered Lacina an opportunity to conduct talks with Richard Burt, former security policy correspondent of the NEW YORK TIMES and designated assistant secretary of state for European affairs, with Richard Perle, assistant secretary of defense, and with Bohdav Denysyk, deputy assistant secretary of commerce for export administration, who had already discussed the problems of technology transfers in Vienna in October."

Vienna KURIER of the same day on page 3 carries an Erich Grolig report entitled "Conflict Over Austrian exports to the East: No Luck With Industrial Spies," reporting on Lacina's talks in Washington and an article published by Moscow PRAVDA on Wednesday in which Moscow said that U.S. charges of technology transfer show disregard for Austrian neutrality. In this context, Grolig notes that "Vienna is seriously annoyed by the attacks from Washington because the United States has 'thus far not proffered any evidence at all.' This assertion is also being officially upheld by the Interior Ministry on Vienna's Herrengasse, though with the reservation that at least illegal technology transfers could not be proved. It naturally is possible that there are some undetected facts, but thus far no instructions have been issued to conduct investigations in this respect."

According to the paper, Austria has been regarded for a long time as a crossroads for the transfer of Western technological developments to the East. "The state police also know this and hence are not at all worried about the American accusations addressed at Vienna. Since the state police have been rather luckless in exposing major industrial espionage cases, they are particularly hoping for clues which would enable them to successfully intervene."

The Vienna NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG in German of the same day on page 3 carries a Peter Gnam interview with Austrian Vice Chancellor Fred Sinowatz about the alleged technology transfers to the East and the Moscow PRAVDA article. "Sinowatz told the NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG: 'We always interpret our neutrality ourselves and have always done extremely well. State Secretary Lacina went to the United States fo find out what the very problem is -- whether the U.S. Administration is really taking the matter so seriously or whether misunderstandings are involved.'

"Sinowatz termed the campaign in American media 'precisely against small Austria as 'strange.' Sinowatz stressed that Austria's good relations with the United States are well known and that this is an unalterable fact. To the question as to whether Washington possibly intends to have Chancellor Kreisky come to Reagan on his knees when he visits him in February, Sinowatz noted: 'He who knows the chancellor knows that he will not do such a thing.' The vice chancellor stated in conclusion: 'We have enough self-assurance to settle this with the United States ourselves; we do not need Soviet assistance.'

"As a matter of fact, Foreign Minister Pahr, who stated to NEUE KRONEN ZEITUNG that Austria interprets its neutrality itself and also defends this neutrality itself, maintains the same policy line."

Vienna Domestic Service in German at 0610 GMT on 23 December carries a Christian Schueller report on an interview with State Secretary Lacina in Washington after the latter's talks with representatives of the U.S. administration. Schueller reviews the two interviews with Department of Defense officials published by a Vienna paper -- DIE PRESSE -- and Austrian and Soviet reactions and says: "Three days later, one of the two officials -- in charge of international relations -- tells State Secretary Ferdinand Lacina who has come from Vienna that the published content of the interview with him was news to him. The other one -- the political director of the Pentagon, Fred Ikle -- is out of town. The representatives of all three U.S. departments concerned told State Secretary Lacina that there can be no question of sanctions against Austria. Lacina himself says in this context:

[Begin recording] "I do not want to comment on possible differences of opinion that may exist among the various U.S. Government agencies. What I was given to understand is that one regrets a public discussion of these things, as has taken place in the past few weeks, and that the statements concerned most certainly did not represent the U.S. Administration's official stand." [end recording]

Schueller adds that the "obviously unauthorized" utterances from the Pentagon did, however, touch on a sensitive topic, and that the U.S. interest in preventing an illegal transfer of highly advanced U.S. technology to the East was also stressed during Lacina's Washington talks. In another recorded statement, Lacina notes that the Americans are maintaining a strict control system over their technology exports to prevent illegal transfers to the East, and says in this context: [Begin recording] "I believe it is understandable that they express such a wish, and on the other hand, it is most certainly not in Austria's interest to become a turntable for the illegal transfer of modern technology -- modern U.S. technology -- to the East." [end recording]

According to Schueller, Lacina said that he had not been informed in Washington about any specific cases of any Austrian firm with a U.S. license violating relevant U.S. regulations, but that "he himself made it clear that the case mentioned by DIE PRESSE of Austrian machines used for the production of artillery barrels could not under any circumstances be affected by U.S. regulations."

BONN: 'CONSIDERABLE HARM' IN U.S. ARMS DECISION

LD231810 Hamburg DPA in German 1630 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- Bonn has expressed its regret at the decision of the Americans Congress against transatlantic arms cooperation. Newspaper reports say that this practically forbids the American Defense Department from buying arms abroad which contain particular metals and alloys (the metal clause). In the opinion of experts, this means a clearly negative development for German and European arms trade with the U.S. arms industry.

Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said that arms cooperation should not be a one-way street. Arms cooperation was not, after all, just a matter of military results, but also a part of cooperation within the alliance.

The parliamentary secretary of state at the Defense Ministry, Kurt Jung, said in a statement on Thursday that the decision by the U.S. Congress could do arms cooperation "considerable harm." In doing this, the Congress had cancelled the exclusion rule which favored the partners within NATO. It is true that Congress clause would not prevent the Federal Army from buying the American Arms industry, but the compensation for German industry would now be prevented insofar as equipment containing metal as defined in the U.S. clause is concerned.

In Jung's view, if the clause should remain in force for a long time, a thorough reexamination of German arms cooperation with the United States would be inevitable. In particular, greater European cooperation will be unavoidable. Defense Minister Manfred Woerner had also warned his American counterpart Caspar Weinberger of the harmful consequences of this development.

In making this decision, the Congress had apparently overlooked the fact that it would be reducing the combat readiness of U.S. forces in Europe by, in effect, preventing the servicing and repair of equipment in the countries in which they are stationed through this clause. The clause could not be reconciled with the meaning and purpose of the NATO decision on greater arms cooperation "within the framework of the transatlantic dialogue and particularly with regard to the concept of families of weapons."

KOHL ASKS SOVIETS TO ACCEDE AT ARMS NEGOTIATIONS

LD241742 Hamburg DPA in German 1648 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Hamburg, 24 Dec (DPA) -- In a prereleased article for BILD AM SONNTAG, FRG Chancellor Kohl asks the Soviet Union to accede at the disarmament negotiations. "The Soviet Union is asked to give its reply to the West's offer to safeguard peace, not through more, but through as few weapons as possible. Together with our friends, we stand by the offer to forego new medium-range nuclear arms if the Soviet Union scraps its arms of this type already deployed," the chancellor writes.

He once again emphasized that all citizens will have to make sacrifices in order to revive the economy and improve the state finances. The conservative-liberal government makes no short-term and short-lived promises: "On the contrary---everybody is expected to contribute more---nobody can expect the state to instantly distribute benefits with easy money." Everyone has to accept cuts. This applies to old-age pensioners, social benefit recipients and civil servants as well as high earners or pupils, the chancellor emphasizes.

DEFENSE MINISTER: ANDROPOV PROPOSALS NOT ENOUGH

LD261516 Hamburg DPA in German 1413 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Bonn, 26 Dec (DPA) -- The latest proposals by Soviet party chief Yuriy Andropov on a reduction of the SS-20 medium-range missiles in the European area of the Soviet Union do not go far enough in the opinion of Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU). In an interview for DPA, Woerner said in Bonn on Sunday that Moscow will therefore have to "go further" at the Geneva disarmament negotiations and "also take into account the existence [existentiell] and security interests of the Germans. Total renunciation of the medium-range missiles is still the most convincing solution. However, Woerner said that the Soviet concepts should be considered seriously.

Woerner told DPA that the Soviet proposals as submitted are an attempt to neutralize the U.S. nuclear potential in the medium-range missile sector and to uncouple the Federal Republic from U.S. nuclear protection in this important sector while Mowcow gains a monopoly in modernizing this type of weapon. The Federal Republic remains defenseless against the threat of the at least 150 remaining Soviet SS-20 missiles. The British and French nuclear arms are neither suitable nor intended to take over the Federal Republic's protection by the United States. The artificial and unjustified linking of Soviet SS-20's with British and French nuclear missiles is aimed at the American nuclear guarantee for the Federal Republic and "hence violates our existence and security interest."

In Woerner's view, the Geneva disarmament negotiations are the place where the Soviets' willingness to compromise will have to be tested. The Soviet leadership can rest assured that the Federal Government will undertake the utmost efforts in order to live harmoniously with the Soviet Union and the Eastern bloc states. "We are and shall remain interested in good and truly relaxed relations and genuine bilateral disarmament and are prepared for fruitful cooperation with the Eastern bloc on the basis of 'reciprocity'."

Just as the Federal Republic respects Soviet security interests, Bonn too can expect Moscow to consider German security interests. This includes the unalterable fact of the Federal Republic's membership in the Atlantic alliance and its close ties with the United States. This is directed against nobody. Therefore, the Soviets should desist from their attempts to drive a wedge between Europe and the United States. "A policy which aims at uncoupling the Federal Republic from the protection of the United States is irreconcilable with our security interests and hence doomed to failure," Woerner underlined in the DPA interview.

Alois Mertes (CDU), minister of state at the Foreign Ministry also told DPA that Andropov seems to be pursuing in unbroken continuity his predecessor Brezhnev's objective of uncoupling Europe from America psychologically, politically and then militarily "in order to put it in a state of timid compliance toward the Soviet Union." Perpetuating the Soviet monopoly of medium-range missiles will lead to the development of increasing options of blackmail toward German governments. The German population should be aware that in addition to the danger of nuclear self-destruction, the danger of West Europe's furtive self-submission also exists, which is at least just as real.

Mertes asserted that the West will not be the first to leave the Geneva negotiating table since he considers the objective of balanced and verifiable disarmament in East and West necessary on moral and common sense grounds which no peace-loving person can ignore. "Despite the Soviet threat to leave the Geneva negotiations, the Federal Government continues to believe that the Soviet leadership will eventually be prepared to come round once it can no longer expect its campaign of deception and agitation to be successful."

Wischnewski's Comments

LD241154 Hamburg DPA in German 1104 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 24 Dec (DPA) -- SPD Presidium member Hans-Juergen Wischnewski has expressed regret that the disarmament offer made by Soviet party chief Yuriy Andropov has met with "over-hasty rejection" in Washington, Paris and London. In today's NORDSEE-ZEITUNG, Wischnewski writes that "this cannot be helpful and contradicts our general basic attitude of first submitting the proposals to a thorough examination and sounding them out to see how this offer can be introduced into the concrete negotiations."

Wischnewski sees "important points of contact" between the Soviet position and "the compromise proposal of former American chief disarmament negotiator Paul C. Warnke, which was supported by the SPD Presidium." In Washington in September, Warnke had, on behalf of the U.S. National Security Committee, suggested making the deployment of new American medium-range weapons superfluous by means of an appropriate reduction of nuclear weapons in Europe.

Both initiatives are urgently necessary for the Geneva negotiations on the limitation of nuclear medium-range weapons in Europe, Wischnewski writes. Time is pressing and "it is the people in Europe especially who would be directly affected by the failure of the talks between the two world powers." Therefore, it is also the task of every federal government to influence both world powers so that Soviet missiles will be dismantled and new American medium-range weapons become superfluous, he says. Federal Chancellor Kohl's visit to the United States has given rise to justifiable doubts "about whether he is ready and able to resolutely represent German and European interests on this vital question."

Johannes Rau's Statements

LD262018 Hamburg DPA in German 1856 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Text] Mainz, 26 Dec (DPA) -- Johannes Rau, prime minister of North Rhine-Westphalia and deputy SPD chairman, believes that the disarmament proposal made by Soviet party head Yuriy Andropov indicates the Soviet side's wish for disarmament. "I urgently warn against dismissing or ignoring the Soviet offier," Rau writes in a commentary in Monday's Mainz newspaper ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG. He says that every peace dialogue is threatened when one "interprets the other side's readiness to negotiate only as weakness." The text of the commentary was prereleased to DPA.

GENSCHER CALLS FOR SOVIET WITHDRAWAL FROM DRA

LD261140 Hamburg DPA in German 1112 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 26 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, on behalf of the Federal Government, has once again appealed to the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan and to enable the Afghan people to freely exercise their right to independence and self-reliance. On the occasion of the third anniversary of the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, Genscher said on Sunday that together with the great majority of other states, the Federal Government calls for a "political solution" of the Afghanistan question.

The federal foreign minister referred to the proposal of the European Council of 30 June 1981 calling for an international Afghanistan conference, a realistic and, for the Soviet Union, acceptable solution. Hope for an early solution of the conflict was placed in the Soviet leadership under the new general secretary, since this conflict puts a special strain on international relations.

Genscher promised that the Federal Government will continue to support the Afghan people in their demand for self-determination and freedom and will do everything in its power to help ameliorate the plight of the refugees.

Over 3 million Afghans, or about one fifth of the total population, have already left for foreign countries. In the country itself, military resistance against the highly-armed interventionist army continues undiminished, Genscher emphasized.

CHANCELLOR KOHL COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH GDR

LD241322 Hamburg DPA in German 1232 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Berlin, 24 Dec (DPA) -- In the view of Chancellor Helmut Kohl, 1983 will not be a year of short-term successes. In an interview in the Christmas edition of the BERLINER MORGENPOST, the chancellor stressed that it would, however, be a year "in which new foundations can be laid for a sound future."

Kohl said that efforts in intra-German policy should be aimed at campaigning for more freedom of movement for people, information and opinions. This year, the GDR has only made small steps in this direction. This is not enough. "People must be able to go from Germany to Germany, from Berlin to Berlin without the fear of death," the chancellor stressed. Gradually conditions must be created that permit this. In all, he is looking forward with great interest to a talk with GDR State Council Chairman Erich Honecker.

A new government under the leadership of the CDU/CSU would realistically continue the policy of dialogue and cooperation with the East, the chancellor said. "We want to create more constructive East-West relations free of illusions, but which at the same time make our position on the Eastern European states unmistakably clear."

BUNDESTAG OFFICIAL CONDEMNS GDR CURRENCY EXCHANGE

LD262152 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Text] In the forthcoming talks with representatives of the GDR, the Federal Government will insist on a rescinding of the increase in the compulsory amount of currency that must be exchanged [by visitors to the GDR and East Berlin]. This has been stated by the chairman of the Bundestag Inner-German Relations Committee, FDP politician Ronneburger. He told the DEUTSCHER DEPESCHEN-DIENST that this demand is not, however, a precondition for a visit to Bonn by Erich Honecker, chairman of the GDR Council of State.

The increase in the amount of currency that has to be exchanged by visitors to the GDR from the West is in contradiction to the Basic Treaty between the two German states and other accords on facilitating contacts between people. On negotiations on a cultural agreement with East Berlin, Ronneburger said that here the GDR has altered its standpoint and is obviously interested in such agreements. There can also be progress in youth exchanges.

GREENS WANT DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF GDR

DW240935 Bonn DIE WELT in German 24 Dec 82 p 4

[Text] Stuttgart--Abandonment of the reunification idea, recognition of "GDR sovereignty"--including "GDR" citizenship and diplomatic recognition of East Berlin by Bonn -- as well as "nonalignment" of both parts of Germany, these are the concepts of the Greens in matters of German policy, Torsten Lange and Ulrich Tost, members of the Greens Land Executive Board for Baden-Wuerttemberg, who explained these concepts yesterday in Stuttgart -- they are now to be submitted to communal organizations -- said explicitly that a "basic consensus on a federal level" exists among the Greens with regard to these issues.

As regards the rejection of the reunification idea, the Executive Board members of the Greens said that "the aim of the treaty partners of the 1955 treaty on Germany to set up a reunited Germany with a constitution similar to that of the Federal Republic, which is integrated in the EC, must be given up in view of the changed reality in Europe." Moreover, the Greens demand "common military neutrality."

TRADE PROTOCOL SIGNED WITH ROMANIA IN BONN

AU102021 Bucharest AGERPRES in English 1845 GMT 10 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, (AGERPRES). 10/12/1982 -- The proceedings of the tenth session of the Joint Governmental Commission of Economic, Industrial and Technical Collaboration between Romania and West Germany took place in Bonn.

During the proceedings the current stage of the economic relations between the two countries were examined and measures were agreed upon for the further development and diversification of the commercial exchanges and of the bilateral economic cooperation and on third markets. At the end of the proceedings, the heads of the two delegations, Alexandru Rosu, minister secretary of state, the Ministry of Foreign Trade and International Economic Cooperation and Martin Gruener, parliamentary secretary of state, the Federal Ministry of Economics signed a protocol which contains concrete cooperation ventures in the machine-building industry, electronics-electrotechnology, chemistry and the light industry.

During the session, the Romanian delegation met and talked with executives of West German companies.

GOVERNMENT TO INVESTIGATE LIBYAN TORTURE CHARGES

LD232030 Hamburg DPA in German 1906 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 23 Dec (DPA) -- The Bonn State Prosecutor's Office is currently investigating whether torture has taken place in the Libyan Embassy in Bonn. A report to this effect in the Friday edition of the KOELNISCHE/BONNER RUNDSCHAU newspaper was confirmed on Thursday by the police in Bonn. Several Libyans living in the FRG had claimed that they had been put under extreme pressure in the residence of the Libyan ambassador and had been tortured during long interrogations.

The newspaper says that the accusations are being leveled against the head of the security service of the diplomatic representation, (Abdul Bassit el-Burki); the health attache, Dr (Abu Kherees); and the cultural attache, (Abdul Rahman Mohammes). They are accused of having forced students in November to reveal the names of Libyans living abroad who are opposed to the government.

FOREIGN MINISTER ANNOUNCES UPCOMING VISIT TO USSR

NC232030 Paris AFP in English 2019 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 23 (AFP) -- French External Relations Minister Claude Cheysson today announced that he will visit the Soviet Union but gave no date. Mr Cheysson said that it was in a spirit of "openness and lucidity" that he will make the trip aimed at the widest possible exchange of views.

He was speaking at a departure lunch for Soviet Ambassador Stepan Chervonenko who will soon be leaving his Paris posting.

Mr Cheysson said that despite differences a Franco-Soviet dialogue was "essential" and had never ceased.

Further Details

NC241829 Paris AFP in English 1804 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 24 (AFP) -- The strain which has marked Franco-Soviet relations since the Socialists came to power here over 18 months ago is apparently easing off, observers said here today after the announcement that French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson will visit the Soviet Union early next year. The visit, planned for February and announced yesterday, will be the first working visit by a French foreign minister to the Soviet Union in four years. As such, it comes as France's first gesture of "goodwill" towards the Soviet Union since President Francois Mitterrand's severe condemnation of Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan.

But Mr. Cheysson himself has repeatedly stressed that ties between Moscow and Paris cannot be "normalized" until the Soviet Union moves out of Afghanistan. And today, authoritative sources here warned against interpreting the visit as a move towards the resumption of "normal" relations, which are generally characterised by a constant interchange of views between two countries.

But when he announced the forthcoming trip during a farewell lunch for the Soviet ambassador here yesterday, Mr Cheysson nevertheless insisted on the "great importance" France placed on this "political visit." The government, he said, had taken its decision "in a spirit of lucidity and goodwill."

Mr Cheysson recently tipped that 1983 could be an extremely "dangerous" year due to the uncertain outcome of the ongoing U.S.-Soviet strategic talks. These pessimistic forecasts probably weighed heavily on France's decision to pursue a top-level dialogue with the Soviet Union.

As for President Mitterrand, he expressed hopes in a recent press interview here that Yuriy Andropov's succession to Leonid Brezhnev as Soviet Communist Party chief would be followed by significant change in Soviet policies, notably in Afghanistan. But whether the strain in ties between France and the Soviet Union will actually ease off altogether will depend on Mr. Andropov's response to Mr Cheysson's initial gesture of goodwill.

When queried on the visit today, French officials refused to indicate whether the foreign minister's trip would be followed by a Franco-Soviet summit which would be the first of its kind for both Mr Mitterrand and Mr Andropov. Asked if a summit was on the agenda, Mr Cheysson said earlier this week that "nothing has been scheduled for the moment but nothing may be excluded."

The last Franco-Soviet summit, held in May 1980, a few months after Soviet troops entered into Afghanistan, was harshly criticised by Mr. Mitterrand, then in the opposition.

SOVIET EMBASSY SCORES MEDIA FOR 'LIBEL'

NC221425 Paris AFP in English 1402 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 22 (AFP) -- The French Communist Party, a member of the left coalition government, and the Soviet Embassy today accused the French mass media, and particularly television, of conducting a systematic "anti-communist campaign".

The party gave examples of what it described as "false reports" of Soviet slave labourers working on the trans-Siberian gas pipeline, and of Bulgarian involvement in the assassination bid against Pope John Paul II last year.

The Soviet Embassy, in a covering letter sent to a number of selected heads of newspapers, magazines, and radio and television editors, said: "During these past few days our country has been the target of the most impudent libels. To our regret, your organisation has participated in these libels in various ways, by using the conditional tense or by using references or statements which have never been made by anyone at all."

"Please allow me to express the certainty that the probity and honour of the journalistic profession will oblige you to publish the attached text in its entirety."

The Soviet Embassy enclosed a statement by the Soviet news agency TASS which read: "Absurd insinuations have been broadcast in recent days in certain Western countries saying that socialist countries were involved in the assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II last May. This campaign, which has the stamp of lies on it, is aimed at Bulgaria." (note editor: The assassination attempt was in fact on May 11, 1981). "It even happens that there are sly winks towards the Soviet Union." "Such absurdities hardly merit attention, especially because the liars have already been given what they deserve."

"But after all it does mean there are attempts to play on the feelings of naive people, especially religious believers." "Facts show that the signs of this revolting provocation reach back to those who support repressive regimes like Chile and El Salvador; give protection to the Israeli aggressor and to terrorists, accustomed to daily demonstrations of violence in their countries." [sentence as received] "The amoral acts of imperialist intelligence services disgust all honest men." "In any case, it is not only intelligence services which are concerned. Lies are used to create sentiments of hatred towards the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and in this way distract tension caused by militaristic psychoses which accompany Western military preparations." "These lies will not be justified because the large majority of the people, quite independently of their social views or their declared opinions, will only be more worried than ever."

The Soviet Embassy said that its protest against the French mass media together with that of the party was not "a joint action" but a result of "unacceptable limits" reached by the French media in its "disinformation over the Soviet Union".

Observers here noted that the PCF, by its protest, was marking its wish to align itself with the communist bloc, at the very moment when French Premier Pierre Mauroy, who heads a coalition government which includes four Communist ministers was keeping his distance from Moscow because of Afghanistan and Poland.

Meanwhile, the moderate "Force Ouvriere" trade union, one of France's "big three", today issued a communique describing the TASS statement as "unacceptable interference by a foreign power in the interior affairs of another country."

It added that the Communist Party was in no position to "give lessons" to others about press freedom or claim to be "victims" of lies in the mass media.

LE MONDE: TATU VIEWS ANDROPOV ARMS PROPOSAL

PM231333 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[Michel Tatu article: "The Carrot and the Stick"]

[Text] Although Mr Andropov is trying to break the ultraconservatism of Soviet policy in some spheres, there is one sector in which his objective is bound to remain that of his predecessor: To prevent the implementation of the December 1979 NATO decision to deploy 572 U.S. nuclear missiles in the 5 West European countries from the end of 1983. The only difference is that he is showing his cards much more quickly than his predecessor.

The language of pressure has been used with new vigor toward public opinions in the past month. After the warning by "Soviet military circles," cited by APN, that the existence of the U.S. Pershing missiles will force the USSR to fire its first missiles against Europe as soon as the first pictures appear on the radar screens (a "launch on warning" theory to which the firiest U.S. military chiefs have always preferred that of "launch on attack," in other words only when an enemy missile has exploded on friendly territory), other Soviet spokesmen followed suit.

For instance, Mr Falin, deputy chief of the CPSU Central Committee International Information Section, told the West German SUDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG (18 December) that "the deployment of the new Atlantic alliance weapons will create an entirely new situation and will force us to completely revise our position." According to Mr Falin, the continuation of the Geneva negotiations will become "impossible" in those conditions.

That is the stick. But the carrot has nonetheless not been forgotten. In this respect, Mr Andropov's latest proposals are very appropriate and represent one more stage in the list of concessions which the USSR has made for about 2 years as regards its SS-20 missile program.

Initially, in the summer of 1980, Brezhnev agreed to negotiations without demanding that NATO first abandon its decision, as Mr Gromyko had said 6 months earlier. Then (in February 1981) he said he was prepared to halt the deployment of the SS-20 missiles in the framework of a negotiated agreement.

In June of the same year, it was possible for that moratorium to come into force as soon as negotiations started provided the United States also suspended its decision in the same period. In November 1981, the former party chief added the offer of an unspecified reduction. Finally, in March 1982, Moscow announced a halt, this time unilateral, in its SS-20 missile program -- a gesture whose validity the Americans dispute since according to them, there are now 334 missiles of that type as against 250 one year ago.

"Not One More"

Mr Andropov's latest proposal is in keeping with the prediction which we made 1 year ago and constitutes a new "advance" in two spheres. First, the party general secretary seems to have rallied round to the negotiating procedure desired by the Americans by separating the missiles from other nuclear devices, particularly aircraft. Second, he is not agreeing to reduce not only the old missiles from the sixties, which in any case are destined for the scrap heap, but this time the modern SS-20 missiles. And he is reducing his demand to a very simple deal: as many SS-20 missiles as there are French and British missiles and "not one more."

At first sight the proposal seems obvious. Britain and France are U.S. allies and the former is even integrated into the NATO military network, and the Soviets have good reason to demand that their forces be counted "somewhere." It is also skillful at the political level. Without stopping addressing their condemnation of the U.S. strategic ambitions to the Europeans, the Soviets are now pointing a finger at the French and British, who are "preventing round-table negotiations." Thus, the pacifists are being told that if there is a new arms race in Europe, it will be their fault, too, and not just that of the Americans.

Nonetheless, this presentation of matters encounters a series of objections.

1 -- The forces which Moscow is thus placing on the same level are in fact scarcely comparable, either as regards their object or their size: we believe that Mr Mitterrand explained that bluntly to Soviet Ambassador Chervonenko, who had come to give him a copy of Mr Andropov's speech on Monday evening. The Soviet SS-20 arsenal, however big, only represents a fraction of the USSR's nuclear potential. It can "operate on the fringes" whereas France needs all it has and no less to ensure its security. Thus there is no question of exchanging one for the other.

2 -- In addition to that, any French aggression against the Soviet Union is unthinkable and all sides know that well. The same cannot be said of the Soviet arsenal which, by both its size and technical characteristics, places the Kremlin in a position to carry out all kinds of operations, including a war of aggression in Europe. And the Elysee points out that even a stock of SS-20 missiles limited to 160 vehicles -- the equivalent of the number of French and British missiles -- represents 480 warheads -- in other words, exactly the number of NATO military targets in Western Europe.

3 -- Mr Andropov is attributing to the French and British arsenals an ambition which they do not have. These national forces are intended to deter an attack on the territory of those two countries and virtually nothing but that, whereas the SS-20 missiles threaten the whole of Western Europe, and indeed the whole of Eurasia and the Maghreb. Are we to conclude from the Soviet proposal that France and Britain, which are apparently presumed to counter that arsenal, should also defend the FRG, Italy and all the other countries threatened? The Soviet leaders were not thought to be so anxious to promote the "European defense" about which many of the old continent's leaders are thinking.

A Questionable Comparison

4 -- At the technical level, it is questionable to class the SS-20 missiles, which are surface missiles, with the submarine missiles which (aside from the aircraft and the 18 missiles on the plateau d'Albion) make up most of the French and British arsenals. The former are credited with greater accuracy and a shorter reaction time, are targeted at enemy military targets and could possibly be used in a first strike. The latter pose much more complex communications problems, are less accurate and represent the typical deterrence weapon which can be used in a second countercity strike.

Finally and especially, the Soviet Union itself had a formidable arsenal of submarine missiles (almost 950 launchers on board approximately 60 submarines) which can be targeted at Europe as just readily at the United States. If anything it is that force and not the much more offensive SS-20 arsenal which represents the equivalent of the French and British deterrent.

Nonetheless, the rejection already pronounced by most Western governments of Mr Andropov's latest proposals does not mean that there is no scope for negotiation. Mr Reagan's "zero option" is, as he himself admits, not the only conceivable solution. Should we conclude that the only option is to seek a compromise between that zero option and the 333 existing SS-20 missiles, as some people do? That would be to jump to hasty conclusions and would in particular justify Mr Andropov's calculation in advance: that average figure would clearly be very close to the 160 units he is now mentioning by means of which NATO would have to abandon its 1979 decision with all the political and psychological consequences one can imagine that having. Therefore, other proposals ought to be considered instead.

1 -- The first would consist of expanding the sphere of the negotiations to all nuclear weapons in Europe, including the so-called "tactical" weapons -- with less than 1,000 km range -- in other words, to what are called the U.S. "forward-based systems." The Soviets have been asking for discussion on that subject for 20 years and the Americans, who have placed themselves in a position of weakness by allowing a vast 4-year debate on the Euromissiles to develop, will certainly have to resign themselves to that. Now at a time when their command in Europe is agreeing, under pressure from U.S. opinion, to raise the nuclear threshold or even to renounce the first use of nuclear weapons -- they ought to be able to abandon a good part if not all of the 6,000 nuclear warheads, which are obsolete and of dubious efficacy, which they still have in Europe. A zero option extended to all the nuclear arms in the entire European sector would have better chances of being accepted by the Soviets, not to mention the support it would have in pacifist circles.

Concessions on the Pershing Missiles?

2 -- Concessions on the Pershing II missiles might be kept in reserve. Many politicians in Europe tend not to draw any distinction between those ballistic missiles, whose flying time is between 4 and 6 minutes, and the cruise missiles, which takes 3 hours to reach their targets, and to take at face value the Soviet argument that this threat of attack "without warnings" places them in an unacceptable position. People forget that not only do the SS-20 missiles pose the same risk for the West, but also that only 108 Pershing missiles are planned compared with 464 cruise missiles. A new limitation on those missiles to the benefit of the cruise missiles would remove some recriminations and would strengthen the "second strike" character of the system planned by NATO.

3 -- Finally, it will probably be necessary to take account of the French and British forces.

But since they are generally accepted to be "strategic," why not include them (unofficially if necessary to spare feelings) in the framework of the START negotiations which the Russians and Americans are holding in Geneva on their strategic armaments and give Moscow a contingent of submarine missiles equivalent to that of the similar missiles held by the U.S. allies? The gesture would not be particularly painful to the Americans since they already have around 300 fewer submarine missiles than the USSR. Reducing the gap to 160 would even enable them to increase their stock....

Thus, as can be seen, there is a margin open to negotiation between the categorical refusals and invective in which the participants now seem to be locked. Perhaps the time has not yet come to show all the cards. But Mr Andropov's proposal provides an opportunity to think about ways of overcoming what could, if care is not taken, lead to a serious crisis in East-West relations.

ARMY CANNOT AVOID ECONOMIC 'STRINGENCY' EFFORT

PM220803 Paris LE MONDE in French 18 Dec 82 p 36

[Unattributed report: "The Army Must Take Part in National Stringency Efforts"]

[Text] In his Christmas message to units published in the latest issue of TERRE INFORMATION, Army Chief of Staff Gen Jean Delaunay calls on his officers who, he writes, he feels are in a state of "anxious expectancy" as this year draws to an end, to "take part in the national stringency effort in the present economic situation."

General Delaunay writes in particular: "1983 will probably be a difficult year as regards the management of our money and our men but, in the present economic situation, we must take part in the national stringency effort. This will also be an important year because it will see the drafting of the 1984-1988 military programming law itself based -- even before the choice of means -- on the definition of a defense policy to meet the threats of the coming years.

"Our future organization will show an inevitable change compared with the past because things change. For instance, at a tactical and technical level, I am thinking of the increased range of the Hades missile compared with the Pluton missile, the night flying capability of future helicopters, the protection of future tanks against armor piercing charges [charges creuses]; in the human sphere, I am thinking of a voluntary option for long service offered to conscripts."

The chief of staff concluded: "However, one certainty remains: The importance which the Army still has in defense," because, General Delaunay recalled," the president of the republic strongly emphasized at Canjuers on 15 October that the Army is part of the overall deterrent."

ECONOMY MINISTER DELORS ON ECONOMIC POLICY

PM230803 Paris LE MONDE in French 21 Dec 82 p 32

[Unattributed report: "Mr Jacques Delors on Europe 1 Press Club"]

[Excerpts] Mr Jacques Delors was the Europe 1 Press Club's guest on Sunday, 19 December. Referring to the recent monetary developments, the economy and finance minister said:

"If the monetary storm continues we will resist because there is no objective reason for changing the franc's parity in relation to the Deutschmark or the other currencies. If we can withstand a fall in the dollar, that will have beneficial effects for our imports and will be a good thing for the whole of Europe."

Confirming France's intention to stay in the European Monetary System [ENS], he added:

"We are not the only ones to think like that. The Belgians, Italians and Irish are doing likewise. And there are reasons for it. When you are a member of a club and you believe in its future, you have rights and duties. There will come a time when the Germans have duties and they will fulfill them. When I have discussions with the U.S. Administration now, what am I given as a reference of what a satisfactory monetary order might be in the future if not the EMS?"

Justifying France's borrowing policy by the need "to make ends meet," Mr Delors recalled that the second oil blow necessitated a 2-percent reduction in the purchasing power, which "Mr Barre's government did not make," and discussed monetary prospects.

"At present there are two positive signs. On the one hand, the Americans have agreed to increase the resources of the international monetary institutions; and on the other, when we faced two extremely difficult problems concerning two Latin American countries, cooperation between our countries worked quickly and without tension, and this is exceptional.

"In doing that, we were acting as firemen. We must now be architects. A system must be rebuilt. And I am convinced that the day when the whole world knows that there is an additional $60 billion at the disposal of countries passing through a difficult phase, in other words, the developing countries, it will be a positive thing.

Then, after indicating that he does not intend to discourage consumption in 1983, Mr Delors added: "In the policies pursued by other countries, some people expect too much from monetary policy; the result is increasing unemployment but no investment. And there are too many people who expect too much from the budget policy, in other words, who restrict the budget too much; the result of that is more social injustices and not enough investment. We are trying to balance budgetary policy, monetary policy and a reasonable evolution of prices and incomes. It is a fairly original mixed policy. The advantage of this policy is that it enables us to reconcile stringency in the present and dynamism for the future."

SAUDI ARABIA GRANTS 'TOP SECRET' $4 BILLION LOAN

LD240930 Paris Domestic Service in French 0700 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] The Saudi loan to France is a top-secret matter. Minister of Economy Jacques Delors confirmed on his return from Riyadh that the agreement has been signed, but that is all. In fact, he refused to disclose the smallest details about the size of the loan or its terms and this, it seems, is at the Saudis' request.

Unofficial sources in Riyadh have indicated that the agreement involves $4 billion; that is, F28 billion, and that the loan will support the national currency. The Bank of France needs it indeed, since it had to spend some F9 billion between 10 November and 16 December to back the franc against speculation.

FOREIGN MINISTRY ON ANDROPOV NUCLEAR PROPOSALS

AU232011 Rome ANSA in English 1945 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 23 -- The Farnesina (Italian Foreign Ministry) today said that the position taken by the new Soviet Communist leader Yuriy Andropov during his December 21 address with regard to the nuclear arms negotiations in Geneva, although containing potentially positive elements, did not differ substantially from previous Soviet positions.

The Farnesina viewed favorably, however, the fact that top Soviet leaders recognized the vital importance of reaching concrete results in the talks for the sake of peace and security not only in Europe but on the entire planet.

As to intermediary nuclear weapons, the ministry noted that the Soviet proposal did not go beyond offering to transfer a certain number (perhaps around 90), of the SS-20 missiles back beyond the Urals, but in exchange wanted NATO to abandon its entire program of installing Pershing 2 and cruise missiles.

The Farnesia said that this did not correspond to the criterion of parity that should inspire the constructive search for a solution in this field. The ministry also said that in the present framework, the Soviet position did not seem to take into account the fact that the French and British underwater missile systems represent an autonomous strategic deterrent which should be taken into consideration only in a later, more advanced stage of multilateral negotiations to reduce strategic weapons.

As to the "START" negotiations, it was noted that the Soviet reaffirmation of the Kremlin's willingness to proceed to a substantial reduction of strategic launchers appeared a confirmation of positions known for some time.

Of more interest, especially as there may the further developments [as received], were Soviet hints that the Kremlin might consider including the number of strategic nuclear warheads in the talks in addition to the launching systems, the Farnesina said.

NATO MAY GET BRIEFED ON BULGARIAN CASE

AU231530 Rome ANSA in English 1545 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Brussels, December 23 -- The Italian Government may decide to inform NATO allies on the Bulgarian case during joint assessments conducted by the allies on East-West relations, informed diplomatic sources at NATO headquarters said today in response to Italian press accounts and reports in the French and Belgium press to the effect that this information has already been divulged.

These same sources recalled that a few days ago statements along these lines were made and pointed to a declaration released December 13 by Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo who affirmed that Italy could bring the Bulgarian case before NATO if the hypothesis developed by a study of the assassination attempt against the pope were subsequently confirmed.

Papers on 'Bulgarian Connection'

AU231023 Rome ANSA in English 0823 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 23 -- Allegations of Bulgarian involvement in last year's attempt to assassinate the pope, in drugs and arms trafficking and terrorism in Italy have not only threatened the stability of relations between Italy and the Balkan nation but the staying power of the understanding forged between the Christian Democratic (DC) and Socialist parties, who along with the Social Democrats and the Liberals make up the new government led by Amintore Fanfani.

When the first press leaks began of suspected participation of Bulgarian secret service agents in the plot to assassinate Pope John Paul two, the socialists accused DC ministers of excessive caution in assessing the situation and Bulgaria's stance with regard to the case.

All political observers here today underscored the fact that in Monday's parliamentary debate of the "Bulgarian connection", Socialist Defense Minister Lelio Lagorio's tone was tough with respect to that of the three DC ministers: Emilio Colombo (foreign relations), Clelio Darida (justice) and Virginio Rognoni (interior).

The Christian Democrat daily "IL POPOLO" and the socialist paper "AVANTI" today criticized the other party's interpretation of the Bulgarian case. The "IL POPOLO" said the PSI [Italian Socialist Party], consciously or not, gave the impression that it was setting the stage for a possible government crisis. The paper said that the gravity of the international and internal situation was as not to allow "political games of this kind". In relations between states, it is possible to go only on hard evidence and facts, the DC daily said. There can be no space for instrumentalization for internal ends, the paper warned.

In its reply, the PSI paper referred to "IL POPOLO's" "incredible note" with regard to the charge of instrumentalizing the Bulgarian case for interior internal ends. The paper said that an accusation of this sort was lodged against Socialist Secretary Bettino Craxi in March of 1979 by the Czechoslovak paper "RUDE PRAVO" because he had publicly raised in Italy, for the first time, the possibility of international links to terrorism. The paper said that the "IL POPOLO" accusation was part of "a classic campaign of disinformation".

In a lengthy article appearing in the Rome daily "LA REPUBBLICA", DC Secretary Ciriaco De Mita discussed the situation of his party and its relations with the country's other political forces. The nature of Italy's situation of crisis, and the program and prospects of the Fanfani government. With regard to relations between the Christian Democrats and the opposition Communists, De Mita said that these relations were going through a period of crisis. He said that both parties must renew themselves and that if this occurs, Italian democracy would emerge consolidated and an alternative would be truly possible. If not, democracy in Italy would face serious risks, De Mita said. The DC secretary said he did not underestimate the role of the Socialist Party. "If it remains in alliance with us it will be an indispensible contribution not only in quantitative terms but for the interests and demands it represents," he said.

In another development here, Merchant Marine Minister Michele Di Giesi, a Social Democrat, complained that Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo, a Christian Democrat, went to Tunis to discuss fishing problems with that government without informing him. Colombo sought to soothe Di Giesi's ruffled feelings, assuring him of his respect for the functions of the merchant marine minister.

Rognoni on Bulgarian Case

PM220807 Paris LE MONDE in French 21 Dec 82 pp 1,6

[Interview with Italian Interior Minister Virgilio Rognoni by Philippe Pons in Rome -- date not given]

[Text] Rome -- On the eve of the parliamentary debate on the "Bulgarian connection" and the investigations into terrorism Interior Minister Virgilio Rognoni granted us an interview on those two subjects. Questioned on the assertion that Mr. De Marenches, former director of the general directorate of foreign security, had warned the Vatican of a plot against the pope, Mr Rognoni gave a categorical reply:

"Neither the Italian intelligence services nor the police, which, in any case, ought to be the legitimate and responsible recipients of that information, received it. I have every reason to think that that information did not reach the Vatican."

Indeed it should be noted that, under the terms of the 1929 Concordat, it is the Italian police's job to ensure the pope's security on the national territory. If the Vatican had received such information it would normally have referred it to the Italian authorities. St Peter's Square is no doubt Italian national territory up to the lines of light-colored stones which extend from the two curves of Bernini's Colonnade. But the Holy See has always given the Italian police force the job of checking the sector belonging to Vatican territory.

The interview with the Italian interior minister continued as follows:

[Question] There seems to be a Bulgarian connection in the attack on the pope, in the arms and drugs trafficking affair discovered in Trento and in the Scricciolo affair. What is your view?

[Answer] There is certainly a common reference to Bulgaria in those three judicial investigations. There are either links with Bulgarian citizens (diplomats or others), or relations with that country's secret services or even the use of Bulgaria as a ready place of transit for arms and drugs traffic.

[Question] There is a strange coincidence in the timing of the revelations on these three investigations. How can that be explained?

[Answer] These three jucicial matters began independently in different places and at different times and the executive cannot have any influence on the investigations. For instance the investigation into arms and drug trafficking which recently led the Trento magistrates to charge a large number of Italians and foreigners began in November 1979.

There were new developments in the investigation on the attack on the pope mainly as a result of the revelations made by Ali Agca, who had originally said nothing. There may be various reasons for that change of attitude by Agca, already sentenced to life imprisonment. It is not impossible that he hopes to be able to obtain certain advantages allowed by the law.

[Question] What do you think of Bulgaria's proposal that investigating Magistrate Martella should go there and question Bechir Celenk?

[Answer] Any readiness by the Bulgarian authorities to meet the requirements of Italian justice should be regarded as a positive fact. Of course we will have to see what type of cooperation Judge Martella will be given if he goes to Bulgaria.

[Question] In commenting on these different affairs you have urged caution several times. Is this caution not excessive in view of what is known?

[Answer] Caution in interpretations certainly does not mean a lack of will to pursue all useful leads to arrive at the truth. The police forces and secret services have followed all the leads, and the results, which have been published in the past few days, show that nothing has been neglected in any direction.

Rognoni On Terrorism

PM231341 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MONDE in French 22 December 1982 carries on page 3 a 1,100-word interview with Italian Interior Minister Virgilio Rognoni by Philippe Pons in Rome, in which Rognoni discusses the problem of terrorism and cooperation with other countries on this issue. After briefly giving details of the numbers of convicted terrorists in prison in Italy, and their division between extreme right and extreme left, Rognoni describes the provisions of the law on terrorists who turn state's evidence, The main aim of which is to "dismantle the subversive organizations from within." Rognoni goes on to criticize France for giving asylum to "people charged with serious common law crimes, even if they were committed with a political motive." He adds that harmonization between the French and Italian approaches to the terrorist problem is vital to the struggle against terrorism, which will otherwise "gradually be weakened." Rognoni concludes by denying allegations that torture has been used on people accused of terrorist crimes in Italy.

POPE WISHES FOR PEACE, DIALOGUE IN POLAND

LD241600 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] John Paul II received in audience this morning, members of the Polish community of Rome, for the exchange of Christmas wishes. The group was led by Monsignor Szczepan Wesoly, the Polish Primate's delegation for the pastoral care of Poles abroad. In his discourse, following the greetings given by Monsignor Wesoly, the pope expressed his own Christmas wishes for the comunity, and spoke of the 600th anniversary of the Black Madonna in Czestochowa, the canonization of one of the great sons of Poland, Father Makszymilian Kolbe, and the significances of the Polish custom of Oplatek, the breaking of bread in the form of a (?host), the traditional gesture of Christmas wishes in Poland. [passage indistinct]

The pope invoked upon those present and upon the whole Polish nation the wish of peace, that his homeland may live not in a state of war, but in a state of peace. But peace is linked with dialogue, dialogue with man and with society. Dialogue is the recognition and respect for man in society, as a subject and not as an object. John Paul II wished that the church in Poland may give glory to God in the highest, in the search for that peace which is given to men of good will, and that the church in Poland may defend those who defend peace in the homeland.

STATE-VATICAN COMMISSION TO PROBE BANK SCANDAL

AU242028 Rome ANSA in English 1950 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Excerpt] (ANSA) -- Rome, December 24 -- The Vatican and the Italian state have agreed to set up a joint commission, with three representatives for each side, to ascertain the truth behind relations between the Institute for Religious Works (IOR), the Vatican Bank, and the now bankrupt Banco Ambrosiano.

The announcement was made today by the Italian Foreign Ministry which said that the agreement was signed by Cardinal Agostino Casaroli, Vatican secretary of state, and the Italian ambassador to the Holy See, Claudio Chelli.

Italy will be represented on the commission by lawyer Pasquale Chiomenti, professor Mario Cattaneo, lawyer Alberto Santa Maria. The Vatican representatives will be lawyer Antonio Gambino, lawyer Pellegrini Capalbo and Doctor Renato Dardozzi.

EANES ON EEC, EUROPEAN DEFENSE, LAJES BASE

PM241127 Paris LE FIGARO in French 21 Dec 82 p 4

[Laurent Mossu dispatch: "Portuguese President Deplores EEC Vacillation"]

[Text] Lisbon -- "A Europe which did not understand the strategic importance of the continent's southern countries would never be able to play a real world role." In saying that, the president of the republic of Portugal expressed his anxiety at the Community's evasiveness about the idea of his country joining the EEC.

Indeed the recent stance adopted by the European ministers postponing the negotiations on entry by Spain and Portugal could not have been more unwelcome in Lisbon. Gen Antonio Ramalho Eanes, who was giving a lunch for foreign journalists in his palace in Cascais, dismissed the technical excuses put forward at the time. He also expressed regret that the guarantees given by some politicans -- others, less bound by protocol, mention France by name -- have still not been kept.

"A Europe which is not willing to expand southwards and which does not understand the real facts of the new world economic order cannot aspire to the role of great power in any way," and, as if to clearly mark the camp to which he belongs, President Eanes made a clear reference to the negotiations at present taking place between his country and the United States on the renewal of the agreements on using the Lajes Base in the Azores.

Washington is attaching increasing importance to its stopover facilities, especially because of the requirements of the Rapid Deployment Force which the United States has set up. As is known, it is intended to be able to intervene as quickly as possible in the Middle East, Africa or Europe but it needs a support and supply point en route.

A New Military Agreement

Lisbon is fully prepared to accept the extension of the agreements or even an expansion of the U.S. base. That has been accepted in principle. The most President Eanes wants to do is to establish the details of the deal. In 1979 the United States obtained what it wanted very cheaply. It cost it $140 million. This time the bill will probably be very much higher. Negotiations are due to be completed before the beginning of February.

Similarly Europe ought to abandon its egoism and ask "how many days Soviet divisions need to reach the Algarve." "Unfortunately," President Eanes, who is nonetheless often accused of Marxism, said, "that is not the Europeans' main concern. Their concerns in this sphere seem to be limited to thinking primarily of their own borders."

"In this sphere, when it comes to a comprehensive policy, it is the United States which is right," he noted. President Eanes thinks that Europe is mistaken when it refrains from making the necessary efforts to ensure its protection. Since it is now completely dependent on the Americans it must inevitably pay the price of its laxity.

Since he wanted his image abroad to be changed, President Eanes clearly stated that he supports democratic socialism. "I am not a Marxist, although I do not refuse to use some of the means it offers us." The head of state also gave a lengthy explanation of his relations with the Portuguese church, paying warm tribute to the cardinal of Lisbon who has sided with him in a fight against suffering, deprivation and poverty.

GOVERNMENT, BALSEMAO RESIGNATION MADE OFFICIAL

LD232028 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Communique issued by the presidency of the Portuguese Republic on 23 December -- read by presidency spokesman Joaquim Letria]

[Text] The president of the republic today signed the decree making official the resignation of the government, following his acceptance of the resignation of Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao, under the terms of Article 198, paragraph 1, clause B of the Constitution.

Under Article 189, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, the outgoing government will now only have the powers required for carrying out acts that are strictly necessary to ensure the management of current affairs of the state.

On 27 December, the president of the republic will start the constitutional demarches to solve the political crisis. He will begin to receive in audience delegations of the political parties represented in the Assembly of the Republic.

PSD TO PROPOSE VITOR CRESPO FOR PRIME MINISTER

LD270212 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Professor Vitor Crespo is to be proposed by the Socialist Democratic Party [PSD] for the post of prime minister of the [yet to be formed] 9th constitutional government, according to first-hand information given to our reporter Pedro Cid.

Francisco Pinto Balsemao, who last night [26 December] met at Quinta Da Marinha [Balsemao's private residence] the members of the PSD Permanent Committee, is expected to propose Vitor Crespo for head of the next government to the members of the National Political Committee of the PSD today.

Vitor Crespo was minister of education and science in the 6th constitutional government under Francisco Sa Carneiro and is a member of the PSD National Council.

SPANISH PRESS ON SECRETARY SHULTZ VISIT

PM231353 [Editorial Report] Spanish newspapers published 17 December 1982 carry editorials on U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz' recent visit to Madrid, commenting especially on its significance as regards Spain's membership of NATO and the bilateral agreements with the United States.

Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA notes on page 5 that Shultz "publicly confirmed U.S. support for Spanish democracy," and maintains that it is "also significant that Shultz should publicly recognize that Spain can play a role in resolving the Central American crisis." It continues: "The most important aspect of the first international visit to the new socialist government lies, however, in two key issues of our foreign policy: NATO and the bilateral treaty with the United States. Shultz has been clear: He believes that it would be better for Spain and for the alliance for our country to become integrated into NATO's military organization, but at the same time he has shown understanding for the Spanish stance. As for the bilateral treaty, it is already a step forward, apparently, that the United States is prepared to renegotiate some secondary aspects and even to make some spectacular concession. Nor does the government itself seem interested in overturning the contents of the treaty -- an anchor which has secured us for years in the Western vocation -- which can thus be ratified by the Cortes without much delay. Agreements between two sides usually prove easier and simpler than multilateral agreements. While awaiting the developmennt of events, it is a good sign that the new Spanish Government has begun without attacks of high-flown words to pursue good relations with the most powerful and crucial administration and government in the West." It concludes: "Washington is the center of Western politics, and everything that means improving our relations with it could have favorable repercussions, even on our continent. However, the question remains as to whether Spain will continue to have the United States as its sole Western mainstay -- something already achieved under Franco -- or will also be able to find sound, stable and advantageous ties and footholds in Europe."

Madrid ABC asserts on page 14 that "there is a general atmosphere in these Madrid talks in which the viewpoint repeated with greater or lesser emphasis by Washington since World War II is reiterated. Cooperation within the West must be seen as an indivisible whole, open on various fronts: The economy, science and technology, defense and cultural cooperation," noting that Shultz "did not come to negotiate any specific point of the bilateral agreement." It comments in this connection: "Of course, the Socialist government, backed by a large parliamentary majority, could seek the immediate revision of the agreements signed by Spain and the United States 5 months ago, it is also true that the significance of a step of this nature cannot be disregarded. The first problem posed would be of a strictly military nature. The modernization of the Spanish Armed Forces can be effected under much more favorable conditions if Spain's integration into the Atlantic alliance's military structure takes place."

After maintaining that "the recovery of Gibraltar is far more likely from within the alliance," it concludes: "Today, at the end of Mr Shultz' visit, there are two conflicting options which stand above the subtleties of diplomatic technique. A government which decided to bar the Spanish bases to U.S. use would not meet with a response of alarm or upset the Western defense system, but it would weaken Spain's security. The military facilities which Spain offers the United States can be replaced relatively simply by the Americans, but it would open a window of vulnerablility for our country. That is why Prime Minister Gonzalez and the foreign minister have again emphasized the loyalty and firmness with which Spain will maintain its Western commitment. Fernando Moran has also referred to the need to dispel any cause of misunderstanding. The next few months will tell whether those words pertain to the sphere of diplomatic politeness or to the real need to clarify the contradictions."

Madrid YA contends on page 5 that if Shultz "has taken good note of what he was told in Madrid, when checking his diary to give an account of his actions to President Reagan he will have to emphasize two facts: The first is that the Spanish-U.S. agreements will have to be renegotiated soon; the second is that Spanish participation in the Atlantic alliance's military structure is negotiable and that any assistance which could be given to Madrid in the favorable resolution of the dispute over Gibraltar would not only be well received but would even persuade the Spanish people -- well led by their government -- to accept the status of an 'atlanticist' country with all its consequences."

After noting Spain's possible role as regards Central America, it concludes: "Secretary of State Shultz will have taken good note of the fact that the United States has a good ally and a friendly country in Spain, but not a submissive servant, that the time of effusiveness is over and that realism without arrogance has prevailed, not only because that is the Socialist government's policy but also because of the awareness which the Spanish people have of their own role in Europe and as regards 'their' beloved Latin America."

SOVIET EMBASSY DENIES USSR-TERRORIST LINK

LD241930 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] The Soviet Embassy in Madrid has issued an official statement denying that there was any connection between the USSR and terrorist activities in Spain. Here is the statement read by a spokesman of the Soviet Embassy:

[Begin recording of unidentified speaker] The USSR Embassy in Spain denies in the most forthright manner the slanderous allegations circulated by certain elements of the Spanish media regarding a supposed link between the Soviet Union and terrorist activities. What we see here are some absurd allegations, which do not contain one iota of truth. It is evident that the spreading of these provocative lies is aimed at poisoning the good atmosphere that exists in Soviet-Spanish relations. That is all. [end recording]

This not from the Soviet Embassy refers to a report published yesterday in the Madrid paper YA, which was repeated by other elements and had been admitted as a possibility by none other than the director-general of state security, Rafael Vera. He said to Radio Nacional yesterday that although there was no clear data existing, it could not be discounted that the Soviet Union gave backing to ETA.

INTERIOR MINISTER ON HANDLING ETA, COUP THREATS

PA232247 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1741 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Madrid, 22 Dec (EFE) -- Spanish Interior Minister Jose Barrionuevo today labeled the Euzkadi Ta Azkatasuna, ETA, as a "gang of miscreants with whom no negotiations are possible."

At a traditional breakfast at the "Ritz," in which the minister breakfasted with a group of journalists, Jose Barrioneuvo reviewed the Socialist government's domestic policy and its hottest subjects, such as terrorism and the threat of a coup. The minister called ETA's activities plain gangsterism, describing ETA as a gang of miscreants with whom negotiations are impossible.

Nevertheless, Barrionuevo expressed his readiness to change his opinion of ETA if it commits no terrorist attacks during the next 6 months. He added that there is a threat of a new ETA terrorist attack on Christmas eve in an effort to "feel out" the new Socialist government. In this respect, Barrionuevo said that all forces have been alerted. If we manage to control this situation, we can say that we have triumphed, he emphasized. The interior minister cited the "struggle against the so-called revolutionary tax" as one of the immediate objectives in the fight against terrorism. He said: "We will act against the middlemen, whose attitude is contemptible."

Regarding fears of a coup, Barrionuevo described the present situation as an "eclipse of coupism," saying that while coupism has not completely disappeared, it has also been unable so far to black out the 10 million votes cast in support of the Socialist government. "Nothing will be forgetten here. The government will investigate the roots of the action of the coupist groups with tenacity and perseverance to avoid leaving anything uninvestigated," he emphasized. Along this line, he announced the establishment of several information services [servicios de informacion] that the government will create in the various departments of the administration, which at the highest level will be coordinated from the prime minister's office.

He also expresses deep appreciation for the consistent support of the Soviet Union for the just cause of Cyprus.

Papaioannou Statement on Moscow Visit

[Text] On his return from Moscow yesterday, AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou made the following statement:

"The celebrations on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the establishment of the USSR were very impressive. The USSR, which consists of 15 republics and over 100 nationalities, is the first and only country to have solved its national issue satisfactorily. This shows that only socialism is truly in a position to solve this problem satisfactorily, which is unsolved in most countries in the world.

"The address by Yuriy Andropov, General Secretary of the CPSU Central Committee, at the festive session at the Palace of Congresses in the Kremlin was strong guidance for the great Soviet people in their struggle for peace and a more perfect society — the Communist society which is being built in the Soviet Union today. The new Soviet initiative for peace contained in Comrade Andropov's address can and must find a response among all people who wish for peace and the avoidance of a thermonuclear holocaust.

"The devotion of all Soviet people with whom I spoke to the cause of peace was truly exceptional. All those who sincerely want rapprochement with the Soviet Union have only to speak in this langauge of peace to be certain that they will find a willing response. However, the Soviet Union will never tolerate threats and extortions 'from positions of power.' The Soviet Union is in a position to answer any aggressor with devastating blows.

"In all my contacts in Moscow during my stay there, I found the Soviet people to be well informed about the Cyprus problem and the Soviet Union to be the consistent supporter and helper of the Cypriot people in their liberation struggle. The Soviet Union supports steadily and consistently the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Cypriot territory and maintains that the Cyprus issue should be solved in accordance with UN resolutions. It steadily and consistently supports a Cyprus which will be truly independent, sovereign, territorially integral, nonaligned and demilitarized."

[Excerpt] The Kaisis family received an early Christmas present yesterday: One of their members returned home after a 36-day ordeal in Romania where he described himself as a "hostage". Mr Andreas Kaisis, chairman of the Car Manufacturing KMC Group, went to Bucharest on Nov 17 at the invitation of the Aexim (Auto Export Import) to discuss pending affairs, but his departure was repeatedly prevented by the Romanian authorities before a settlement as they understood it was reached. He returned to Cyprus through Athens.

ALITHIA STRESSES NEED FOR PAN-NATIONAL MEETING

[Text] According to special information obtained from Athens, immediately following the presidential elections -- around the end of February or beginning of March -- the issue of pan-national meeting or even new consultations by the Greek prime minister with the Cypriot political leaders on the national problem will be raised.

This will be necessary because of Mr Papandreou's future contacts in Europe, particularly in France, and because of the expected talks with Secretary of State Shultz, who will go to Athens next month. At the same time it is expected that the framework that the EEC is preparing now and that it will propose for the Cyprus issue will be banished to the political backstage. After the Greek prime minister's official visit to Canada in March, it is anticipated that his tour will take him to Washington, where he will hold talks with President Reagan on the Greek-Turkish differences and on the Cyprus issue.

Those close to Mr Papandreou conclude that he would like to be surrounded by a consensus on Cyprus' wider political line in order that he may promote positions and the resolution of the Cyprus issue. The same sources stipulate that if AKEL continues to play the same role in Cyprus' affairs -- inciting negatively against the West or any Western initiative -- then its political isolation or even the breaking of relations with Athens of those who have been proven to be committed to the Communist strategy will be a foregone conclusion.

The same political officials in Athens state that if the minimum program is not put out of action with the outcome of the elections, it will be nullified by Athens, which will pursue a joint national line so that the national center's support and alignment can express itself substantively and fruitfully. Thus, despite the doubts that accompny Foreign Minister Rolandhis' latest statement on the need to consider the Cyprus issue a national issue and not a government one, Athens considers the statement a "good indication" because it includes the recognition of the need for a pan-national dialogue. This is why it is believed that a pan-national meeting, immediately following the presidential elections in Cyprus and despite any AKEL reactions, will be an historic event.

ARCHBISHOP KHRISOSTOMOS ON NATIONAL ISSUE

NC262155 Athens AKPOPOLIS TIS KIRIAKIS in Greek 25-26 Dec 82 p 5

[Interview with Cyprus Archbishop Khrisostomos by Mairi Papanoniari in Nicosia; date not given]

[Excerpts] With the principle that "the church is the people and every problem of the people concerns the church," Archbishop Khrisostomos has undertaken in the past 5 years a particularly active role in the political life of Cyprus, thus following the tradition of many of his predecessors and mainly of Makarios, whose close associate he was before he succeeded him.

Always placing his political involvement exclusively in the national issue of Cyprus and not in its domestic problems -- in the narrow meaning of the term -- Archbishop Khrisostomos is today considered as an exceptionally active church leader and objectively right in his views on the promotion and handling of the entire Cyprus issue.

[Question] Your beatitude, you have recently met with President Kiprianou. Did you come to an agreement this time or disagree.... The Cypriot press talks about a conflict....

[Answer] We have met and expressed our views and positions on the course that should be followed. I would not like to stress whether there are agreements or disagreements. You may be aware of my personal views on the course of the Cyprus issue more generally from information or press reports since I even declare them from the pulpit. So, I repeat that I have never personally believed in the dialogue and the conditions under which it is being conducted, because no free dialogue can be conducted and bring about results as long as there are Turkish troops in Cyprus.

Of course, these troops have not come here for a walk... Gumes [former Turkish minister] had stated that "We did not go to Cyprus for the 100,000 Turkish Cypriots but for its strategic position." Therefore, they have come here either to be given the opportunity to complete the occupation of Cyprus or to attain such a solution that would enable them to convert the northern part of Cyprus into their own military and political bridgehead.... This means that the Greeks of Cyprus will always be under the threat of Turkish arms.

Consequently, the dialogue is being used by Turkey only to consolidate the policy and propaganda it is conducting in world public opinion, namely that the problem is a dispute between the two communities.

[Question] Are you optimistic that there will soon be some positive development?

[Answer] I cannot determine the time limits within which a solution would be achieved. I believe, however, that we can accomplish a solution that would vindicate Cyprus Hellenism because the national issue of Cyprus is a question for all Greeks wherever they may be. If all Hellenism rallies together in a common line it will be a great force and will win.

[Question] In this way, you are also referring to the Greek-Americans. Do you have any indication that they would undertake a new campaign or have you made other proposals after 1979....

[Answer] I have planned various ways for them to become active in an effective manner. We all know that the United States has the greatest ability to exert pressure on Turkey and, therefore, can help toward a solution. Consequently, the Greek-Americans are of immense importance.

What I would like to stress, however, despite their intentions and efforts as well as their touching contributions is that there is no specific action plan. All that is being done is circumstantial. Had there been a program, we would have had excellent results. Speeches and statements are good but they cause emotion temporarily....I have already announced to the government a program, on which I cannot comment, that I think is very effective but it has not as yet been implemented.

[Question] Your beatitude, it is Christams. How really "heavy" is the heart of Cyprus....

[Answer] It is true that the solution toward confronting the economic problems has somehow relaxed this feeling that existed before, and this is unfortunate, not because we have solved the [economic] problems but because their solution has led our people to some indifference and a passive stance toward the national problem.

TURKISH CYPRIOT COUNTERS MOUSIOUTAS LETTER AT UN

TA251205 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 25 Dec 82

[Text] The New York representative of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Mr Atalay, has said that a genuine rapproachment between the two peoples of Cyprus requires an immediate cessation of hostile activities and the creation of an atmosphere conducive to negotiations and, ultimately, the finding of a peaceful solution to the Cyprus problem. Mr Atalay sent a letter to the UN Secretary General, replying to allegations by the Greek Cypriot representative Mr Mousioutas, and asked for his letter to be circulated as a document of the General Assembly and of the Security Council. In the letter, Mr Atalay drew attention to the massive arms buildup in south Cyprus and stated that the Greek Cypriots could not escape responsibility for the looming threat to peace in Cyprus by alleging that they are engaged in strengthening their defenses, for it was clear that the weapons being amassed were totally of an offensive nature, and far beyond their defense requirements.

Mr Atalay pointed out that there was no relevance in the comparison between the military power of Turkey and that of the Greek Cypriot administration because the Cyprus problem was not a problem between Turkey and the Greek Cypriot administration. He stressed that Turkey's presence in Cyprus was limited to (?keeping) peace in the island, preserving the binational independence and protecting the Turkish Cypriot people against aggression in accordance with her treaty rights and obligations.

Mr Atalay said that the Greek Cypriot representative could not seriously expect the Turkish Cypriots to abandon the protection of Turkey or be so naive as to ignore the aggressive role Greece has been playing in Cyprus since 1963. He pointed out that the Greek Cypriots had recently commemorated Greece's final military defeat in 1922 following the invasion of western Turkey during the Turkish war of independence [words indistinct] Asia Minor.

After recounting examples of the inhuman Greek Cypriot economic embargo against the Turkish Cypriot community, Mr Atalay said that the allegations and attitude presented in the letter by Mr Mousioutas left the Turkish Cypriots little hope for progress in the efforts for the finding of a solution to the Cyprus problem. He expressed the hope that the Greek Cypriot side would soon come to terms with realities and change the dangerous course on which it has embarked.

KHARALAMBOPOULOS COMMENTS ON U.S. BASED TALKS

NC240844 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 23 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Yiannis Kharalambopoulos said yesterday negotiations on the future of American bases in Greece will resume in January, but declined to comment on local newspaper reports that the talks have run into difficulties. "There has been an exchange of views on the different subjects covered by the political framework of the talks, but I can't go into details since they are still developing." Mr Kharalambopoulos told Greek and foreign reporters.

He said Deputy Foreign Minister Yiannis Kapsis and Reginald Bartholomew of the U.S. State Department would start meeting again "after the holidays."

In recent weeks Greek newspapers have carried reports that Greece has asked for one billion dollars annually in military supplies as a form of rent for the four U.S. bases here, but that the United States is prepared to offer only half that amount.

Kharalambopoulos said the socialist government opposed the presence of foreign bases on Greek soil, but would not take unilateral action to remove them. "We have a responsibility to safeguard our national interests," he said. Greece gets more than 80 percent of its military hardward from the United States, and will receive 280 million dollars in U.S. military credits in 1983.

Mr Kapsis and Bartholomew opened negotiations in October on renewal of a 1953 Greek-American bases agreement. Socialist officials have said the talks are expected to last up to 9 months but cannot be allowed to drag on longer.

AVYI Urges Firmness

NC241420 Athens I AVYI in Greek 23 Dec 82 p 1

[Editorial: "The Negotiations for the Bases"]

[Text] The second phase of the Greek-U.S. talks on the bases has ended. U.S. negotiator Mr Batholomew went to the United States for consultations. The Greek people follow the events without being briefed by officials. The government does not find it expedient to explain what was discussed, at what point the negotiations are and what each side is asking and rejecting.

Do we passively await events? Rather not, because these events should move without certain well-known and well-defined limits. These are the limits which define the responsibility to which the government has publicly committed itself on this vital issue.

The first responsibility is that without fail there should be a specific timetable defining the maximum time the U.S. bases will remain on Greek territory. The second responsibility is that during the time that the U.S. bases are in Greece, they should not be able to develop actions that would be against our national interests and against friendly countries and peoples.

We should say that these two responsibilities must be firm. They allow neither misinterpretation nor reneging.

It is the least that the Greek people can accept when they have been convinced of the need for the immediate withdrawal of the U.S. bases from Greek territory. We say the least because, if we are not mistaken, there has also been and there remains the claim for the Greek administration of and control over the U.S. bases. Moreover, there is also the precedent of the U.S.-Turkish agreement on this matter. Why, therefore, should a similar Greek-U.S. agreement be lacking?

However, let us go back to the two initial responsibilities publicly undertaken by the government. No agreement should be signed with the Americans without satisfying these two terms. No hesitation whatsoever should be expressed for the immediate withdrawal of the U.S. bases despite the U.S. and NATO pressures and the tragic tone represented about their "great importance" for the Atlantic alliance.

We do not know how much of the above has been clarified to Mr Bartholomew. If, however, this has not been flatly denied, then surely the negotiations are proceeding along the wrong path. The government has the duty to make its decisions without hesitation, thus defending our supreme national interests, which disagree with the existence and the role of the U.S. bases in Greece.

RIZOSPASTIS Expresses Pessimism

[Excerpts] The first weeks of 1983 will be crucial ones for the Greek-U.S. negotiations on the bases, since these negotiations are now pending both on their content and procedure. The rigid U.S. stand toward the Greek side's proposals has led the government's negotiating tactics into a deadlock. High government officials have expressed pessimism and skepticism over the prospcets of the talks -- but not of the talks alone. Authoritative diplomatic sources stated that the Greek side will strive to make it clear to the other side that it does not wish the talks to fail and that it will endeavor to make the views come closer as so far the gap appears unbridged as far as the crucial points are concerned. However, the Greek Government is not prepared to proceed to an upgrading of the level of the negotiations (which will be continued in mid-January between Mr Kapsis and Mr Bartholomew) nor to a premature "summit" meeting in Washington -- as Mr Weinberger had proposed during the current NATO session of the Defense Planning Committee.

Nevertheless, it is evident that the recess and the threat of a deadlock in the talks is being utilized by the U.S. side as a lever to put in motion a wider circle of pressure, which amounts to openly -- from many directions -- blackmailing the PASOK government, opening up possible new threats against the country.

Well-informed sources stated that the U.S. stand in the course of the negotiations so far does not merely constitute a rejection of the Greek positions, but also a demand for a public "pro-American disgrace" by the government.

A high government official described the climate that the United States has created as "thwarting," despite the fact that the prime minister himself had recently received assurances from a U.S. official that the talks will not be suspended. Government circles express with concern how the negotiations can possibly develop if Mr Bartholomew returns from the United States with the same hard line that he used at the beginning of December when, at the first negotiations session, he cruelly and categorically rejected the entire Greek "package."

However, there are officials with government influence that advise a "reconciliatory" stand, invoking "national dangers." According to press reports a high state official is promoting similar views, even in a pressing manner.

The same reports say that serious disagreements have emerged among the negotiating group on the Greek negotiating stand.

In view of these developments, certain cadres of the governing party incline toward the assessment that the "reconciliatory" spirit in the PASOK government's foreign policy during the year and its "balancing" efforts are now being utilized as an element to trap and blackmail it.

PAPANDREOU ALLOWS POLITICAL REFUGEES TO RETURN

NC251333 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 25 Dec 82

[Text] Political refugees are free to return to Greece. Prime Minister Papandreou made this very important announcement to journalists this morning. Hellenic radio-television reporter Manolis Tsardhoulias reports:

[Begin recording] Prime Minister Papandreou described the government's decision to allow the free repatriation of political refugees as an offer for national unanimity. Mr Papandreou stated the following at noon today.

[Papandreou] I have called you on Christmas Day today to make a statement which, I believe, is connected with the great day of Christmas. The PASOK government, the government of change, honors the contract that it has signed with the Greek people. We have chosen this joyous day to announce a very important decision, the decision to allow the free repatriation of political refugees to our country, to give citizenship to all those who are of Greek origin. Thus, after so many decades, the refugees, who have toiled in many countries and who have not had the joy of being close to their relatives, can now return to their country either as visitors, if they prefer, or as permanent residents. This is yet another step in the great effort of the government of change to put an end to national division and to change and transform the civil war climate, which for many decades prevailed in our country, into a mere memory. It is an effort toward national unanimity which, in this difficult period that we are going through, is a crucial prerequisite for the country's course toward the future and, I would say, for our nation's survival itself.

No law will be needed. With a joint decision of the public order minister and the interior minister, the matter will be solved within the next week. All of us who are living in Greece will welcome the refugees, the political refugees, with warm embraces whenever they want to come to their fatherland. [end recording]

SPOKESMAN ON PRESS REPORTS ABOUT SECURITY CORPS

NC242044 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] The leadership of the Public Order Ministry and the Security Corps enjoy the absolute trust of the government, and the recent major successes in combating criminal activity and maintaining a climate of tranquillity throughout the country must truly be praised.

This statement was made by the government spokesman in reference to press reports about the security corps.

PRIME MINISTER RECEIVES CPSU PEACE APPEAL

NC241551 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1500 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou received at Kastri Soviet Ambassador Kaboshkin, who handed him a Supreme Soviet message in which an appeal is being made to the governments, parliaments and political parties of all countries to unite their forces in a joint struggle for the limitation of nuclear and conventional armaments and the consolidation of peace.

Mr Papandreou stressed to Mr Kaboshkin that the policy of the Greek Government and people is aimed at obstructing the further development of armaments, particularly nuclear weapons, promoting the gradual and balanced limitation of arsenals, and contributing toward the consolidation of peace.

TECHNOLOGY COOPERATION PROTOCOL SIGNED WITH USSR

NC241650 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 24 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] During his recent visit to the Soviet Union, Research and Technology Minister Y. Lianis signed a new protocol for cooperation in matters of research and technology. In his statement at a press conference yesterday, the minister said the new form of cooperation between Greece and the Soviet Union will be based on a 10-year program of activities instead of the 2-year one that was in force until now.

The matters discussed were about research activities being conducted in the Soviet Union in the fields of agriculture, health, seismology and energy. Our country has also proposed new sectors of cooperation such as handicraft industry, microelectronics and applied mathematics, in which we have experienced scientists.

Mr Lianis stressed that the agreement for the 10-year program will be signed in our country during the forthcoming visit to Athens by Mr Tikhonov, chairman of the USSR Council of Ministers.

TROLLEY BUS CONTRACT SIGNED WITH USSR 23 DEC

NC232034 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Excerpt] A new type of trolley bus will be put into circulation in Athens as of the new year. An agreement for the supply of 132 trolley buses was signed this afternoon by the administration of the electric-powered buses of the Athens-Piraievs area [Ilpap] and the Soviet firm Energomasheksport. The new trolley buses will cost 600,000 drachmas. Payment will be effected through the exchange of agricultural products.

KKE SENDS CONGRATULATORY CABLE TO CPSU

["Text" of the KKE Central Committee greetings cable to the CPSU on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the USSR -- no date given]

[Text] Dear comrades, the Central Committee, the KKE cadres and members and Greek workers send warm revolutionary greetings to the fraternal Soviet people on the occasion of the 60th anniversary of the USSR.

In crushing the bourgeois system of relations among nations and peoples, the Great October, with radical changes, led to the establishment of mankind's first multinational state ever. The establishment of the USSR is the second major step toward the solution of the national issue. It is a confirmation of how correct Marxist-Leninist theory is for the national issue. It is the lively expression of the principle of protelarian internationalism.

The marvelous building of the multinational state rallied together peoples to a fraternal and inseparable unity, which resisted and turned into steel every difficulty and hardship of the great patriotic war. It wiped out every inequality among them and implemented in life the new forms of socialist solidarity and cooperation, which are unknown, incompatible and unattainable in the capitalist system. The national issue constitutes aggravation and an unsolved problem in the current capitalist society. This is why the establishment of the USSR constitutes a true beacon and a strong motivating force for the people in their difficult struggle for national, political and economic independence.

The Soviet people, guided by the Communist Party, raise their country's defense power higher and higher, which constitutes a guarantee for detente and peace, particularly today when the danger of a nuclear war is greater than ever before. In trying to find a way out of its crisis, imperialism is implementing an aggressive policy and preparing for a new devastating war. The Soviet Union's peace-loving policy and power and that of the countries of the socialist community and the world peace-loving forces are an effective opposition to imperialism's policy and inhuman plans.

The world peoples turn their attention to the Soviet Union with confidence and hope. The Soviet Union is the defender of peace, the force which can overthrow imperialism's war plans.

We wish the great Soviet people new successes in their work for building communism, for their happy future, for the good of mankind, and for detente and peace in the world.

ASSEMBLY TO SET UP NEW COMMITTEES IN NEW YEAR

NC221340 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou stated in the Chamber of Deputies yesterday that a committee of inquiry will be set up in the new year to look into the Cyprus issue. He also said he is in consultation with the chamber's chairman, Alevras, to define the type of and composition of a committee which will inquire into the matter of credit policy followed by the governments during recent years.

Referring to the prime minister's proposals for setting up the two committees, Alevras said these committees will be set up after the holiday recess under the procedure provided for under the Constitution and the chamber's regulations.

PAPANDREOU CHAIRS PASOK EXECUTIVE MEETING

[Text] A joint meeting of the movement's Executive Bureau and the new Executive Secretariat was held yesterday evening with the personal participation of Prime Minister and PASOK Chairman A. Papandreou. The joint meeting was held within the framework of a new organizational attempt that aims at utilizing the movement's potential in the correct briefing of the people on the government's policy as well as at utilizing basic considerations.

At yesterday's meeting, following a brief working session of the Executive Bureau members with the participation of Mr Papandreou, the PASOK chairman gave a thorough political briefing with particular reference to the country's economic situation.

In the organizational sector, Mr Papandreou outlined the limits of responsibility of the Executive Secretariat, which -- under the Executive Bureau's supervision -- will be responsible for managing the movement's organization as well as for briefing and mobilizing the members and friends of PASOK.

Furthermore, he proceeded with the selection of cadres who will man the 3-member secretariats of important committees of the movement.

Speaking to the political editor of ELEVTHEROTIPIA on this new organizational campaign and his own participation in it, Mr Papandreou -- who will regularly participate, at least once a month, in joint meetings of the movement's two staff and guidance bodies -- said: "I really feel that I have been away for a long time from my duties as a member of the Executive Bureau and chairman of the movement. This is why I see my presence today in the joint meeting of the Executive Bureau and Executive Secretariat as the beginning of my more active participation in the movement's affairs."

Explaining the role of the new body, that is, the Executive Secretariat, Mr Papandreou stressed that it "will undertake the responsibility for the current -- ideological and organization -- matters," and added: "A lively developing movement, whose basis is represented by the people, is a prerequisite for the success of the PASOK's government task and for the success of the change."

Giving the signal for the new organizational and political campaign, which will climax at the movement's congress to be held in November 1983, Mr Papandreou stressed: "We must work hard for the movement's first congress. This work will start with the coming new year."

DEFENSE OUTLAYS INCREASE IN 1983 BUDGET

NC240849 Athens ATHENS NEWS in English 23 Dec 82 p 12

[Text] Parliament yesterday approved a record 1,159 billion drachma (16 billion dollars) budget for 1983 by 166 votes to 119 with 15 abstentions. On the defense expenditures provided for by the budget, the outcome of the vote was 273 for and 11 (the Communists) against.

The budget brings defense and social welfare spending level for the first time. Health and welfare spending has been hiked by 36.1 percent to 155.3 billion drachmas (2.15 billion dollars) while defense outlays rise by 12.7 percent to 151.8 billion drachmas (2.09 billion dollars). "Our defense expenditures are huge but indispensable since we face a threat," Socialist Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou told Parliament in a reference to Greek differences with neighboring Turkey.

The deficit budget aims for a three percent growth rate after three years of economic stagnation, but also seeks to trim inflation from 21 percent this year to 18 percent in 1983. Total budget expenditure is forecast to rise by 29.5 percent over 1982, while revenue is expected to go up by 34.3 percent to 870 billion drachmas (12.08 billion dollars).

The government hopes to increase its income through reform of the tax system, expanding economic activity, a continued crack-down on tax evasion and hikes in fuel and road taxes.

In his closing remarks before Parliament voted on the budget, Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou said that "We proceed to 1983 with optimism, and we shall continue our policy and efforts toward the socialist transformation of Greek society." The prime minster concluded by stressing "We believe in the people's participation in the government through PASOK."

11TH KKE CONGRESS ISSUES DECLARATION 24 DEC

NC261116 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 25 Dec 82 pp 1, 2

["Text" of 11th KKE Congress declaration issued in Athens on 24 December]

[Text] To the laborers, workers and all Greek people.

The delegates of the 11th KKE Congress, which convened in Athens between 14 and 19 December, discussed, with a sense of great responsibility, international and domestic developments, and reached a series of conclusions and assessments and a specific program of struggle for a true change and the opening of a path for people's democracy and socialism.

We consider it our dire duty to point out that, with their cold war policy and continuous escalation of their mad arms race, U.S. imperialism and their supporters are leading mankind to a nuclear holocaust. The danger is immediate and threatening as never before.

This is why no relaxation, indifference and lack of concern is allowed or justified. On the contrary, the most drastic contribution of all workers, of all people, for the struggle of peace detente and disarmament is imperative. Let political, ideological and any other differences be put aside, and let the primary and dire duty be the most broad rallying together to preserve life and civilization on our planet. The peace-loving movement in the world is achieving exceptional dimensions. The cause of defending and preserving peace has become the primary, the number one problem of our era. The socialist countries, headed by the Soviet Union, have done and are doing everything possible to obstruct the path of those who desire war and of the imperialist misanthropists.

War can be avoided. People, with their continuous struggle, have the power to ward it off.

In our country, the struggle for peace is staunchly connected with the struggle for the removal of the nuclear weapons stocked in our territory, for the dismantling of the U.S. bases of death and the withdrawal from the aggressive NATO alliance. Our struggle is also connected with the changing of the Balkans into a denuclearized zone and the Mediterranean into a sea of peace.

These goals of ours must find response in every patriot, both male and female, because if these goals are not achieved, then there cannot be stability and a guarantee of peace in our area. If the government truly wants to guard our country from the vortex of a nuclear war, it has the duty to proceed toward this direction and implement its declarations, which have been repeated many times.

We, the Communists, will unreservedly give whatever is in our power to foil the criminal actions of the imperialists and to defend peace. We call on all the peace-loving people to align with us.

Laborers, workers, democrats and patriots, and strugglers of national resistance: in examining carefully and in detail the country's domestic situation, our congress has reached the conclusion that since the election victory of October 1981, over a year now, the change for which the great majority of the people had given their votes has not been promoted and we have again been led into a deadlock.

None of the major issues were promoted and dealt with. The economic crisis becomes deeper and the weight is being placed on the shoulders of the working people. A striking proof is the hurried voting by the government majority of the unheard-of provision that forbids the increase of salaries of those employed in the civil and private sectors. These measures do not intend to deal with the economic crisis because they are not directed in an antimonopolistic direction. The result will be that the economic situation of the working people will deteriorate and their standard of living will decline while the monopolies, which preserve intact their privileges, will further increase their tremendous profits.

It is more and more apparent that the PASOK government has abandoned its basic preelection and postelection declarations and promises. It continuously gives in to the pressures of the imperialists and monopolies. It adapts itself to the EEC regime and demands. In general, its policy is one of modernizing its regime of state-monopolistic capitalism and improving the terms of existence.

This policy justifiably provokes the disatisfaction and militant mobilization of the broad popular masses. At the same time, it facilitates the reactionary forces to adopt a counter-attack position, to intensify their efforts, to impede democratic development, and lead us backwards.

Regarding this situation, our party, which in all its long history has stood as the most consistent and firm supporter of the popular and national interests, does not remain as an unconcerned and indifferent observer or simply a judge and critic of the government's policy.

It proposes a way out, which is the implementation of another policy -- the implementation of the goals of a true change worked out by the 11th congress.

These goals were kneaded and ripened with the people's struggles and envisage the achievement of national independence in antimonopolistic economic development and substantive democratization. They are goals that give a specific and realistic answer to the most grave problems and the crisis that plagues our country.

In order to achieve these goals, it is necessary that the people increase their struggle for a democratic government which will express all those forces which in one or another degree are in favor of a true change. The government should be based on a mass popular movement and should implement a platform which will be antimonopolist and anti-imperialist.

The KKE is willing and ready to support such a democratic government or even participate in it.

Life itself has proved and is proving daily that without the KKE, no change can be achieved. This is neither selfish nor arbitrary at all. The political developments themselves elevate our party as the main agent of true change with its main political aim the rallying together of antimonopolist, anti-imperialist democratic forces in a stable structure of popular unity. The party's strengthening of its role and its influence is a primary prerequisite in promoting a true change, for opening the path toward people's democracy and socialism.

Laborers, Workers, Democrats and Patriots.

We address to you warm militant greetings and we call on you: Unite on the basis of your joint interests and struggle in their defense and in satisfying your just rights. Repel the hypocritical and enraging demagogy of the rightwing and maintain a steady front against it.

Reject the reformist theories for class cooperation, the expectation and subjugation to monopolies. Strengthen in any way our party to fulfill its vanguard role in the interest of the working class, of the people and country.

The path toward true change is not easy. It goes through difficult struggles and clashes against reactionary forces, monoplies and imperialism. How our country will proceed depends on how much the struggle and the mass popular movement develops, on the rallying together of the popular forces, on the further raising of the role of the working class and its vanguard section.

Our party, armed with the resolutions, assessments and conclusions of the 11th KKE Congress, will do whatever it can to respond to its responsibilities and mission.

Our congress has aspired to be one of struggle for the true change. Having confidence in the power of the people, of the working class and all working peole, we are certain that this struggle will lead to victory.

Long live the 11th KKE Congress.

[Signed] December 1982, the 11th KKE Congress Presidium.

PROVINCIAL SECURITY DEPARTMENTS PUT ON ALERT

NC241700 Paris AFP in English 1609 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 24 (AFP) -- The Turkish General Staff has put the Security Departments of all 67 Turkish provinces on alert against possible "serious action" by the left-wing underground Turkish Popular Liberation Party and Front (THKP/C), informed sources reported here today.

The General Staff asked the provincial Security Departments to take necessary measures against "an assassination attempt on a statesman" or "an attempt to massacre people by attacking crowded places" on the basis of recent intelligence and plans and documents seized from militants, the sources added.

THKP/C is planning the action to "avenge friends killed by the police in armed clashes," according to one of the seized documents, the sources said. THKP/C was created in 1971 and served as the parent organization for a number of armed leftist groups, including Revolutionary Path (Dev-Yol) and Revolutionary Left (Dev-Sol).

EVREN ON FAR EAST TRIP; POLITICAL, ECONOMIC TIES

TA271818 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Text] President Kenan Evren and the delegation accompanying him returned home today after completing an official visit to four Far East countries. In a statement at Ankara's Esenboga Airport, President Evren recalled that Turkey had no political differences with the four friendly countries he visited and that agreements were signed with all four of them for the promotion of trade and economic relations.

The special plane carrying the president and the delegation landed at Esenboga Airport at 1500. Evren was received at the airport with a military ceremony by ground forces commander and National Council member Gen Nurettin Ersin. The other members of the Council, the Consultative Assembly speaker, some ministers and civil and military officials were also present at the airport ceremonies. Evren reviewed the honor guard after the national anthem was played.

Later, President Evren made a statement on his visit to the Far East. After expressing his pleasure over his return home, Evren said: As it is known the countries we visited are geographically far away, and have different economic and political systems. The fact that these countries have different economic and political models does not constitute an obstacle for us. The policies we pursue are to have a good relationship with all countries which respect Turkey's territorial integrity and independence, and which do not interfere in its internal affairs. These policies also aim at the further promotion of multilateral relations with such countries and at strengthening friendly relations with all countries of the world and particularly with those which extend a friendly hand to us within the principles I mentioned earlier.

Recalling that no visits on the presidential level were made to these countries, the president expressed his joy over being the first one to do so. He continued: During the present tense international situation, our visits have been an expression of Turkey's realistic and constructive foreign policies and of the significance we attribute to Asian issues, to relations with countries in this region, and of our desire for the establishment of international harmony.

President Evren described the tour, beginning with the PRC, the first country he official visited. He recalled that the PRC has a key position in the Asian continent and the world, adding that the PRC is one of the main factors contributing to the present world peace and international political and military balance.

Evren added that with its rich natural resources and its large population, the PRC's significance in world politics is increasing daily.

Pointing out that, in addition to historic and cultural ties between the two countries, relations of friendship and mutual respect have existed between them, the president said that his talks with the PRC leaders were based on this general background. Noting that on international issues both Turkey and the PRC shared the same views on numerous points, the president said that the promotion of bilateral relations between the two countries was to the benefit of both countries. An identity of views has been reached on this fact, Evren said.

The president said that in the PRC he had the occasion to exchange views on political topics recalling that the increase of the trade volume of $20 million between the two countries was also decided during his talks. Evren said that the PRC was importing Turkish goods through other countries since no transportation facilities existed between the two countries. He added that in order to remedy this situation PRC ships sailing for Europe would try to stop at Turkish points, while a similar effort by Turkish vessels would also be beneficial for the further development of Turkey's trade relations with the Far East countries.

The president continued: A protocol envisaging the determination of fields suitable for the development of our trade and economic ties with the PRC and for cooperation in these fields has been signed during my visit to the PRC. Talks were held within this framework in a bid to prepare for the necessary grounds for our businessmen's relations with that country. Conditions of intrabank payments were also discussed during our talks and decisions were made.

During my stay in Beijing, I had the opportunity to visit an exposition of Turkish export goods organized by our businessmen. I can tell you that this exposition has had a very beneficial effect. Though all our export goods were not to be seen there, this was a good step taken in the introduction of our goods in the PRC. I would like to express my appreciation to businessmen which have contributed to this event. The task now facing our businessmen, industrialists and our large marketing firms is to exert all kinds of efforts to reap the fruit of this initiative and to benefit from the growing PRC market. Naturally, attention should be paid to creating a balance in our trade relations with them.

President Evren recalled that Indonesia, which he officially visited after concluding his visit to the PRC, is a country of 156 million with a majority of Muslims. He added that Turkey's relations with that country, established following World War II, were not on the desired level. Noting the similarities between the two countries, Evren said that both countries shared the same approaches to foreign issues and social problems. The president recalled that Indonesia was a member country of both the Islamic Conference Organization and the Third World and added: We have agreed on cooperation closely to eliminate terrorism, which has indeed been eliminated in both countries. As you know, in 1965 Indonesia experienced unfortunate incidents of terror which were even worse than those we had in our country. That is why the Indonesians are as sensible as we are in issues connected with violence.

Pointing out that Indonesia has natural resources -- including rubber and oil -- Evren said that Turkey could contribute to the establishment of that country's infrastructure and industry. The president added that an agreement on economic and technical cooperation was signed with Indonesia to this end. Evren said that products like rubber and coffee could be bought from Indonesia to be used by Turkish manufacturers before being sold to third countries, adding: Such a possibility that would provide Turkey with great added value prospects depend, however, on Turkey's establishing free trade zones on its soil. This is an important project I have discussed in every country I visited and we are determined to carry it out. The subject of free trade zones has already been discussed in our country for years. However, no decisions have been reached on this subject.

All the countries I visited have already established such free zones and are greatly benefiting from this arrangement. I am convinced that the time has come for us too to take a step on this matter. If the relevant institutions and the Turkish Government join forces to realize this project soon, Turkey will greatly benefit from this.

On Turkey's relations with the ROK, President Evren said that this relationship was of a particular kind, as Turkey had participated with a large contingent in the UN forces that fought in Korea. Evren said that this development had caused the creation of strong ties between the two countries. Noting that Koreans lost no occasion to recall with gratitude the Turkish aid, the president said that they had great respect for the memory of our martyrs.

Pointing out that he had beneficial talks with the ROK president, Evren said that priority was given in the ROK, as was the case in Turkey, to economic measures aimed at providing the development and prosperity of the people. As you must have read in the joint Turkish-ROK statement issued at the end of my visit, we are in favor of the unification of the two Korean states through negotiations and of finding a solution that will settle the issue of UN membership of this friendly country.

Recalling that he had also served 23 years ago in the Turkish brigade in Korea, the president said that during the time that elapsed the ROK made very significant achievements. He said: The hard working and disciplined Korean people have greatly achieved industrialization and, despite its scarce natural resources, have won an important position in international trade and contract services. I want to stress the significance of disciplined work carried out in that country. In the event this factor is not provided and work is carried out in a mess, economic development is then out of the question. It is with such a work tempo that the ROK has been able to reach its present situation.

President Evren said that areas of cooperation existed between the two countries and that joint ventures were possible in the fields of electronics and chemical products. Pointing out that Korea was ready to use the free trade zone eventually to be established in Turkey, Evren said that all these topics were reviewed in the meetings of the Joint Economic Committee. He added that a joint committee was also established among the businessmen of the two countries in accordance with the protocol signed in Seoul. This was a step that would promote bilateral economic relations.

In connection with his visit to Bangladesh, the last leg of his Far East tour, the President said that this country was linked to Turkey with warm ties of friendship and brotherhood. Evren said that they were met there by people who filled the streets as if it were in our own country. He added: We were accorded the same warm ovation wherever we went.

Noting that he held a cordial exchange of views with President Chowdhury and Chief Martial Law Administrator Lt General Ershad, Evren said: They place great importance on benefiting from our experience as a state. No political problems exist between Turkey and Bangladesh. I have promised to extend technical aid as much as we can to Bangladesh -- a friendly country that has always sought to support us in international forums. I hereby would like to draw the attention of all international institutions to the necessity of providing aid to Bangladesh so that country can accomplish its economic development. Evren stressed the importance of increasing aid to that country which lacks such essential natural resources such as oil, coal and others.

Stating that areas of cooperation between the two countries existed, Evren said that possibilities for the strengthening of these ties were sought. He added that efforts would also be made in order to increase the trade volume between the two countries.

Relating the visit he paid to the Ataturk High School founded in Bangladesh in 1939, Evren said that in the same way as Ataturk is considered a great savior in Turkey, he is considered a great savior by the Bangladesh people as well and a leader and liberator of oppressed countries.

President Evren said that on his return home from his far east tour, he stopped over in Pakistan. Recalling that he did not have the opportunity to meet Pakistani President Ziaul Haq as he was unavailable during his U.S. and Canada tour, Evren said that, nevertheless, he conducted an exchange of views with other Pakistani officials.

President Evren said that although until now it was not customary to include representatives of the private sector to go along with presidents and prime ministers and delegations paying official visits to foreign countries, this time the president of the Union of the Chambers of Commerce was invited to go on the tour. He added that this had proved to be beneficial on more than one occasion. Since we have a mixed economy in our country, Evren said, it is normal for the private and public sectors to cooperate, as is the case in several other countries, where the two secotrs work in harmony and support and other. The president said that it was out of the question to bring the national economy to the desired level if such cooperation did not exist.

The president concluded his statement as follows: I can declare that with this first visit paid by a Turkish president to these four friendly countries with which we have no political differences and with which we have signed agreements aimed at promoting our trade and economic relations, we have expressed our political will for the further development of our relationship with Far East countries as we have done with the Middle East countries.

NO STATE FUNDS FOR TURKISH POLITICAL PARTIES

TA230934 Anakara ANATOLIA in English 0900 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Dec (AA) -- The Constitutional Committee Wednesday rejected a subcommittee recommendation that the Treasury provide financial aid to political parties. With two members abstaining, the vote was 6 for and 6 against, whereupon committee Chairman Aldikacti said his vote would bear the weight of two votes according to general practice, and the proposal was therefore considered rejected. Member Isa Vardal intends to ask for re-consideration of the proposal, sources said.

FINANCE MINISTER DEFENDS ECONOMIC POLICIES

TA261624 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1348 GMT 26 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 26 Dec (AA) -- "The Jan. 24 (1980) decisions were essential to bring about a release from inflation. Any fiannce minister, not only I, would have to do what we have done to maintain the stability policy which the economic situation necessitates," Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu said during an exclusive interview with "ANADOLU" agency. "The overall economic model has not been changed, there have only been gradual modifications required at intervals while progressing on the same path," he added.

Referring to the latest economic arrangements, the minister said, in brief: "Our economic policy is not a frozen structure. In case Mr Turgut Ozal had kept his post (of minister of state in charge of economic affairs), he too would have to undertake the measures we have taken. He, too, would have to lower interest rates. While the program was being elaborated, priority was given to lower the demand inflation. Now the economy has arrived at that point. The current goal is lowering the cost inflation because there is no other alternative. This is the way out of inflation.

After covering certain ground under this policy, one can make other gradual changes, like tax modifications, lowering of interest rates. This would still be in line with the idea of providing the citizen with positive interest.

We offered 50 p.c. interest at the time inflation was 100 p.c. Now we are offering 36 p.c. whereas the inflation stands at 25 p.c. That means a positive interest of 16 p.c. There is no change in the overall policy.

No new taxes are being introduced, Kafaoglu said, adding that these wrong expectations arose from his being once a director general of state revenues department. "I am in fact lowering the taxes, all of the draft laws submitted to the assembly are tax-lowering drafts," he stressed. The inequalities in income distribution would be eliminated through the new taxation arrangements which abolish the advance payment system and allow declaration of the amount of tax to be paid by the citizen himself, he added.

TURK-IS LEADER ASKS HIGHER WAGES, MORE RIGHTS

TA230938 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0830 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Dec (AA) -- Chairman of the Turkish Confederation of Labor "Turk-Is" Sevket Yilmaz said it has been officially announced that inflation due to demand has been overcome and it was time to cope with inflation due to costs, it was now imperative to give higher wages to labor.

Addressing a meeting Wednesday of officers of the union of textile, knitwear and headwear workers "Tek-Sif", Yilmaz declared it was not workers who raised costs and prices to astronomical figures, but that workers were the victims.

Yilmaz said it was time to return to collective bargaining, suspended temporarily following September 1980. Labor has suffered most from past divisions, the Turk-Is chairman added, and it was time to unite workers.

Higher Wages Rejected

TA231803 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1605 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 23 (AA) -- Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu rejected a (?proposal) made Wednesday by Turk-Is leader Sevket Yilmaz for higher wages now that inflation due to an excess of demand has stopped. In an interview with AA Kafaoglu said raising wages now would give rise to inflation due to excessive demand once again. Instead, he said, his government aimed at reducing the other factors that raised costs, such as reducing interest rates on loans, duties on imported raw material, and reducing the fall in the exchange rate of the Turkish lira.

The recent decision on OECD countries to give export credit for goods destined for Turkey showed that confidence in Turkey has been restored, the minister said. The government planned to generalize export credits in Turkey as well, he said. At the moment, loans were sometimes provided to contractors who had won low-term bids for construction projects abroad.

Kafaoglu urged citizens to open checking deposit accounts at the new interest rate of 20 percent starting new year's, and to use checks instead of carrying cash. He warned, however, that if check is dishonored, the owner will face imprisonment.

ENERGY MINISTER: NO OIL PRICE READJUSTMENTS

TA231145 Anakara ANATOLIA in Turkish 0915 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Tunceli, 23 Dec (AA) -- Commenting on the OPEC resolucion to maintain oil prices at $34 a barrel, Turkish Energy and Natural Resources Minister Fahir Ilkel said this did not necessarily mean oil prices would go up in Turkey.

Answering a question by a Turkish radio and television correspondent, the minister said that there were no plans currently for readjusting the oil prices in Turkey.

The minister added that in 1983, Turkey's crude oil imports were expected to reach $3.6 billion.

Oil Exploration

[Text] Ankara, 23 Dec (AA) -- The Turkish Petroleum Corporation "TPAO" has been issued licences to prospect for oil in the Mediterranean continental shelf of Turkey beyond her territorial waters. The licences issued by the petroleum department are valid for 3 years in 10 zones.

IRANIAN BORDER CROSSING TO BE OPEN LONGER HOURS

TA241649 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] The entry and exit hours of vehicles driving through the Gurbulak border crossing between Turkey and Iran have been changed. According to information received from Agri Governor Kutlu Aktas, vehicles which could drive through the border crossing between 0930 and 1900 until now will now be able to cross between 0730 and 2200. Aktas said that with the new arrangement, the number of vehicles crossing the border will increase by 50 percent.

NAVAL FORCE COMMANDER RETURNS FROM JAPAN

TA231000 Ankara Doemstic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] National Security Council member and Naval Forces Commander Adm Nejat Tumer, who concluded his official visit to Japan as the guest of the Japanese naval forces commander, has returned to Turkey.

In a statement at Yesilkoy Airport, Admiral Tumer said that he held beneficial talks during his visit aimed at further developing the relations between the naval forces of the two countries. Noting that Japan has achieved significant developments in the maritme field and especially in the field of electronics, Admiral Tumer said: I believe that so long as we increase our relations with countries that develop greatly in every field, such as Japan, we can also achieve progress within our industrial establishments. Admiral Tumer added that the Japanese administrators were well acquainted with Turkey's problems and that he was greatly pleased with the talks.

Tumer said that he had visited the monument built on the island of Shima in memory of the 529 sailors who were martyred when the Turkish vessel Ertugrul sunk. At Yesilkoy Airport, Admiral Tumer was received by Istanbul Governor Nevzat Ayaz, First Army Commander Gen Haydar Saltik, Fleet Commander Adm Sahip Atakan, northern sea and headquarter commanders and other officials. Tumer later left Istanbul for Ankara.

VOTCP REVIEWS TURKISH-SOVIET RELATIONS

TA251039 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 25 Dec 82

[Unattributed commentary: "The USSR's 60th Anniversary of Turkish-Soviet Relations"]

[Text] The Soviet people, the progressive mankind of the world and the patriots and peace lovers of Turkey are celebrating the 60th anniversary of the USSR these days. For that reason, a news conference was held at the Soviet Embassy in Ankara. Embassy Under Secretary (Kinayev) discussed the USSR's achievements over the past 60 years. He talked about the determined Leninist policy being pursued by the Soviet Union for peace and security in the world. Stressing that the Soviet state achieved great success in the economic, political, social and cultural fields in a short time, (Kiyanev) pointed out that the CPSU's Leninist national policy, its correct, principled and determined implementation played a great role in these achievements.

Turkish-Soviet relations were also discussed at the news conference in Ankara. It was stressed that these relations, which were founded by Lenin and Ataturk and which passed the test of time, maintain their stability today.

The Soviet Union wants to develop its friendly relations with its neighbors. It attaches special importance to the development of the relations -- which are based on mutual interest -- especially with our country. During Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen's visit to Moscow, the Soviet Union made it known once again that it is ready to spread the existing good neighborly and friendly relations to all areas of life and to further develop the commercial and economic cooperation on the basis of the principle of mutual interest.

History has proven several times that the Turkish-Soviet relations benefit our people's interests and the national interest.

Turkey won its national liberation war against imperialist aggressors at the end of World War I only because of the Soviet Union's material and moral support. After this achievement, our country received the necessary aid from Lenin's country in the establishment of its industry and was able to protect its national independence in the world only due to the Soviet Union's policy of peaceful coexistence. Today, our friend in need is trying to develop Turkish-Soviet relations on foundations that will serve the peoples of the two countries and world peace.

The Soviet Union will give 700 million kilowatt hours of electrical energy to Turkey in 1983. From the Soviet city of [name indistinct] a electricity line will be run to Kars [in eastern Turkey]. Furthermore, the Soviet Union will participate in oil exploration and oil drilling activities in Turkey and will extend the necessary financial and technical aid.

The most basic and potential opportunities exist to raise this cooperation and joint ventures -- which are to the interest of the peoples of both countries -- to a higher level. However, the U.S. imperialist and NATO bosses as well as their collaborators in Turkey, which have turned our lands into a springboard, are resorting to all sorts of ways to prevent the development of our relations with our friend in need. These circles have started a completely unfounded and disgusting antisocialist slander campaign in order to blame the Soviet Union for the assassination attempt on the pope. These circles are trying to place new difficulties before Turkish-Soviet relations and to damage these relations in a way that cannot be easily repaired. These ugly slanders by the reactionary press are utterly unfounded.

As the Soviet Embassy under secretary stressed in his news conference in Ankara, the Soviet Union is categorically opposed to terrorism, which claims lives meaninglessly throughout the world. However, the antisocialist slander campaign being conducted by Western propaganda and by the reactionary press in Turkey has started to lose air like a balloon in the face of the truth. The world has witnessed once again that the most important and sole duty of the Soviet Union and of the socialist countries today is to strengthen peace and detente in the world, and not to create conflicts among peoples or international tension. The new proposals posited by CPSU Central Committee General Secretary Andropov are the clearest proof of that. The Soviet Union wants an end to all kinds of activities that might lead to a world war. It announces that it is ready to reach an agreement to refrain from resorting not only to nuclear, but to conventional weapons as well. It is calling on all the world states, parliaments and peoples to joint action to protect peace. That is the kind of responsibility with which the Soviet Union acts before entire humankind. What sort of an attitude will Turkey, which is a NATO member, adopt on such vital issues before the new peace proposals? The junta government is silent. It did not express its views on these issues. Whenever it suits them, the junta members start talking about "the great Turkish state"... but when it comes to really important and vital issues such as world peace, disarmament, the prevention of a nuclear war, the establishment of nuclear-free zones, they say: We are a small state, such problems are resolved outside us. In this way, they try to shun responsibility. However, our people want peace and friendship with their neighbors. They greet and support the Soviet Union's new peace proposals.

MARTIAL LAW OFFICE RELEASES 1982 FIGURES

TA221651 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1517 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 22 (A.A.) — Currently there are 744 persons under detention, 15,902 under arrest, and 7,332 serving prison terms in connection with violations of martial law, according to a statement from the General Staff Martial Law Coordination Office.

Up to October 25, 1982 a total of 27,999 persons have been given various sentences by martial law courts, who have handled 23,150 cases. An additional 6,225 cases are still before the martial law court.

MILITARY OFFICERS FACING CHARGES OF BRIBERY

TA230751 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Unattributed report: "Bribe Incidents Increasing Among the Ranks of the Armed Forces"]

[Text] The Fourth Military Court established by the Ankara Martial Law Command for dealing with smuggling incidents will try 10 officers -- 2 of them colonels — and 11 noncommissioned officers on charges of being involved in smuggling, receiving bribes, misusing authoritiy and assisting smugglers. Among those facing charges are Colonel Sabri Celil Gultekin, commander of the Mersin Gendarme Regiment, and Lt Commander Mehmet 'Usta), captain of Ertugrul, a landing craft belonging to the Mersin landing fleet.

This last incident is another sign of the proportions bribery cases have reached among the ranks of the armed forces since the junta generals came to power under the excuse of eliminating (?violence). It will be recalled that legal action was also taken against two military judges serving in the Golcuk Military Court on charges of receiving bribes.

ANATOLIA REPORTS MASS SMUGGLING TRIAL IN ADANA

TA231144 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0940 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, 23 Dec (AA) -- A trial on smuggling en masse will start at an Adana martial law court on 19 January 1983. Facing trial at the military court will be Mehmet Ali Apaydin and accomplices, plus several gendarmerie officers and NCO's, who will face charges of bribery and abuse of functions. The officers include a gendarmerie colonel, a navy captain, four gendarmerie captains, and 4 NCO's.

COLUMNIST, EDITOR OF TERCUMAN ON TRIAL

TA240613 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1555 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Istanbul, Dec 23 (AA) -- The trial of columnist Ahmet Kabakli of the Istanbul daily "TERCUMAN" and Managing Editor Aydogdu Ilter started at a martial law court Wednesday. The military prosecutor charged the two journalists with violating edicts 70 and 71 of the National Security Council and the martial law code, and called for prison terms of 3 months to one year.

Editor Ilter told the court Kabakli's article for his column on the paper's 21 October issue had come to him before council edict No. 71 was issued much later the same day.

The hearing will be resumed in January 1983.

COURT SENTENCES JOURNALIST, LEFTIST TO PRISON

TA212032 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 21 Dec 82

[Text] The First Military Court in Izmir has sentenced Candemir Czder, the editor of the newspaper SAVAS YOLU [STRUGGLE PATH], to 14 years and 9 months in prison. Ozder was found guilty of conducting communist and divisive propaganda in his newspaper and of insulting the state security forces.

In another case, the same military court sentenced Vezir Aksan to 6 years 8 months and 26 days in prison for belonging to the illegal organization Iscinin Sesi [The Voice of the Worker] and for participating in a raid on a publishing house.

EDITORS SENTENCED FOR COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA

TA221632 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Excerpt] Istanbul, Dec 22 (A.A.) -- Two editors of a journal entitled "HALKIN KURTULUSU" (PEOPLE'S LIBERATION) were sentenced to 15 years in prison each for conducting communist propaganda in several issues of the paper in 1977. The military court overruled the plea of defendant Mustafa Yildirimturk for transfer of the case to the trial of members of the Revolutionary Liberation Party 'TDKP' in which he is also a defendant. Yildirimturk will also be on probation in Kirsehir for 4 years, while the co-defendent Mahmut Galip Demircan will reside in probation at Yozgat.

UNIONIST SENTENCED TO 6 MONTHS FOR ARTICLE

TA241654 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1553 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Istanbul, 24 Dec (AA) -- Secretary General Fehmi Isiklar of the Confederation of Revolutionary Labor Unions "DISK" was sentenced to a 6-month prison term by an Istanbul martial law court for an article he wrote to a weekly journal called "HALKIN SESI" (PEOPLE'S VOICE) several years ago. The court found Isiklar guilty of praising an act which was an offence. Isiklar still faces trial with other "DISK" officers.

LACINA'S WASHINGTON TALKS SEEN SUCCESSFUL

AU271307 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 24 Dec 82 p 9

[Unattributed report: "No Illegal Technology Transfer; State Secretary Lacina Was Able To Clear Up All United States-Austria Misunderstandings"]

[Text] "Misunderstandings which obviously existed between the United States and Austria regarding the transfer of certain U.S. technologies to the East have been cleared up in Washington by Ferdinand Lacina, state secretary for the chancellery, and his American interlocutors." This was stated in a press release issued by the state secretary's office in Vienna yesterday. Lacina was given to understand that the U.S. Administration regards it as important that no transfer of "certain U.S. technology" is carried out via Austria. The AUSTRIAN PRESS AGENCY [APA] was also assured by a U.S. source in Washington that "all misunderstandings have been cleared up."

This position, the release said, met with understanding by the Austrian side. At the same time, Lacina made it clear in Washington on Wednesday that Austrian technology cannot be affected." This has also been recognized by the American side, the release continued.

The misunderstandings between the United States and Austria were obviously caused by utterances of individual persons of the Reagan administration, utterances which, however, were not in compliance with the official government line. These persons had charged Austria with the illegal transfer to East bloc countries of "sophisticated technology for military purposes."

In Washington, Lacina had talks with Richard Burt, designated assistant secretary of state for European affairs; Richard Perle, assistant secretary of defense; and Bo Denysyk, deputy assistant secretary of commerce, who a few weeks ago in Vienna had discussed questions of a potential transfer of U.S. technologies to East bloc countries.

On Thursday, diplomatic observers assessed as "positive" the Austrian-American talks which State Secretary Lacina was able to hold at the highest level. The American side unequivocally assured APA in Washington that "all misunderstandings have been cleared up." As was declared by the State Department, they were "good and friendly talks," which were also held with, among others, Under Secretary Lawrence Eagleburger at the U.S. State Department.

U.S. Government circles furthermore stated that Austria was not in the least reproached in connection with the charges that Vienna constituted a "turntable for illegal technology exports to the East bloc." Washington government circles regretted the charges made against Austria in U.S. media -- charges which were by no means justified, it was stated.

PAHR COMMENTS ON ANDROPOV DISARMAMENT PROPOSALS

AU271352 Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German 24 Dec 82 p 3

[Text] In reply to a question by the NOVOSTI NEWS AGENCY, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr yesterday commented on the latest proposals by CPSU General Secretary Yuriy Andropov. "General Secretary Andropov's proposals are currently being studied by Austria. In principle, it is very difficult for a small country like Austria to adopt a specific stance on such military questions because very often the necessary information is lacking.

"Hence Austria has advocated, within the framework of the United Nations, the establishment of mechanisms that would permit an objective assessment of the state of armaments in the world. Austria hopes that this proposal will be supported by all states, especially by those with the highest armament levels.

"Austria advocates a comprehensive balance of armaments at the lowest possible level, which would have to take all regions and branches of armed forces into consideration. Any proposal that provides for a reduction of weapons systems and can bring about a balance at the lowest possible level is welcomed by Austria as a matter of principle," Pahr declared.

KREISKY MEETS PLO'S 'ARAFAT IN MAJORCA

AU271736 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1700 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Chancellor Kreisky met PLO chief 'Arafat at his vacation place on the island of Majorca today. No official report on the topics of the discussion has been released, but it is most likely that the problem of the Palestinians and the most recent Middle East peace proposals were discussed.

POW Exchange Discussed

[Kurt Seinitz report: "Kreisky-'Arafat: Israeli-PLO Prisoners' Exchange via Austria?"]

[Excerpts] Palma de Majorca/Vienna/Tel Aviv -- A lot of excitement over Kreisky's meeting with PLO chief 'Arafat in Palma de Majorca: Israeli newspapers and the U.S. NEWSWEEK magazine yesterday reported very prominently on endeavors to initiate first direct negotiations between Israel and the PLO in Austria under Kreisky's patronage, negotiations which are to deal first of all with an exchange of prisoners of war.

The negotiations are to take place with the blessing of Israeli Prime Minister Begin. As KRONEN-ZEITUNG learned yesterday from Israeli Government circles, the question of POW's needs to be resolved quickly, because without the release of the Israeli prisoners -- according to Israeli Defense Minister Sharon -- an Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon is out of the question. Negotiations between Israel and the Lebanese Government on this withdrawal are scheduled to begin this week. The Begin government still rejects official negotiations with the PLO. Yesterday, however, a Begin spokesman declared: "As far as the latest press speculations about negotiations in Austria are concerned, this can certainly not be an official matter, but this government will leave no stone unturned to achieve the release of the Isreali soldiers. Thus, should any contacts materialize, they will only be at the humanitarian level. Israel does not maintain any direct contacts with the PLO, nor will it ever have such contacts."

Meanwhile, however, Uri Avneri -- former Israeli leftiest deputy -- declared last night that contacts in Vienna had already been opened, that on the PLO side 'Arafat's confidant Isam Sartawy was participating in the talks, and that the talks were promising.

At the Vienna Chancellery, a potential mediator's role of Kreisky was not directly confirmed, but it was said that some weeks ago Kreisky had been "privately" approached by an Israeli personage, and that the chancellor then provided for the contact. A Kreisky confidant said in this context: "The Begin government has never allowed any contacts with the chancellor that it deemed potentially useful to be completely severed, despite its sharp public criticism of Kreisky."

From circles very close to Kreisky it was learned yesterday in Vienna that the chancellor is constantly visited by prominent Jews from all over the world as well as by Israeli public figures, and that high-ranking PLO people are also among Kreisky's frequent visitors. Kreisky has always -- also in the past -- been ready to make endeavors in behalf of humanitarian affairs of Israelis and Jews when asked to do so, as seen by the emigration of Soviet Jews via Austria.

Kreisky on Talks

AU281123 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1101 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Excerpt from telephone interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Palma de Majorca, recorded "a few minutes ago"]

[Text] The top news item in this program is the report on initial contacts between Israel and the PLO, even though they were or are reportedly "merely" -- in quotation marks -- humanitarian contacts. The issue is the release of prisoners of war on both sides. Mediator of these talks was Chancellor Kreisky; the venue of the talks is Vienna. Shortly before the beginning of this program, we succeeded in contacting the chancellor at his vacation site, Palma de Majorca, and here is what he told us on this subject.

[Begin recording] Well, first of all let me tell you that this is a story which is a few weeks old, and so delicate that I do not want to say any more about it. It is a question of prisoners of war on both sides, and I was asked to make endeavors regarding this humanitarian matter, and naturally I complied with this request. But I do not want to say any more about it. [end recording]

WEST DERIDED FOR INDECISION ON AFGHANISTAN

DW281009 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Heinz Metlitzki commentary from the Afghan-Pakistani border]

[Text] The occupation of Afghanistan does not do the free world any credit. The refugees in Pakistan are under veritably excellent care by their standards. However, in the mountains of Afghanistan, people will freeze and starve to death in this winter.

The Western states were unable to make up their minds about supplying the Mujahidin, the liberation fighters, with the weapons they need. They do not have any missiles nor any other antiaircraft weapons for eliminating the armored Soviet helicopter gunships, which hunt the Afghans like rabbits in the plains and time and again interrupt their supply lines.

It is only in the rugged mountains where the Soviets fail to make any headway. Under these circumstances, nobody can win a victory, yet time is working for the Russians because as a great power, they can easily tolerate their relatively slight losses. In this way, the Afghans will run out of wind sometime; they are just too proud to say so.

Besides, it also depends on Pakistan how long the Afghans can keep going; Pakistan being their rear echelon. Pakistan adapts its policy to the West. In the West, however, nobody has come up with an answer to the question of how the Soviets can be driven out of Afghanistan accept by the effective, armed resistance of the Afghans.

The Russians, meanwhile, have long digested the loss of face they have suffered in the Third World over Afghanistan.

U.S. CRITICIZED ON WARTIME HOST NATION SUPPORT

DW281029 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 28 Dec 82 p 3

[Commentary signed "Ter": "No Money"]

[Text] Bonn -- The action of the U.S. Congress, namely, not approving money for "wartime host nation support," the American-German agreement on support for U.S. troops by the host country in a war, permits three conclusions: 1. it is an intentional affront; 2. nobody was interested in the issue; 3. there was total chaos. Perhaps all three were involved.

On this side of the Atlantic, however, things are being taken more seriously. Security is at stake. The agreement was solemnly signed this spring by mutually quoting the spirit of German-American friendship, an agreement which, last but not least, American politicians tried to achieve for a long time. The necessary means are already envisaged in our budget.

It is unlikely that the U.S. Government backed the maneuver. It will certainly do everything to correct the congressional lapse. It wouldn't be the first time that the government had to act as a fire brigade in the own legislative house. Problems of the Atlantic alliance are hardly of interest to the average Washington public representative. Additonal expenditures are particularly frightening.

Additional expenditures aren't liked today by anybody in the German Bundestag either. If the United States were not to participate, the "wartime host nation support" project would disappear.

USSR TOLD MISSILE PROPOSAL 'TOTALLY UNACCEPTABLE'

NC271937 Paris AFP in English 1928 GMT 27 Dec 82

[By Pierre Grandjean]

[Text] Moscow, Dec 27 (AFP) -- French sources here today called "totally unacceptable" the Soviet proposal to reduce the number of Soviet medium-range nuclear missiles in Europe to match the number of French and British missiles. The comments followed the meeting here today of French Ambassador to the Soviet Union Claude Arnaud with Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko.

Mr. Arnaud explained the French position on the Euromissiles to Mr. Gromyko, in light of the reduction proposed by Soviet Communist Party Secretary General Yuriy Andropov on December 21, the 60th anniversary of the creation of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Arnaud said that the French missiles the Kremlin wants to include in a definitive equilibrium of nuclear forces in Europe were, in fact, exclusively French and not in any way dependent on North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) strategy, French sources said.

French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson last week rejected the Andropov proposal. France, not a member of the NATO's military command, has always been opposed to including its nuclear forces in any overall European count.

The French sources said that if France renounced its "Euromissiles" it would have no more missiles while the Soviet Union would still have strategic weapons capable of reaching French territory.

The sources said the Russians were setting up an "unfair relationship" by acting as if the arsenal behind its SS-20 missile force did not count in any eventual equilibrium.

But the sources said the Franco-Soviet difference over Euromissiles should not block the relationship between the two countries. France still hopes Euromissile talks in Geneva between the United States and the Soviet Union will end in a "balanced result," with the deployment of as few weapons as possible.

Mr. Cheysson will discuss this issue during his upcoming visit to Moscow. A date has not yet been set for Mr. Cheysson's trip and the possibility remains of a Franco-Soviet summit being held.

Soviet sources meanwhile said they were convinced France "has not said its final word" on the Euromissile affair and that it was significant that the French Government has not mentioned the third anniversary of the Soviet military intervention in Afghanistan, as have West Germany, Italy, the United States and China.

NUCLEAR COOPERATION AGREEMENT CONFIRMED WITH PRC

NC271226 Paris AFP in English 1218 GMT 27 Dec 28

[Text] Paris, Dec 27 (AFP) -- The French Foreign Ministry today confirmed that France and China recently concluded a cooperation agreement in the nuclear power sector. The atomic energy commissions of the two countries concluded the agreement in November, a ministry spokesman said. The French Commissariat a l'Energie Atomique (CEA) said the deal was signed in Paris.

Earlier reports from Beijing said this first agreement of its kind between the two countries covered research and development on pressurized water reactors (PWR's) ranging in size from 300 to 900 megawatts. It provides for cooperation in the fields of reactor safety, sodium cooling technology, the geology and processing of uranium ore, and radioisotopes.

The two countries are to run a joint cooperation programme in 1983-84, renewable by tacit agreement. Personnel training and exchange will be part of the programme.

GOVERNMENT ISSUES STATEMENT ON AFGHANISTAN

NC271846 Paris AFP in English 1833 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 27 (AFP) -- France marked the third anniversary of the entry of Soviet troops into Afghanistan today with a renewed condemnation of "foreign intervention" there. In a statement stressing that France had denounced foreign intervention in Afghanistan "time and time again," the spokesman for the Foreign Ministry urged for "a political settlement based on the withdrawal of foreign troops, self determination, and a return to independence, non-alignment and good neighbourhood policies" for the country.

Observers pointed out, however, that the government had failed to denounce the Soviet Union openly and had referred only to "foreign intervention" in its statement.

Both Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson, who will visit Moscow early next year, and President Francois Mitterrand, have recently said that the Soviet Union may be ready to modify its Afghan policies following the death of former President Leonid Brezhnev and his replacement as Soviet Communist Party chief by Yuriy Andropov.

TERRORIST GROUP ISSUES WARNING TO GOVERNMENT

NC271724 Paris AFP in English 1654 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Paris, Dec 27 (AFP) -- A letter signed by a clandestine extreme-left group has claimed responsibility for yeasterday's bomb attack on a small Paris-based firm owned by Belgian industrialist Baron Edouard Empain, victim of a sensational kidnapping four years ago, and has warned the French Government against a nuclear deal with South Africa.

The letter received by a newspaper, was signed "The Internationalist Hooligans" BGPGSG--Bakunin-Gdansk-Paris-Galvador [as received] group) and headed "Communique Number Seven." It said:

"Baron Empain has had everybody crying their eyes out. Poor victim. For two months' sequestration: twenty years' imprisonment. And Empain has reconverted: his company, Air Materiel, Rue de Lourmel, sells weapons to slaughter Third World peasants.

"Victim or murderer? The 'Socialists,' themselves also good arms salesmen, would to better not to sell a nuclear plant to South Africa.

"We know how to combat that squalid plan."

Baron Empain is on holiday in southern France after giving evidence at the trial of six men and two women accused of holding him captive for 63 days in 1978. One kidnapper cut off the top joint of one of the baron's little fingers. The kidnapping episode, for which the court handed down 20-year sentences, revealed the baron's lavish lifestyle and resulted in his replacement in 1980 as managing director of the Empain-Schneider firm, the third largest industrial group in France with 135,000 employees. Air Materiel, which employs 12, sells equipment for military aricraft.

BGPGSG has claimed 14 bomb attacks in Paris in the past two years. Previous targets included a branch of the Rothschild Bank and firms trading with the Eastern bloc. The attacks have caused no casualties.

NOVEMBER ECONOMIC PERFORMANCE REVIEWED

PM230805 Paris LE MONDE in French 19-20 Dec 82 p 16

[Unattributed report: "Resumption of Exports and Maintenance of a Large Deficit in November"]

[Text] [Economy Minister] Jacques Delors, who is due to visit Saudi Arabia from Monday through Wednesday, 20-22 December, said in Brussels on Friday evening 17 December, that "the franc's parity is good, it is ensuring our economy's competitiveness, and in addition, we have the means of countering any speculation against our currency." Mr Delors added that the reports of his forthcoming resignation "are also part of the political attacks on the French Government... which are particularly strong since our policy is going in the right direction." "I think," Mr Delors concluded, "that some people abroad and in France would be very satisfied if they could stop this policy before it fully produced its results.... The Socialists are reasonable and they are making the adjustment which the Barre government did not have the political and social courage to make."

France's foreign trade results for November seem to confirm a stabilization of the trade deficit at around Fr7 billion per month. This figure is lower than the disastrous results recorded in April, June, July, August and September, which on average showed a monthly deficit of more than Fr10 billion.

Nonetheless, the current imbalance is big since it corresponds to an annual deficit of more than Fr80 billion concentrated on our most direct partners (especially the FRG). It is significant that within intracommunity trade, France is the country whose foreign trade is more imbalanced. In addition, although exports seem to be increasing again thanks to the high rate of the dollar, imports are continuing to increase despite the recession which France entered in the second 6 months of the year, and this reflects our economy's dependence on foreign countries.

France's foreign trade deficit was still large in November: Fr8.7 billion in gross figures, Fr6.9 billion in figures adjusted for seasonal variations. Thus, for the first 11 months of the year the accrued deficit is Fr86.3 billion (Fr86.7 billion after adjustment for seasonal variations).

In November imports rose to Fr66.1 billion (an increase of 4.9 percent over October and an increase of 15.9 percent in 1 year) and exports to Fr57.4 billion (an increase of 3.9 percent in 1 month and 11.7 percent in 1 year). Some 86.7 percent of purchases were covered by sales.

After adjustment for seasonal variations,the import figure rises to Fr64.5 billion (an increase of 3 percent in 1 month and 14.4 percent in 1 year) and the export figure to Fr57.6 billion (an increase of 2.3 percent in 1 month and 13.2 percent in 1 year). The rate at which purchases are covered by sales is higher than in gross figures since it reaches 89.3 percent.

At the same time as the November results were published, Mr Jobert's office issued a communique stressing the "very good results in the agricultural products sphere, which has a record surplus of Fr2 billion, and the aeronautics sphere, in which our aircraft sales amount to Fr1.7 billion." "It can also be seen," the communique continues, "that the usual surplus has been maintained in capital goods (Fr1 billion) -- excluding military equipment -- and in the automobile sector (Fr1.8 billion). The recovery in chemical products and various semi-finished products has been confirmed and a slight surplus recorded.

"The overall November results have been obtained despite an increase in the energy bill, which can be attributed to the strong increase in the dollar and despite the maintenance of the deficit in the consumer goods sector (Fr 1.2 billion)."

From a geographical viewpoint the November results are still bad as regards [trade with] the Netherlands, the FRG and the United States, whereas they are improving with the Eastern bloc countries.

LE MONDE ON REORGANIZING FRENCH FORCES

PM231153 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MONDE in French on 16 December 1982 carries on page 14 a 2,500-word Jacques Isnard article entitled "From the Hades Nuclear Missile to the Antitank Helicopters" in which he examines the thinking behind the French Government's plans to reorganize the armed forces, the aim of which is "essentially to reconcile protection of the national sanctuary and participation in Western defense." Isnard says that the introduction of the Hades nuclear missile after 1991 and the formation of antitank helicopter squadrons "require a complete organization of the French Army's heirarchical and operational structures." He points out that the fact that the Hades missile can "pass over allied territory and hit the possible adversary" when fired from French territory "favors increased political control," which removes the "conflict between the national sanctuary defense strategy and participation in the Atlantic alliance." Similarly, the proposed antitank helicopter forces "can also symbolize France's commitment to its allies in the initial stages of the crisis or conflict." These helicopter forces are also intended for use in "supplying military aid to a country with which France has signed defense agreements." Isnard goes on to discuss the importance of "helicopter formations in conflicts in which tanks are present in large numbers," and concludes by saying that the French decision to adopt the strategy of being able to send its forces "to the vanguard of the allied military defense network in central Europe," should the need arise, does not amount to "participating in any 'forward battle.'"

COSSUTTA DENIES PCI GOING SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC

PM220809 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 18 Dec 82 p 6

[PCI Directorate member Armando Cossutta article: "But the PCI Is Different"]

[Text] A few days ago during a debate at Milan's Press Club, Giampaolo Pansa voiced with clear conviction the hope that the PCI will succeed in continuing along the path that it has allegedly already successfully adopted and that should rapidly cause it to become, in our country's interests, a major social democratic party, with a characteristic desire for clarity. Eugenio Scalfari also made an analysis of the PCI's role in the Italian situation in an interesting article recently. He examined the PCI's chances of "becoming the lynchpin of the liberal-progressive alignment and competing with the opposing liberal-moderate alignment for the country's political and cultural leadership," if the PCI, "having tactically advocated for some time the hypothesis of the 'third way,' at last reached the more solid ground of the alternative to the management of the system -- this system." Other authoritative commentators of unquestioned democratic motivation broach this subject in various ways too.

May I be permitted by say, though it could seem obvious coming from me, that I really do not believe that the communists are inclined to take up these counsels, and that above all -- and this is what counts most -- I do not believe that it would be in our country's interests to follow these counsels.

I believe that this is demonstrated first by the actual extent of the democratic consensus that the Communist Party, as such, has gathered in our society, within which the voters certainly do not lack alternative choices in favor of both social democratic and liberal democratic forces.

Nevertheless, I do not want to deny that the creation of the consensus around the PCI has been and is assisted partly by forces that aim basically at objectives such as, for instance, fiscal justice, which in other countries have found an adequate solution "within the system." This only goes to show that while in some cases it is useful to think about "systems" and some of their basic shared characteristics, it is usally misleading to disregard, in analyzing individual countries, the specifics of their history, their historical accumulation of wealth (sometimes connected, as in the case of "super-democratic" Britain, to centuries of colonial exploitation), their present production capacities and potentials and so forth. And Italy has been and remains a country whose contradictions and malfunctionings are so widespread and deep-rooted as to make many people aware of the impossibility of achieving the same results as have been achieved elsewhere within the framework of liberal democratic or social democratic policies, without changes affecting the actual structure of the "system."

This is why, within the Italian political framework, the PCI is what it is and the social democratic and liberal democratic areas are what they are, and the DC is what it is. And there is still -- let us not forget it, though it seems to have been in hibernation for a few years -- a not insubstantial fascist rightwing party (which should make everyone more aware of the need not to fool around with certain plans for institutional and electoral reforms). And we have been and still are grappling with a phenomenon of "armed revolutionism," of a nature and extent unparalleled in Europe, that has involved in its aberrant rationale a not insignificant section of our young people, including workers and intellectuals.

Now, however, even setting aside Italy's special traits, we are quite clearly faced with a universal crisis of the "system." The final outcomes of this reckoning will of course not be the same for every country. It is equally certain, however, that nobody can now say what they will be for any country. Should the Italian Communists convert to the "system" right now? I believe, on the contrary, that our country is very fortunate to have a major workers and people's force such as ours, which believes in democracy as an inalienable right but does not believe in capitalism or its rules. At the very time, in fact, when a crisis has come about everywhere in the conditions and formulas whereby democracy and capitalism have in practice nurtured each other for some decades. Now that the contradictions that still underlie that balance have exploded, it is the very need to defend democracy that makes the issue of transcending capitalism more topical then ever. Of course a force such as ours, which pursues the emergence from capitalism within democracy, cannot have a passive role with respect to the need to reveal the contradictions of this system; therefore including with respect to the need for elements, including subjective ones, for an outright break with existing unjust social balances. However at the same time it cannot fail to realize that a majority rallying of consensus with the prospect of transcending capitalism depends on the practical demonstration of the need for such a step, to avert decline and barbarism.

Therefore, it also depends on our critical examination, prompt but rigorous, of remaining reformist formulas. This debate is also needed to impart greater strength and rigorousness to a plan for real and thorough change, in formulating which we communists have been involved for some time, but whose definition we believe is not our responsibility alone. It also depends on our commitment to prevent the crisis from being resolved in a reactionary way and a collapse in the direction of a total disruption of social and democratic life, preceding and precluding the building of a positive alternative -- indeed a commitment to ensure immediate steps to begin both the maximum possible regeneration and the building of a new social and political bloc.

In this same connection I must frankly also stress that the answers hitherto given to Scalfari by other representatives of my party, while always seeming to me persuasive in their rejection of the liberal democratic appeal, have not seemed to me equally convincing with regard to a specific concern -- namely, are the future plans designed to ensure that the PCI can put itself forward as a government force truly "alternative" to the DC, rather than in some way a "substitute" for it, really clear? It is the rationale of "abstract development" that has hitherto guided the ruling forces within capitalist societies, irrespective of differences regarding means. It is the communists' task to overthrow this rationale -- that is, if they are communists and not social democrats, as we are not and do not want to become.

SIX RED BRIGADES' MEMBERS ARRESTED IN MILAN

NC272000 Paris AFP in English 1946 GMT 27 Dec 82

L'UNITA CRITICIZES DETENTION OF WALESA

[Unattributed commentary: "Polish Crisis Still Unresolved"]

[Text] Lech Walesa's detention and subsequent release are primarily a sign of the Polish military Government's weakness. Let us look at the facts. The day before yesterday an official ceremony was organized outside Gdansk's Lenin Shipyards to commemorate the victims of the 1970 workers' repression. It was attended by a few dozen people. We do not know how many were present at 1500 hours yesterday at the ceremony held by clandestine Solidarity at the same place and for the same purpose, but certainly the idea that Walesa's presence could have attracted a substantial gathering of workers frightened the military government. As is known, the trade unionist would not have delivered any inflammatory speeches. On the contrary, his positions are closer to the church's moderation than to the exasperation of certain groups within Solidarity. What was feared in fact was a comparison, albeit indirect, between Walesa's and Solidarity's popularity and that of the government and of General Jaruzelski, and a repressive measure was adopted to prevent it.

In other words, yet again the course short cut of "administrative" measures was adopted to tackle the "political problem" on which the Polish tragedy still centers -- the political problem spectacularly posed in summer 1980 by the birth of Solidarity, that of the democratic organization of the Polish state and society, which the December 1981 coup d'etat did not eliminate but further complicated and exacerbated.

In this connection, of course, it is not a matter of no consequence whether Walesa's detention is a temporary measure, lasting only a few hours, or whether it will be prolonged. However, it is the very fact itself that conveys to us the weight, the dimension and the consequences of a rationale that our party resolutely rejected immediately after General Jaruzelski's coup d'etat and that we must now reassert with undiminished forcefulness, repeating interminably, if necessary, that only the path of dialogue and cooperation among the truly existing political and social components of Poland -- and therefore, basically, a quest and a political and ideological initiative to regenerate and build peoples consensus -- can reopen the way to the processes of unity and national rebuilding that everybody indicates as a pressing necessity.

Some people, even on different sides, will observe that it is unrealistic to reassert these things. However, it should be considered whether this does not display the utmost realism. For the other way inevitably leads to a succession of repressive acts and further lacerations of the Polish nation.

Here too let us allow the facts to speak for themselves. Just a few weeks ago Walesa was released and just a few days ago the military government launched measures designed to end martial law, albeit not in the immediate future. There are various reasons for this: The implicit acknowledgement that the situation could no longer be governed with purely military means, the real difficulties with which clandestine Solidarity is contending, the need to create some ray of hope in the complex dealings with the church. All it took, however, was the fear of a demonstration attended by Walesa for a return to the trade unionist's arrest and the consequent regression in the entire Polish situation, with a de facto nullification of the preceding measures. Let it be shown to us that this is a realistic logic. That is, unless it is believed that it is possible and necessary to permanently repress any stirrings within Polish society and life. But with what means, if after a year's harsh military regime people are afraid of Walesa walking the streets? If there is such a strong church with such deep roots among the masses? Absolutely not. The Polish crisis is still there in all its entirety and gravity, without having encountered any solution. Everyone, starting with the present leaders of the Polish state, must be fully aware of this fact.

PARTY LEADERS CONFER ON CRESPO NOMINATION

LD272218 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Excerpts] Vitor Crespo was the name chosen by the Social Democratic Party [PSD] National Political Committee as candidate to the post of prime minister. This choice was announced by PSD chairman and outgoing Prime Minister Pinto Balsemao this afternoon in a communique which he himself read out to the media:

[Begin recording] Under the terms of the mandate given to him by the National Council, the PSD chairman has apprised the party's National Political Committee of the conclusions arising from the work aimed at nominating a candidate to the post of prime minister. The National Political Committee decided to propose to the National Council the nomination of Professor Vitor Pereira Crespo for the post of prime minister. This decision was conveyed to his excellency the president of the republic and the PSD partners in the Democratic Alliance.

Professor Vitor Pereira Crespo was one of the authors of the election program of the Democratic Alliance in the formation of which he actively took part. He was a member of the shadow cabinets chaired by Dr Sa Carneiro, and was a member of the sixth, seventh and eighth constitutional governments, all of them backed by the Democratic Alliance. Professor Vitor Pereira Crespo is currently chairman of the PSD Parliamentary Group and is chairman of the Administration Council of the Sa Carneiro Institute, a lecturer at Coimbra University, he has a degree in chemistry taken at the same university and at the University of California. He was rector of the Lourenco Marques University and president of the Institute of Culture.

The National Political Committee also decided to call a meeting of the party's National Council for 29 December and propose the holding of a summit meeting of the Democratic Alliance on 30 December. [end recording]

The nomination of Professor Vitor Crespo today brings to an end the first stage in the process of replacing the present prime minister. At a second stage -- and while Vitor Crespo approaches several people with a view to forming the new cabinet and possible developments within the Democratic Alliance are being awaited -- the public's attention is turning to the presidential palace, where the head of state today started the customary round of consultations with the political parties which always precede the appointment of any prime minister. This may be followed by a meeting with the Council of State, although in the present case this is not compulsory.

The consultations initiated by President Ramalho Eanes this afternoon coincided with the announcement of the name of the public figure to be put forward as the next prime minister. On this first day of consultations with the political parties, the president of the republic received delegations of the parties which make up the Democratic Alliance, namely the Popular Monarchist Party [PPM], Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] and PSD.

After a 90-minute audience with the head of state, [PPM leader] Riberiro Teles said that the PPM has nothing against the nomination of Vitor Crespo. Irrespective of who the new prime minister may be, Riberiro Teles said, the PPM advocates the fulfillment of the Democratic Alliance program. The Democratic Alliance is in good health in a very sick world, Ribeiro Teles added. He declined to say specifically whether or not he himself would continue in the government. On the other hand the statements made by [CDS leader] Freitas do Amaral at the end of his meeting with President Ramalho Eanes were somewhat unexpected: The CDS needs time to reflect on the name of Vitor Crespo. Freitas do Amaral added that the Centrists' stand on the nominee is expected to be made public after the meeting of the National Council this Wednesday. Freitas do Amaral justified the need for some time to reflect on the grounds that the proposed prime minister is not the chairman of the PSD, a fact that does not bind the CDS to automatic acceptance.

The Centrist leader also reaffirmed that he will not be a member of the next Cabinet, adding that he would probably return to the Assembly of the Republic without, however, holding the post of leader of the CDS Parliamentary Group. After the CDS, the president of the republic received a PSD delegation which at this moment is still conferring with General Ramalho Eanes.

PRIME MINISTER ON ARMED FORCES, TERRORISM

PM230927 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 13 Dec 82 pp 14-15

[Part two of Spanish Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez interview by Juan Luis Cebrian on 10 December in Madrid]

[Excerpt] Armed Forces

Question: The Armed Forces have presumed to form the nucleus of the feeling of Spanish historical identity for almost the past century and a half. Almost everyone agrees that Spain's number one political problem today is the coup d'etat. Many people believe two things: First, that there is an opportunity for the Socialist government and a desire on the part of the armed forces that everything should work; and second, that the alternative to a possbile institutional failure on the Socialist government's part, not next year or in 2 years' time but maybe in 3 years' time, would be some kind of military intervention in the belief that in that case, it would be the system that had failed.

Answer: I reject your main point. A government can indeed fail, however much determination it may have to succeed, but I deny that the alternative to this hypothetical failure can be anything but an election. Spain's future can, must and will be determined by elections. I consider this one of the major gains of the Spanish people's recent history.

However, I would like to make two observations on this subject -- one far-reaching one, concerning historical concepts, and another concerning the political situation, but nevertheless rigorous. As for the former, it must be acknowledged that political leaders often evade it. They do not want to broach it, expecially from progressive viewpoints, abandoning the context of the defense of conservative politicians. The nation-state as a historical concept originated linked to the creation of standing armies: In other words, its structure is the reason for and a reflection [conciencia] of the existence of standing armed forces. Therefore, when the armed forces are spoken of as a fundamental structure, as what is sometimes called a "backbone" of the state, though this sounds like a cliche, it is an acknowledgement of a historical and present reality. Whoever fails to see things this way cannot pursue a responsible defense policy and maintain the constitutional order, which are the tasks assigned to the armed forces by the Constitution, as could not fail to be the case.

The second element of analysis to which I referred is the present situation that we are experiencing. I would like to convey to Spanish society, including the armed forces, the direction that change must follow in Spain, without lapsing into pomposity, but without losing sight of its importance to our history. The prudence with which the transfer of powers was carried out and the caution with which the new government is proceeding detracts nothing from the profundity of the phenomenon. All we citizens should strive to come to terms with this new chapter of our history and display the ability to maintain links with the best of our traditions and project ourselves into the future, defending peace and progress.

From this viewpoint, I make a clear and unreserved appeal for trust. When General Pedrosa addressed me on 8 December and said: "I would like you to know us," I recalled my brief meeting with the first lieutenant general to join the Council of Ministers, because he spoke the same language. I want to armed forces to know me and for us to know each other, and I am determined that smokescreens and prejudices shall disappear, proceeding from clarity in communications and the responsible shouldering of the government's tasks.

Question: But I wonder what you feel as prime minister. Felipe Gonzalez has a very specific biography, very similar to any other Spaniard of 41 or under 40, with feelings, I imagine, and a respect for the state similar to those of any man of his age. Today when I arrived here, however, I was brought to your presence by a military aide and I saw you surrounded by all this paraphernalia....

Answer: This is rather an intimate question. I believe I have always had a sense of responsibility in any post that I hold. I long ago abandoned any hesitation before crossroads as a means of evading responsibility. In other words, always having the excuse that "I would be better off doing something else." I shoulder the responsibility with all that it entails. When I came here, to the prime minister's office, I made some observations, some of which I was able to convey quite spontaneously and others which I must convey delicately. It is a mixture of feelings. I believe that the responsibility lies here, in this building. There is no reason for me to change personally and therefore I can work normally, as I have always worked. However, at the same time I believe it is important, inevitable, that when someone comes to visit me there be a prime minister's aide to receive him at the door and announce him, because this is part of the very essence of the exercise of power, without implying any need to change personally. Since you have known me for some time, during a conversation such as this you may have noticed symptoms indicating whether or not there are any changes in the personal field of communication better than I, who am a bad judge of how I may be performing my new role as prime minister after living here for only a week. Last, while I have sometimes observed that the prime ministership lacked an adequate infrastructure, having been here a week, I can say it with the knowledge provided by sitting behind a desk 12-14 hours a day, trying to organize a mechanism useful to the leadership of the executive. There is no bitterness in my remarks. I believe that Machado [poet] was right: There is nothing that cannot get worse and nothing that cannot be improved, so I do not want to say whether what was done before me was good or bad. It has simply been done, and I regret it for the sake of former Prime Minister Calvo Sotelo and former Prime Minister Suarez, who lacked an adequate infrastructure to be able to say that they had a prime minister's office, which implies not only coordination among the various ministerial departments, but also the capacity to impart a thrust originating from the prime ministership to the major political, economic, social, defense actions, and so forth.

The investiture is the investiture not of the government but of the prime minister, who assumes direct responsibility for executive power, though he exercises it collegially via the Council of Ministers. However, after a week here two possible temptations present themselves. One belongs somewhat to oriental philosophy. It is to sit down and wait for each minister to call, to receive him, to talk to each about his own department and the problems he brings with him, with a greater or lesser degree of commitment, on the basis of a global outlook, but as a supervision of the minister's task, or, on the contrary, to try to create the necessary infrastructure for a real prime minister's office. This is what I am doing and it will take me several months. This is understood perfectly, but in fact it is adequately understood only by coming here to this office and having the run of the place. I know that this was Suarez' concern during his prime ministership, and Calvo Sotelo's too. However, I do not want to give the impression that I am evading an answer about the similarity of my feelings as a 40 year-old citizen to those of the rest of my generation regarding the armed forces.

It is true that there is a mutual ignorance, sometimes burdened by prejudices, but I have managed to adopt a responsible attitude to the problems of Spain's defense, of our territorial integrity, of our position in the world, and from this viewpoint I have reached conclusions that I am sure are shared by the armed forces and the majority of Spainards. For instance: Defense is not the exclusive province of top politicians or specialists; it is the concern of everyone, of all 37 or 38 million Spaniards.

This is why it must be a state policy, this is why there must be close relations between the armed forces and the people, the citizens. If those citizens freely decide that the government should be the one that we have now, they are clearly endorsing not only its policy on education, health, the economy, and so forth, but also its defense policy. This is constitutionally how it should be and this is how it will be. The best way to do it is with dedication and clarity, though sometimes the problems seem, or are, complex. To sum up, the greatest curiosity or anxiety is prompted by what form relations between the socialists and the armed forces will take. I venture to hope that they will be good, because there are national objectives that unite us with the vast majority -- irrespective of what each of us may think -- in specific aspects of political, economic, social and cultural life.

Question: What about loneliness?

Answer: Of course there is a kind of isolation.

Question: Do you feel now the loneliness of power?

Answer: Yes. Well, actually I would not want citizens to believe that I feel alone. This is something I have often thought about. Moreover, I have the team that I drew up -- people who, unless the contrary is proved -- in which case we will change them and that will be that -- are sufficiently serious, responsible and intellectually fresh, capable of working every day and of devoting their whole lives to it and of each concentrating on their own work. Be that as it may, however, the citizens must know that the telephone call at 2230 or midnight or the midnight news flash is indeed an arrow that makes straight for the nerve center, which is the prime minister's office. I am not saying that others do not feel its effects -- everyone feels its effects. I am simply saying that when one is where it all happens, so to speak, the news flash reaches that nerve center first of all. People should realize that being here, means above all that when someone meets a violent death -- and I am not specifying who -- it has immediate repercussions on the prime minister's personal life.

Question: What impact did the news of the death of the latest member of the First of October Armed Revolutionary Group to be killed have on you?

Answer: I thought of his family. Everyone who dies leaves other victims behind him -- children, mothers or fathers. It is much more tragic when the person who dies, whether uniformed or civilian, is assassinated in an ambush. In this case it was the result of a clash between the law and order forces and a person found guilty of a terrorist crime and accused of others. Be that as it may, I was, and still am, in favor of the abolition of the death penalty and I will always ask the law and order forces to avoid killing, though I will understand legitimate defense.

However, this question raises the whole issue of the eradication of terrorism and, though I mention this only in passing, I want citizens to know that some terrorist gangs instruct their members to surrender if surrounded, others do not. Behind these two attitudes there are different terrorist strategies that must not mislead us. I will explain this to the public at length on another occasion.

Question: Let us discuss violence and freedom. There is a group of repressive laws that you have promised to amend -- the laws on countering terrorism and on the defense of the Constitution.

Answer: We have provided ourselves with an advanced democratic Constitution that must be developed in many aspects, but this Constitution has created a judiciary with the highest degree of independence in Europe, though it lacks an infrastructure for its functioning. Therefore, we have a framework of truly progressive freedoms and rights.

Before the transition and as it developed the phenomenon of terrorism emerged, which is a serious threat to this framework of freedoms and peaceful coexistence for Spain's citizens and peoples. Terrorism has personal and collective consequences of the utmost gravity. It causes death, mistrust, destruction, and so forth. The public authorities have an obligation to eradicate it to give the citizens security. In this context Parliament produces laws whose aim is to provide the executive with the tools for combating the phenomenon of the terrorist gangs. This is what has happened in Western democracies with a longer history than ours. And we cannot be an exception.

However, some of this legislation is not being implemented and some of it needs to be revised. Whatever is not implemented must be rejected as unnecessary, as happened with the law on the defense of democracy. I must say that, without terrorism these laws would not exist -- something which, although it is obvious, if often forgotten. In the present situation we propose to introduce improvements to the system's legal procedures and to reform the penal code, as I said in the investiture debate, but we cannot create legal vacuums that will facilitate terrorist activity and generate a feeling of greater insecurity.

What worries me most, despite what I have said, is that many citizens feel insecure because of the extortions, kidnappings and crimes perpetrated by the terrorist gangs, because our chief responsibility is to ensure that they can be free, for which they need to feel secure.

Question: With regard to extraditions from France, do you not believe that the existence of special laws and courts here could be used there as a pretext for refusing these extraditions?

Answer: No. They must not use them in this way. From the viewpoint of the institutionalization of an independent legal system, I have already said that Spain has gone further than any other European country. The fact that we have to commission all the necessary resources to ensure a proper administration of justice is another matter. I have the impression that the problems have arisen not for this reason, but for others, among which I do not rule out the faulty preparation of extradition documents, though this is not the most important one. However, this will be corrected in the future.

Question: Do you not believe, for instance, that the national court should be altered?

Answer: I believe that the national court's functions should be reappraised for the time being because it probably has some functions that should not belong to it. There are certain kinds of crimes, however, affecting state security that cannot be dealt with by an ordinary court.

Question: What about the prisons? Will you maintain the top security prison, such as Herrera de la Mancha?

Answer: I do not have enough information to express a responsible opinion on this subject now. When I have received the report that I have requested on it and I have all the facts at my disposal, I will express my opinion. What I can say now is that the general situation in the prison must change quickly. The point of balance is still the maintenance of a concept of security not unconnected with the concept of social peace and transcending public order as such.

Question: Are you optimistic or pessimistic about the immediate evolution of terrorism? What is the significance of your offer of a dialogue made during the investiture debate?

Answer: I do not want to be misunderstood, and if people believe that I am offering a dialogue to those who act violently I am being misunderstood. As far as I am concerned there can only be one kind of dialogue -- the kind laid down by the limits of the Constitution, irrespective of who is in a position to speak or conduct dialogue. Not only am I obliged to observe these limits, but I believe that the existence of a system of freedom in Spain depends on it. When people talk about observance of the Constitution I would like them to understand that there is a higher level than observance, which is the conviction that the Constitution is the foundation on which this historic blueprint is being built: Observance and defense. The Constitution embraces the positions of the entire range of democratic pluralism and of whatever freedoms may exist. What it cannot embrace is violence against the Constitution. Of course it may or may not have the people's support. And you ask me whether or not I am optimistic. In historical terms, I am. I do not believe we will put an end to the violence in 1 or 2 days, but I am confident and hopeful that the perpetrators of violence will realize that their way is a blind alley.

Question: Socialist member of Parliament Damborena has said that the KAS [expansion unknown] alternative contains an acceptable part. Is this your opinion too?

Answer: I remember a recent publication announcing the Socialist Party's anti-terrorist plan. It listed a number of measures. I learned of it via that publication, and the plan corresponded to none of the documents issued by the party, but when I saw the 10 points presented there, I believed that 3, 4 or 5, I do not know how many, could be included in a plan for combating violence and terrorism. I imagine that this is the same way the Basque Socialist deputy's thoughts went. Within the Constitution you can advocate whatever position you want, barring violent methods, and you can contest elections stating that your platform is self-determination. Well, however little popular support you gain, I have no reason to deny you the right to say this, as long as you do not act violently against the Constitutional order. But I would like to make it clear that I believe that Spain's unity cannot be questioned.

Question: There are other rights. Conscientious objection, for instance. Do you intend to legislate on it?

Answer: I do not consider the issue a national priority, but it must be broached. What worries me, however, is the possibility that the government may define its policy by the number of bills that it produces. When I was asked to give a legislative timetable at the investiture, I had one but I did not want to reveal it. There were 150 bills and I began to think to myself: 150 bills will fill an entire legislative term devoted solely to producing legislation.

Question: The PSOE has been accused of political misogyny and of a lack of attention to the topics of women's liberation.

Answer: It is a partly justified charge. Spanish society is still fairly male-dominated (but no more than our European neighbors), and the political parties have failed to tackle the issue rigorously. I said it was a partly justified charge because the PSOE is the party with a solid social representation that offers the best hopes of equal treatment for men and women. I therefore acknowledge the shortcoming and assert the hope.

Question: Last, how are your relations with the Catholic Church? Do you not foresee any clashes over laws on education?

Answer: Though this is the last question, I should say that the substance of your twofold question is almost enough to fill an interview.

Briefly, I must say that relations are good. And that a large proportion of the church could identify with a socioeconomic program such as ours, which attempts to combat social injustices and inequalities and that the subject of education will not constitute a serious obstacle to an understanding, because our position, as was seen at the investiture, is not seriously challenged by anyone.

I accept that private education provides a social service and I merely wish that the Constitution be observed, without the establishment of any kind of discriminations.

FRAGA FAVORS DIALOGUE WITH GOVERNMENT

PM221437 [Editorial Report] Madrid YA in Spanish on 12 December 1982 publishes on pages 32-33 a 1,900-word Maria-Luisa Garcia-Franco interview with Popular Alliance Chairman Manuel Fraga Iribarne. He criticizes Spanish Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez' investiture speech for its alleged vagueness, denies that a shadow Cabinet is being formed, and states that he is in favor of dialogue with the government, although maintaining that it "must be reserved solely for essentials."

KING JUAN CARLOS RECORDS CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

LD250000 [Editorial Report] Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish at 2100 GMT on 24 December, in a linkup of all Spanish television and radio stations, broadcasts a recorded Christmas message to the Spanish people by King Juan Carlos.

After his brief introductory remarks, Juan Carlos points out that Spaniards should look upon recent events "without fear because they constitute positive elements of our society capable of giving us further strength to face the problems and difficulties that are affecting us." He discusses the importance of unity and creative energy. Juan Carlos emphasizes the importance of the Spanish family as the key to the strength of Spain. He discusses the role of the father and the father's worries over his children's future and well-being. He also discusses the dreams that those children have for that future.

Juan Carlos gives a "special mention for those who have given their efforts and lives in the fulfillment of their duty, to preserve this peace and the hopes for the future that inspire us." He also greets those Spaniards at work or overseas fulfilling their various duties. The king concludes his address at 2109 GMT by wishing all Spaniards a Merry Christmas and a prosperous New Year on behalf of his family and himself.

FOREIGN MINISTER COOL ON SWEDEN'S ZONE PROPOSAL

[Unattributed report: "No to Swedish Proposal"]

[Text] Denmark does not think that Sweden's proposal for a 300-km wide nuclear-free zone in central Europe is a good one. This emerged from statements from Danish Foreign Minister Uffe Ellemann-Jensen on Friday [17 December] after his Swedish counterpart Lennart Bodstrom's short visit to Copenhagen. The Danish foreign minister takes the view that one of the fundamental problems with the Swedish proposal is that it isolates geographical areas from the global nuclear problem. "We fear that this kind of isolated solution could complicate the disarmament negotiations taking place at present in Geneva between the United States and the Soviet Union," Uffe Ellemann-Jensen said.

The Swedish foreign minister had no comment to make on the negative Danish reaction to the latest Swedish proposal for a central European nuclear-free zone. However, he did say that positive reactions had already been received from various countries, but was unwilling to say more.

At the meeting between the two foreign ministers the question of a Nordic nuclear-free zone was also raised. The Danish stance here is also negative. "This is an old debate with its well-known views. The Nordic area is already nuclear-free, and we have no intention of altering that fact, so there is no need for us to write that into a treaty," the Danish foreign minister said.

FINLAND

PAPER VIEWS BODSTROM, OTHER ZONE PLANS

PM211657 Helsinki HUFVUDSTADSBLADET in Swedish 10 Dec 82 p 4

[Jan-Magnus Jansson editorial: "In Rapacki's Footsteps"]

[Text] Swedish Foreign Minister Lennart Bodstrom's proposal for a nuclear-free zone in central Europe came as a surprise, even though a fair number of people were expecting the new Swedish Government to indicate its desire for greater foreign policy activity in some way. The proposal complements the active, but some somewhat vague interest the Palme government has in the Nordic nuclear-free zone.

The first question that came to mind when Bodstrom's initiative was made public was whether it was a joint demarche with central European states, indeed even with the superpowers. If this were so it would have been a very important event. Interest cooled somewhat when it became clear that it was obviously a separate move by the Swedish Government, even though the background to the initiative is to be found in the discussions within the Palme Commission, a body which consisted of authoritative people from various countries but which was completely unofficial. The report which the committee put forward in June 1982 contains the plan which Bodstrom has now wheeled out on behalf of his government. It stipulates that a 150km-wide zone [as published] in West Germany and its Eastern neighbors, the GDR and Czechoslovakia, be cleared of nuclear arms, which in practice really means tactical or battlefield nuclear arms.

The Swedish initiative brings old times to mind. The best known model for a denuclearized central Europe was contained in the so-called Rapacki plan put forward in October 1957 by then Polish Foreign Minister Adam Rapacki.

The Rapacki plan was an important topic of conversation in Europe in the years when diplomats were rubbing their stiff limbs after the end of the cold war. Then it fell into oblivion. Its political background is chiefly to be found in Poland's and the whole of the Eastern Bloc's desire to prevent rearmament -- nuclear and conventional -- in Western Germany, but also in Poland's natural desire for detente.

The Rapacki plan was more ambitious that the Bodstrom plan in the sense that it aimed at the creation of a nuclear-free zone consisting of four countries; West Germany, the GDR, Poland and Czechoslovakia. The Rapacki plan was later replaced by the Gomulka plan, which only aimed at freezing nuclear arms numbers in central Europe. It failed because of the Western powers' unwillingness to ban nuclear arms from West Germany.

Sweden's best known contribution to the search for a solution to nuclear problems in the sixties was the so-called Unden plan which was put forward in 1961 and took its name from then Foreign Minister Osten Unden. It was different from the Rapacki plan and the later Kekkonen plan in that it did not use the idea of a zone. The basic idea in Unden's plan was that states which were willing to refrain from the use of all forms of nuclear arms on their territory could form a "club" regardless of their geographical positions. The number of nuclear-free states could therefore be expected to grow. It is possible to see a distant similarity between Unden's thinking and the not very well received plan that Sweden and Finland should each declare themselves to be nuclear-free, put forward quite recently by Alva Myrdal.

The Bodstrom plan -- or should it be called the Palme plan? -- is different from earlier proposals in that it aims at a narrow geographical zone, that is, an area which would immediately be transformed into a military front upon the outbreak of war. The Palme report, which can be used as a sort of background material to the proposal, stresses the dangers of the existence of such a large number of tactical nuclear arms in forward positions in central Europe. A large part of these, on the NATO side in particular, are in the immediate vicinity of the border. The report points to the risk that the nuclear threshold would immediately be crossed, because, for one reason, the right to use the arms could be delegated to local commanders. The withdrawal of the arms from within 150 km of the border is clearly designed to give a certain amount of breathing space before they are brought into use.

It is almost possible to include the Palme plan under the heading of confidence-building measures which reduce tension in areas of superpower sensitivity without having a decisive effect on military planning and the balance of power as a whole. In itself the argument cannot be said to be unreasonable. However, we can ask what reception it will receive: Initial reactions from the two superpower alliances have not been favorable.

Even while the Palme Commission was still meeting its Soviet member, the well-known U.S.-specialist Georgiy Arbatov expressed his reservations and pointed out that the step would have little military significance and that the nuclear weapons that had been withdrawn could be quickly moved back into position. Norwegian Foreign Minister Svenn Stray has criticized the timing of the demarche and hinted that it could confuse the issue in the much more important negotiations currently taking place elsewhere. We can also wonder whether NATO which builds its strategy to a very large extent on defense "on the border" supported by tactical nuclear arms will be willing to discuss the plan.

The Swedish Government, however, intends to press on smartly. It stresses that this is not a final proposal, much more like "soundings" of the CSCE area's governments to see whether the conditions exist for further work on the plan. The Swedish Government also apparently wants to link the plan to an expansion of the zone northwards (the Nordic nuclear-free zone) and southwards (Greece's proposal for a nuclear-free zone in southern Europe). This gives the plan greater breadth than it has in purely technical terms. At the same time, however, a rebuff for the zone plan would perhaps make it possible to declare that further work on the plans for a Nordic zone are useless at present.

The Swedish zone plan is also original in that it is put forward by a country outside the area to which it is intended to apply. This could be an advantage to or a burden for the plan's proposers.

The Bodstrom plan is a very good example of the activity currently being advocated by many Finns. We can take a positive view of such demarches: As long as proposals are put forward and activity continues the world at least is not being paralyzed by fatalism. However, is is also possible to take a critical view of them, because a glut of plans, which in the long run would not be taken seriously by those most closely affected, could give rise to a cynical atmosphere.

SOVIET DIPLOMATS ACCUSED OF ESPIONAGE LEAVE

LD271842 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] According to what our staff has learned, the two Soviet diplomats who have been accused of industrial espionage among other things and declared personas non grata in Sweden are leaving the country by train from Malmo to Moscow this evening. However, it is still unclear what will happen to the third Soviet citizen who has also been accused of industrial espionage but who is not a diplomat.

TURKISH CYPRIOTS TAKE UP ARMAMENT IN SOUTH AT UN

NC280848 Nicosia KIBRIS POSTASI in Turkish 26 Dec 82 pp 1, 7

[Text] Lefkosa, [Nicosia] -- TFSC representative in New York Nail Atalay has stated that a true rapprochement between the two communities in Cyprus can be posible only through the immediate cessation of hostile acts through the creation of conditions that will be conducive to intercommunal talks, and finally through the finding of a peaceful settlement for the Cyprus dispute.

Atalay has sent a letter to UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar replying to the views expressed in an earlier letter sent to him by Greek Cypriot UN Representative Konstantin Mousioutas. The letter sent to the UN Secretary General Nail Atalay was distributed as a UN General Assembly and Security Council document, it was disclosed in Lefkosa.

In his letter, Atalay has stressed that the futile efforts by the Greek Cypriot administration to deny the intensive arms stockpiling in south Cyprus and to accuse the Turkish Cypriot side of preparing for an imaginary war constitute a typical example of attempts to confuse the guilty with the innocent. Stating that the Greek Cypriot press openly referred to the fact that the Greek Cypriots are arming in an appalling manner, Atalay emphasized that the arguments put forward by the Greek Cypriot administration that the Greek Cypriots were arming for the purpose of strengthening the defense of the socalled free zone of Cyprus cannot cover up the fact that they are threatening the increasingly developing peace on the island. Atalay drew attention to the fact that the arms being obtained are meant for attack and not for defense. He added that among these arms are missiles, tanks, heavy machineguns, light and heavy guns and armored vehicles, and that the quantity is far above that needed for defense purposes.

By advancing such meaningless arguments that the Turks are going to attack or that a local paper may provoke Turkey, the Greek Cypriot representative cannot divert attention in other directions. Atalay added: "Comparing Turkey's military strength with that of the Greek Cypriot administration is irrelevant. The Cyprus dispute is not an issue between Turkey and the Greek Cypriot administration. Turkey's presence in Cyprus is confined to efforts to protect peace on the island, to maintain Cyprus' bicommunal independence and to protect the Turkish Cypriot community against the armed attacks of the Greek Cypriots by using its rights and responsibilities within the framework embodied in international agreements.

Atalay stated that it is impossible for the Greek Cypriot representative to expect the Turkish Cypriot community to agree to relinquish Turky's protection or to forget the aggressive role played by Greece since 1963 as part of the expansionist plans which it has been pursuing in the east Mediterranean for a long time. Atalay also recalled with emphasis that the Greek Cypriots -- who gladly serve as tools in the execution of Greece's sinister plans -- described the anniversary of the defeat of the Greek forces in 1922 in invading western Anatolia as "the Asia Minor disaster."

Atalay emphasized that under these conditions and in light of the political, social and economic embargo imposed on the Turkish Cypriot community, it is difficult to understand the meaning of the false preachings of the Greek Cypriot leadership about cooperation and rapprochement between the two countries.

After quoting some examples of the economic embargo which the Greek Cypriot community has imposed on the Turkish Cypriot community, Atalay concluded: "A true rapprochement between the two communities in Cyprus can be possible only through the immediate cessation of hostile acts, through the creation of conditions that will be conducive to intercommunal talks and finally through the finding of a peaceful settlement for the Cyprus dispute. However, let me regretfully say that as will be seen from Mousioutas' letter, the negative attitude of the Greek Cypriot side renders our efforts to find such a settlement impossible. It is impossible for us to be optimistic about making any progress. We hope that the Greek Cypriot side will soon grasp the realities and that it will abandon the perilous path it has chosen in the search for a peaceful settlement of the Cyprus dispute."

DENKTAS ON MEANING OF AGREEMENT WITH MAKARIOS

TA281205 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that the passage of time was solidifying the separation between the Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot communities. In a statement this morning, President Denktas said that the guideline agreement, reached at the summit meeting between him and the late Archbishop Makarios, provided for a bizonal federation in Cyprus and the continuation of the Cyprus intercommunal talks within these guidelines, and benefitted both communities. He stated that the efforts by the Greek Cypriot leader, Mr Kiprianou, to alter or weaken these guidelines would not yield the desired results in harmony with the aspirations of the Greek Cypriot community.

On Mr Kiprianou's claims, Mr Denktas said that the Greek Cypriots had the support of Greece and the world of Hellenism for the realization of Greek Cypriot aspirations, and the implementation of the principles of the outdated Greek "Megalo idea," had precipitated the present separation in Cyprus. President Denktas stressed that the United Nations was an organization to safeguard the freedom of people and would not deprive a community which had founder partnership rights in the freedom, sovereignty and independence of the country.

He reiterated that the United Nations was always by the side of the oppressed and its principles would prevail only if it continued to do so. President Denktas stressed that those who were hiding behind the guise of a legal government trying to exploit the principles of the United Nations so as to do away with the freedom of the Turkish Cypriot community would eventually be unmasked.

DENKTAS SAYS LEFKE WILL NOT BE GIVEN UP

TA271604 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the concern that Lefke [Lefka] will be left to the Greek Cypriots is unnecessary. This morning Denktas received a delegation of representatives from institutions and establishments in Lefke. In a statement after the meeting, Denktas said: Lefke is our oldest Turkish Cypriot district, and it is our duty to show the necessary attention to this district. The government should discuss which of their demands should immediately be fulfilled, which are [words indistinct]. Actually, I believe that a government statement referred to (?the interest shown) in the subject. I would like to state one thing: It is completely unnecessary to worry or even to be concerned over the fact that Lefke will be left to the Greek Cypriots under any agreement. The citizens of the region should not consider such a possibility. Such a move has not been and will not be considered. Therefore, let them be in peace.

According to a Turkish Cypriot news agency report, Lefke Mayor [name indistinct] made a statement after the meeting and said that they had briefed the president on Lefke's problems.

He added that the president will visit Lefke in January and investigate the problems on the spot. He stressed that not even an inch of Lefke could be a subject for bargaining with the Greek Cypriots. He added that they wanted the government to strengthen this belief with considerable investments in the region.

ATAKOL ADDRESSES TURKISH CYPRIOT ASSEMBLY

TA240916 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 0905 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Text] Lefkosa, 24 Dec (AA) -- Foreign Minister Kenan Atakol of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus said Thursday the Turkish side would not be the first to quit intercommunal talks. Atakol made the statement during Federated Legislative Assembly debate on the 1983 budget.

Atakol deplored Greek aggressive behavior toward the Turkish Cypriot community politically and economically, and called for united reaction against such behavior.

TURKISH TROOPS SCHEDULE MILITARY EXERCISES

[Text] The United Nations have informed the republic's authorities that the Turkish occupation force will hold military exercises in the Turkish sector of Nicosia effective today.

BRIEFS

BAYRAK RADIO ANNIVERSARY -- Bayrak Radio, the voice of the Turkish Cypriot fighters, is celebrating its 19th anniversary today. On 21 December 1963, the Greek Cypriots usurped the Turkish Cypriots of their rights to have a broadcasting organ and so, Bayrak Radio was set up in 3 days. To this day, it continues to make the just cause of the Turkish Cypriots heard throughout the world in three languages. The Bayrak Radio and Television [BRT] union, Bay-Sen, published a magazine called BRT on the occasion of the foundation anniversary of Bayrak Radio which will be published monthly. [(Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0500 GMT 25 Dec 82 TA]

NEW PARTY SECRETARY GENERAL -- In a meeting held today, the Democratic People's Party's assembly elected Ahmet Atamsoy, who is also the education, culture, youth and sports minister, to the post of secretary general of the party. The assembly then proceeded to elect the 8-man Executive Committee of the party and to discuss the domestic and foreign issues of the TFSC. AVEROF, FLORAKIS COMMENT ON REFUGEE REPATRIATION

[Excerpt] Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou's announcement on the free and unrestricted repatriation of political refugees, which he made to the representatives of Hellenic Radio-Television 1 and 2 [ERT-1 and ERT-2] on the occasion of Christmas, has found almost total response in the political world in addition to the favorable echo it had on public opinion. The political party leaders as well as former Prime Minister Kanelopoulos and state Deputy Yeoryio Mavros made statements today regarding the issue.

Specifically, New Democracy Party leader Evangelos Averof made the following statement:

Mr Prime Minister has chosen Christmas Day to festively announce the repatriation of those living in the Eastern world countries. His intention is obvious: to distract public opinion's attention from the difficult problems which PASOK's bad ruling of the country has caused the Greek people. Concerning the substance of the issue, the prime minister's announcement does not add anything new because, as is known, most of the postwar governments had established the repatriation with the exception of those burdened with many convictions for criminal activity. The New Democracy Party considers as essential to exempt from this measure certain categories of persons who had even been defenders of splitting unity in the national sphere. With a very light heart, the prime minister allows the return to Greece of those persons without even any processing.

The measures announced by Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou on Christmas Day concerning the huge question of political refugees are certainly positive from both the democratic and national aspects, KKE Secretary General Kharilaos Florakis stated in response to a question from newsmen on the issue of the political refugees' repatriation. Florakis also stressed that it is about time the last wounds of civil war were healed. These wounds were intentionally kept open by certain forces in order to poison our national life and democratic developments. We believe, of course, that both the interpretation and implementation of the relative measures that have been announced will include all the Greek citizen political refugees without exception or conditions and that, at the same time, the state will exert every effort to resolve their critical problems.

I KATHIMERINI APPRAISES MORATORIUM WITH TURKEY

NC261737 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 25 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[Excerpts] The "moratorium" with Turkey has already been in force informally, and as long as it is not officially and substantively disturbed by the Turkish side, it should be considered very probable that a meeting between the foreign ministers of the two countries will be held next February. This timing of the meeting also expresses the length of time which the Greek Government considers as necessary for trying out the "moratorium" so that the suitable climate may be created for the Greek-Turkish dialogue.

These assessments have been made by reliable diplomatic circles, who described the Greek side's verbal note (after the violations) that both sides contribute to the restoration of climate between the two countries as the starting point of a new phase of the old "moratorium." This time mark, in conjunction with the fact that Turkey has not until now proceeded with new violations, is considered by the Greek side as a sufficient confirmation of Ankara's acceptance of the "moratorium" contents.

The same circles attribute Ankara's provocative actions at times mainly to its concern over a likely extension of Greek territorial waters, something that Greece is now allowed by virtue of the new law of the sea treaty.

In reality, according to the same assessments, the violations aim not only at questioning the Greek airspace limits that had been accepted by Turkey for decades, but also at "reminding" that, since Ankara expresses its objection to something which is already fixed from the international law point of view, its reaction will be stronger after a possible extension of our territorial waters.

The standstill with the Atlantic alliance is linked with these developments in Greek-Turkish relations and with the outlined predictions. This is so because settlement of this standstill predetermines the solution of the Greek-Turkish disputes.

According to assessments by the same diplomatic circles, the Greek Government would be prepared to immediately establish the NATO command in Larissa under the precondition that the limits of its jurisdiction would coincide with those that were in force before 1974 in as far as the defense of our national airspace is concerned within the Athens flight information region. In other words, the NATO note that constitutes the alliance's official acceptance of this arrangement must be in force.

In the case of NATO, the nonsettlement of the pending situation with explicit clarifications that would confirm the old status does not seem to constitute a loss of some Greek sovereign right. This is so because, despite the Turkish questioning, air defense virtually remains in Greek hands.

With this reasoning, it appears that any prediction of our country's withdrawal from NATO is overthrown. It is supported that, taking the international situation as a given fact, it is doubtful if there would be a Greek Government which would desire to shoulder the heavy responsibility of a wider relaxation of political and defensive links with the West. Besides, the present government may be flirting with the non-aligned countries but it is also aware of their weaknesses.

At the same time, a wider relaxation would increase even more -- with an excuse that would be offered by the Greek side itself -- Turkey's importance to the West, while we should not overlook the "deterrent" element of our participation in the Western alliance, as the loss of this element would expose our country to specific dangers in the long run.

GDR'S PAUL VERNER ON RESULTS OF KKE CONGRESS

NC221604 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 22 Dec 82 p 7

[Statement to RIZOSPASTIS on the 11th KKE Congress by Paul Verner, member of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany Politburo and Central Committee secretary -- date not given]

[Text] Your congress has been an exceptional international event for all the communist parties which have seen the road covered by the KKE since its 10th congress -- a thing which was most important -- and which have seen the number of new delegates to the 11th congress. If I may say so, there was great unity between the senior, the experienced comrades, and the many new KKE fighters for democracy, social progress and peace.

PAKISTANI FINANCE MINISTER ISHAQ KHAN IN ANKARA

TA271045 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Pakistani Minister of Finance, Commerce, Planning and Provincial Cooperation Ghulam Ishaq Khan, who arrived in Ankara last night, began his contacts today. He was received by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu this morning. Ulusu said that he was pleased to see the finance minister of friendly and brotherly Pakistan in Turkey. He added that such visits would further strengthen the cooperation between the two countries. Ulusu also expressed the belief that the joint economic committee meetings which will begin today will yield beneficial results for economic relations.

The visiting minister will meet State Minister Sermet Refik Pasin in the afternoon. The joint economic committee meetings will be held by the Turkish and Pakistani delegations headed by Pasin Ishaq Khan, respectively.

Attends Economic Committee Meeting

TA271737 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Text] Pakistani Minister of Finance, Commerce, Planning and Provincial Cooperation Ghulam Ishaq Khan, who is in Ankara, is continuing his contacts. The Pakistani minister met with Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin this afternoon. Later, the Turkish-Pakistani joint economic committee met under the two ministers. Pasin said that world economic developments are adversely affecting stability and peace but that, inspite of this, Turkey and Pakistan are cooperating based on mutual trust. Pasin added that the historic, religious and cultural ties between the two countries affected not only bilateral relations, but also the two countries' stands on international issue. Noting that the economic achievements in Pakistan in recent years were appreciated by Turkey, Pasin added that Turkey entered a new period of economic progress during the last 2 years. Pasin said that the program implemented in this new period put an end to direct state interference in the economy and was based on a market economy. Noting that the program also includes methods which will enable the Turkish economy to unite with foreign markets, Pasin added that as a result of this program, the rate of inflation has been reduced from 100 percent to about 30 percent annually within 2 years, the development rate has reached 4.4 percent and exports have increased considerably. Pasin said that the government intends to keep the rate of inflation under control and increase investments.

Pasin said that Turkey and Pakistan can begin close cooperation in the industrial process. He expressed the belief that concrete decisions will be made at the committee meeting in a bid to achieve this goal.

Ishaq Khan said that at the talks they will find the opportunity to assess the progress made in trade relations and economic cooperation. Noting that every effort will be exerted to achieve joint goals, Ishaq Khan added that the existing solidarity between the two countries will enable this.

The measures which have to be taken to increase the trade between the two countries are being discussed at the joint economic committee meetings. Turkish-Pakistani joint investment possibilities in the automative industry and the production of tractors and electrical appliances in Pakistan are also being discussed at the meetings. An agreement on the establishment of a Turkish-Pakistani engineering and consulting firm is expected to be signed at the meetings.

TRIAL OF ILLEGAL COMMUNIST PARTY MEMBERS BEGINS

TA271737 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 27 Dec 82

[Summary] The trial of 229 persons belonging to the illegal Turkish Revolutionary Communist party [TDKP] has begun at the 1st Army and Martial Law Command's First Military Court in Istanbul. The identity of 110 suspects who are in detention was determined at today's hearing. The suspects are being charged with engaging in activities aimed at overthrowing the constitutional order in Turkey and replacing it with a Marxist-Leninist system.

13 DEFENDANTS IN COMMUNIST TRIAL RELEASED

[Text] Ankara, 24 Dec (AA) -- Thirteen defendants in the trial of 280 members of the Communist Party of Turkey were released by an Ankara martial law court Friday. There were several women among those set at liberty.

UNIONISTS ACQUITTED OF COMMUNISM CHARGES

TA231801 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1600 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Istanbul, Dec 23 (A.A.) -- An Istanbul martial law court Wednesday acquitted 43 officers of the trade union "Paksat-is" (union of food packagers and salesmen) of charges of turning a legal organization into an illegal one for the purpose of establishing a communist order. The prosecutor asked the court for the acquittal, stating his examination of the evidence had convinced him the defendants had not broken the law.

110 LEFTISTS CAPTURED IN EAST ANATOLIA

TA261447 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 25 Dec 82

[Summary] A total of 110 suspects have been captured during operations conducted by security forces in Diyarbakir Province in East Anatolia and its vicinity. Out of these, 69 belong to the illegal Turkish Communist Party [TCP], 29 to the Turkish Communist Toiler Party [TCTP] and 12 to the Turkish People's Liberation Party Front -- Emergency [TPLPF-E] group.

A statement by the Diyarbakir Martial Law Command's Press and Public Relations Department says that the TCP members are accused of cooperating with divisive organizations in the region, of trying to penetrate legal organizations like Progressive Youths, Progressive Women and Turkish Teachers' Unity and Solidarity Association [TOB-DER], of carrying out subversive activities, of participating in party meetings held abroad and attending 6-month training courses there and of working against the approval of the new constitutional referendum.

The TCP members, on the other hand, are accused of trying to unite all illegal revolutionary organizations under one roof in a bid to conduct subversive activities. A Kalachnikov rifle, a submachine gun, a pistol, a duplicator and banned publications were seized by the security forces during the operation.

The members of the TPLPF-E group, who began their illegal activities in the People's Revolutionary Pioneers Organization in 1972, are accused of carrying out illegal organizational and subversive activities in the Diyarbakir region and of keeping in touch with organization officials in other regions of the country.

RIGHTISTS CAPTURED IN ADANA; EXTREMISTS SENTENCED

TA231545 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1540 GMT 23 Dec 82

[Text] Adana, 23 Dec (AA) -- Four members of the right-wing extremist group calling itself Idealist Youth Association "UGD" were caught in Adana on charges of having killed a total of 6 persons from 1978 to 1980. Among their victims were a correspondent of the daily "AYDINLIK", a teacher, and 4 cinemagoers they killed in a raid in Mersin.

In Antalya, a martial law court sentenced 5 members of the extremist group "Dev-Yol" (Revolutionary Path) to 5 to 35 years in prison for armed robbery.

WEAPONS SMUGGLERS CAPTURED IN IZMIR DISTRICT

TA241650 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Summary] Twelve persons smuggling arms and ammunition and 24 persons purchasing from these smugglers have been captured in Izmir's Bayindir District. Following the interrogation of the captured it has been determined that the suspects sold 195 pistols and some 50,000 rounds of ammunition in the region up till now. The 24 purchasers were seized with 25 pistols and 82 rounds of ammunition.

OUR RADIO CRITICIZES TURKISH MILITARY JUDGES

TA240914 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0700 GMT 24 Dec 82

[Station commentary: "What a Judge"]

[Text] A newspaper report on hearings in an Ankara military court quotes a military judge asking the young suspects: Is there no one among you with the courage to confess his deeds? All you do is deny charges. Are you afraid for your lives?

What a judge, dear listeners. Simply consider the request made by the judge to the youths on trial. What the judge is asking them to do is to agree to confessions made under duress. It seems this uniformed so-called judge is not aware of the significance of his demand. This incident proves that there is no evidence against these youths except for their confessions, and that patriots being tried in military courts are being sentenced based on such confessions rather than evidence. The judge is in a tight position and is trying to play a trick on the youngsters in order to convict them. His goal is to make them agree to confessions which the military prosecutor forcibly extracted from them.

This proves that the entire crime of the youths is defending democracy and resisting fascism. Another truth which emerges is that the junta has not been able to pin down the real culprits of violence. It is a well-known fact that instead of punishing the real terrorists, the junta is harboring them.

Latest developments show that the junta is taking the necessary measures in order to deal with other democrats and democratic organizations that have escaped its wrath. According to a law which has been enacted at the Consultative Assembly, the government will be able to close down by decree all professional chambers with official status, or to limit their activities and paralyze them.

The junta has not been able to capture the real perpetrators of incidents of terror. Those seized were later released or were allowed to escape from prison. However, the junta kept in dungeons those fighting for democracy and peace, detaining hundreds, even thousands, for their political views. On Tuesday, the First Military Court in Izmir condemned Candemir Ozer, the editor of SAVAS YOLU [STRUGGLE PATH] to 14 years and 9 months in prison just for his political views. Detentions and convictions follow one another. And wardens disguised as judges im military courts are challenging our youths. In the event the suspects begin defending their views before the court, either the judge asks them to cut it short or has them removed from the courtroom. What do you think, dear listeners, of the cleverness of such uniformed so-called judges in Ankara?

KREISKY ON PLO-ISRAEL TALKS, 'ARAFAT MEETING

AU281202 Vienna Domestic Service in German 1110 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Brigitte Fuchs telephone interview with Chancellor Kreisky, who is vacationing in Palma de Majorca -- recorded "a few minutes ago"]

[Text] [Question] Mr Chancellor, here in Vienna there is some excitement at the moment about a NEWSWEEK article which says that you have initiated direct contacts for the first time between the PLO and an important Israeli politician or personage. The issue at stake is said to be an exchange of Israeli and Palestinian prisoners of war. Have these contacts, which are said to have materialized through your mediation, produced any success yet?

[Answer] Well, first of all let me tell you that this is a story which is already a few weeks old, and so delicate that I do not want to say any more about it. It is a question of prisoners or war on both sides, and I was asked to make endeavors regarding this humanitarian matter, and naturally I complied with this request -- but I do not want to say any more about it.

[Question] A few months ago you said you would no longer act as a mediator. Has your position in this respect changed?

[Answer] Where humanitarian questions are concerned, such considerations do not enter into it at all. In political matters, yes, in humanitarian matters, no. If one is asked to help in a humanitarian matter, one must do it. I have done it primarily for the sake of the families and the individual people involved, not to do a favor for any government.

[Question] Have you been asked by the Israelis to act as a mediator in this matter?

[Answer] By families -- of course with the knowledge of the government, as far as I am informed.

[Question] This establishment of contact you managed to bring about -- was it also discussed yesterday when you talked with PLO Chairman 'Arafat?

[Answer] I cannot and do not want to say anything about this. Certainly these questions have played an important role for quite some time now.

[Question] Could you tell us what else you talked about with Mr 'Arafat?

[Answer] Well, yes, it was our first meeting after Beirut, after he left Beirut -- our meeting in Tunis did not materialize because he had important negotiations with King Husayn -- and thus he informed me, of course, about various things that happened there, and about the PLO's position on various important problems -- but I cannot tell you any more than that.

[Question] In 2 months' time the Palestinian National Council will meet in Algiers. Can you tell us what impression you have gained from 'Arafat, what decisions are going to be made there?

[Answer] If 'Arafat's policy finds some response, this moderate policy as was manifested in the Fes decisions, then this will be a good congress -- but it will depend on this, you see. I mean, a moderate policy must be judged again and again by the criterion of whether it brings any results, and in my opinion that is the most important aspect.

[Question] One last question: At present, Jordanian King Husayn, who is at the moment a very important person in the current mediation endeavors in the Middle East, is in Vienna. Will you see him while he is in Austria?

[Answer] No, I do not think so. That is too complicated. We do not have any private planes at our disposal, only on very rare occasions, and with regular flights that would be very difficult and would cost 2-3 days.

[Question] Will King Husayn possibly visit you in Majorca?

[Answer] No, no, I would never ask him to do that, and I would not want to ask such a thing.... (voice trails off) Indeed he knows all about 'Arafat's position; there is not much that I could tell him. I myself am curious to hear what he experienced in the United States -- but I am going to hear about that in due course.

WOERNER, SPD'S SCHEER ASSESS ANDROPOV PROPOSALS

LD281248 Hamburg DPA in German 1125 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 28 Dec (DPA) -- Federal Defense Minister Manfred Woerner (CDU) has underlined his view that Andropov's proposals for the Geneva negotiations violate vital German security interests. The Federal Republic is dependent on U.S. nuclear defense. "Neither Great Britain nor France are able or willing to take on this nuclear guarantee for our country," Woerner said on Tuesday.

Moscow's offer to reduce the number of Soviet medium-range weapons in Europe to the number of British and French long-range missiles is aimed at this weak point: intermediate-range missiles belonging to the United States would be excluded from Europe, and the FRG would be exposed to the full threat of the remaining 150-plus Soviet SS-20 missiles. The British and French nuclear weapons could only provide protection for Britain and France as national weapons of emergency in the event of an attack on these countries. Woerner underlined his assessment that the Soviet proposals "do not go far enough." Nevertheless, there is every reason to examine them carefully.

Alois Mertes, minister of state in the Foreign Ministry, speaking on Saarland Radio, said that Andropov's proposal is unacceptable to the West in its present form since it creates a Soviet monopoly over land-based medium-range weapons in Europe. In addition, British and French nuclear weapons could not guarantee the FRG's security. Agreeing to Andropov's proposal would therefore mean "a substantial reduction in the FRG's security as a non-nuclear state." Mertes underlined, however, that the fact that the Soviet Union has abandoned its position of "freezing relations" is a small step in the right direction. With reference to ideas within the SPD about limiting the defense concept to conventional weapons, Mertes said that if there is no question of a nuclear response it would be an "invitation to aggression and blackmail."

In contrast to the Federal Government's view, Hermann Scheer, the SPD disarmament expert, stressed that the British and French missiles are part of the Geneva negotiation package. In his party's press service, he stated on Tuesday that the Soviet Union could not be expected to scale down its medium-range missiles to zero and then still be confronted by the French and British nuclear potential in Europe, which would moreover continue to be built up. Failing to take into account both missiles' potential would amount to "a concealed claim to Western superiority." Scheer admitted that naturally, the question of how these potentials should be taken into consideration still had to be examined in the West.

Former General on Proposals

AU271506 Prague PRACE in Czech 23 Dec 82 p 3

[Interview with former Bundeswehr General Gerd Bastian by PRACE FRG correspondent Frantisek Vonderka: "The USSR's Proposal Is Very Welcome" -- date and place not given]

[Text] The latest Soviet peace proposals submitted by CPSU Central Committee General Secretary Yuriy Andropov on Monday are also welcomed by the peace-loving public in Western Europe. Our correspondent in the FRG spoke with former Bundeswehr General Gerd Bastian about the Soviet proposal pertaining to medium-range missiles.

[Question] Herr General, the USSR has submitted a new proposal for the Geneva Soviet-American negotiations on medium-range weapons in Europe. How do you assess this proposal?

[Answer] I have read about this proposal in our newspapers; if that information is correct then I can only say that I personally welcome the proposal very much. I cannot speak on behalf of the FRG Government or of the governments of other West European states, which have said they intend to carefully study the content of the Soviet proposals and answer them only later. As regards myself, my opinion is that this is a realistic and constructive proposal. It is a step of a quite different character than Reagan's so-called zero option, whose objective is to gain advantages for the United States, and thus no progress could have been achieved in Geneva on the basis of it.

[Question] Do you think that the Soviet proposal constitutes a step forward in Geneva?

[Answer] I am convinced of it. The Soviet Union has taken a great stride forward. In the interest of all European nations, a positive answer from the NATO side should come on this proposal. I fully understand that the USSR -- and this is also contained in its proposal -- wishes that the British and French Eurostrategic nuclear systems, which are zeroed in on Eastern Europe and nowhere else, be included in the Eurostrategic balance sheet. I have always regarded counting on the West's side only the U.S. weapons to be an absolutely unrealistic stance which could not lead to progress in the negotiations.

CSU CHAIRMAN STRAUSS URGES NEW POLICY ON GDR

LD281438 Hamburg DPA in German 1116 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Munich, 28 Dec (DPA) -- CSU Chairman and Bavarian Premier Franz Josef Strauss believes that during the past 10 years of the Basic Treaty the GDR has "not missed a chance of blackmailing the Federal Republic." In the CSU paper BAYERNKURIER, Strauss stressed that the previous "liberal-socialist" policy on intra-German affairs had failed in the aim of improving the situation "of our countrymen in the other part of Germany" and introducing decisive steps toward eliminating the division of Germany.

The political change in Bonn must also mark an end to this unsuccessful policy on intra-German affairs. Strauss declared his support for a "realistic policy on East German and intra-German affairs," which would never give up the aim of overcoming the division through peaceful means and in freedom. However, the communist rulers must be left in no doubt that contractual settlements never mean "acquiesence to injustice or continual acceptance of immoral or inhuman conditions."

BONN REPORTS ARRIVAL STATISTICS FROM THE GDR

DW291008 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1800 GMT 28 Dec 82

[From the "Heute" newscast]

[Text] By the end of November this year, more than 12,000 GDR citizens came to the Federal Republic of Germany. According to information provided by the Federal Interior Ministry 269 GDR citizens fled from the GDR, and 8,500 resettlers were allowed to emigrate with the approval of the GDR authorities. Other GDR citizens were ransomed from imprisonment by the Federal Government and likewise came to the West.

EGYPTIAN PAPER INTERVIEWS OFFICIAL ON MIDEAST

NC281041 Cairo MENA in Arabic 0745 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Cairo, 28 Dec (MENA) -- FRG Minister of State [as received] Juergen Moellemann has affirmed that FRG Chancellor Helmut Kohl's government adheres to the Venice declaration issued by the EEC states.

He said the FRG's foreign policy will not change, and that this applies to the Middle East in particular.

In an exclusive interview with AL-AKHBAR, Moellemann said Germany adheres to and is committed to the Venice declaration in its two parts, namely, that on the Palestinian people's right to self-determination and that on Israel's right to exist. The Venice declaration is the basis of the FRG's policy on the Middle East. He explained that the Venice declaration, the Fes summit resolutions and U.S. President Reagan's initiative represent three different ideological principles. Nevertheless, they all agree on the right of all states in the area to peace and on the need for a peaceful solution rather than a military one. The differences among these initiatives lie in the weight given to the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

In his interview, the FRG minister of state affirmed that his country will do its utmost to evacuate all foreign forces from Lebanon so that the Lebanese people will have the opportunity to restore their full sovereignty over their territories. He indicated that West Germany supports every effort exerted for the evacuation of all foreign forces from Lebanon.

He announced that the FRG Government has expressed its full appreciation to Egypt for its continuing role and responsibilities in the search for a solution to the Middle East's major problem. He described the role played by President Husni Mubarak in the area as constructive. He stated that Germany is interested in eliminating the tension existing between Egypt and the Arab states because Egypt is an important country in the Arab world and the Arab contradictions will unequivocally impede its role in general.

Moellemann has presided over the German-Arab Friendship Society for a number of years now and is described as a friend of the Arabs. He was met with many Arab leaders, including PLO Executive Committee Chairman Yasir 'Arafat.

FIRM TO SUPPLY LARGE-DIAMETER PIPES TO USSR

LD281322 Hamburg DPA in German 1050 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Duisburg, 28 Dec (DPA) -- The Kloeckner Company, Duisburg, has won a new contract from the USSR worth DM250 million to supply 200,000 tons of large-diameter pipes. The contract is to be completed in conjunction with the Bergrohr Combine, Herne. The firm says that the delivery of the pipes will begin in January, and the order will be completed by October.

OFFICIAL PRAISE FOR U.S. FORCES IN FRG CITED

DW291035 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE in German 29 Dec 82 p 10

[Commentary signed Ein: "A Good Word"]

[Text] That was good for our American friends: The chancellor and the federal president thanked the soldiers from overseas for their military presence. In the flood of speeches given at Christmas, this appreciation by the political leaders of our country has been journalistically somewhat neglected. That was not the case, however, in the media of our allies. AFN, the television system of the U.S. Armed Forces, and STARS AND STRIPES, the paper of American soldiers, reported in detail on the appreciation uttered by Carstens as well as Kohl with regard to the U.S. forces. It was also noted with satisfaction that the German politicians didn't forget to voice respect for those families maintaining their sympathy for the host country despite terrorist action. Much can be achieved by a good word, particularly if addressed to a community which has not been spoiled by over-friendliness in the past years.

LATE REPORT: GENSCHER ON EC POLICY TASKS

DW291121 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 1715 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Interview with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher by reporter Gaertner, place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] What will be the main points of work in this difficult time?

[Answer] It must be the main task not only of national governments, but of the Community to effectively combat unemployment. In this regard, we want special attention to be given to combating unemployment among the youth. This is a problem pertaining to the expectations of young people in regard to a free Community which, if they remain unfulfilled, must have long-term effects on the relationship between the young and our liberal order. Therefore, we will give special priority to combating unemployment among the young.

In addition, the financial problems of the Community must be solved; you can almost call it a problem of a state of finances. I attribute special importance to the smooth continuation of negotiations on the integration of Spain and Portugal. These two democracies have a claim that their expectations and the agreements they obtained will be fulfilled. We don't want the impression to be created in Spain that the Spaniards are welcome as an ally contributing to the common security but that we see problems the moment economic questions come up.

[Question] On the table of the Community is a draft of a European act linked with your name. The essence of this draft seems to me to have been watered down in the current discussions. Do you think that progress will be achieved for the Community in the end?

[Answer] Unfortunately, you are not quite incorrect in saying that the essence of the draft has been watered down. I will not give my name to a continuation of this process. On the contrary, I believe that we will be entering a phase now where every member state must admit whether it will stick with the great idea voiced by everybody, namely, the development of the Community into a European union. This cannot be achieved by watering down the European act beyond recognition; rather, it must be streamlined to make its contents visible.

SKDL OPPOSES ARMS BUDGET; MAY RESIGN GOVERNMENT

LD291058 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1030 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] The resignation of the Finnish People's Democratic League [SKDL] from Premier Kalevi Sorsa's four-party government is becoming a certainty. The SKDL Diet group voted this morning for its statement opposing the arms purchases of the defense forces in the Diet's budget ballots. This is considered to mean the departure of the SKDL from the government, as Premier Sorsa made the budget ballots into a question of confidence in the government yesterday. The practical procedures in the government crisis will become clear during the afternoon. So far it is still open whether the entire government will submit its resignation or whether only the SKDL ministers will resign. SKDL Chairman Kalevi Kivisto had a discussion on the government situation with President Mauno Koivisto this morning.

The government crisis was sealed by the SKDL Diet group, which met this morning and announced that it will adhere to its opposition to the arms purchases. In the discussion held by the group, Chairman Kivisto made a strong appeal for a continuation of government cooperation. Kivisto and his supporters were in a clear minority, however, and formally the group decision was unanimous.

The government situation was discussed by the Social Democratic Party Diet group this morning. The group noted that the SKDL is driving itself out of the government.

[AZ editor Eva Pfisterer exclusive interview with Swedish Prime Minister Olof Palme in Stockholm -- date not specified]

[Excerpt] AZ: What can you tell us about the deployment of Pershing II and cruise missiles in Europe? And what is the peace movement's meaning for, and influence on, the policy of the big powers?

Palme: The deployment would increase tension in Europe as well as the danger of war. As for the peace movement, all I can say is that at long last it has given the big powers a good fright. Now even the politicians have become worried.

AZ: Do you also believe that the peace movement followers are "useful idiots" for Moscow?

Palme: That is what one is constantly attempting to make people believe, but neither were there 300,000 useful idiots at the peace march in Bonn, nor in Central Park, where 1 million were marching.

AZ: The Palme Commission has now submitted the proposal to the United Nations to establish a zone free of nuclear weapons across Europe all the way down to the Mediterranean. What was the reaction?

Palme: Highly positive. Gradually there is hope for better understanding. People are realizing that the arms race does not lead to more security, but to certain death.

GREEK ATTEMPTS TO RESTRICT SEA ROUTES DENOUNCED

TA281615 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1604 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Ankara, Dec 28 (AA) -- The attempt by Greece to exclude some of the routes linking the Aegean to the Mediterranean from free transit passage is "arbitrary" and "in violation of the rules of international law and maritime law conventions."

Commenting on the Greek attempt to include the waterways between the Aegean Islands under the exceptions to the freedom of navigation through all straits, Akiman said the regulations on straits open to international navigation and the rights and functions of the coastal state were expressed in maritime law conventions. All waterways aside from the limited number of exceptions such as the Turkish Straits were subject to rules of free transit passage, he added.

In fact, the Foreign Ministry spokesman explained, in a declaration issued at the end of the sea law conference, Greece had tried to create a new category of waterway which it described as so-called "alternate straits" between islands forming an archipelago, and in this way to close some of the Aegean waterways leading to the Mediterranean to free transit passage. Greece's behavior was entirely arbitrary, and was not valid under the conference on the law of the sea or under international law.

During the recent conference on the law of the sea, Greece had unsuccessfully attempted, Akiman reminded, to extend the rules to be applied to states consisting entirely of an archipelago to the islands of mainland states. Now it was trying to go beyond the provisions of the convention, he added.

PAKISTANI FINANCE MINISTER VISITS COUNTERPART

TA281644 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Text] Pakistan's minister of finance, commerce, planning and provincial cooperation, Ghulam Ishaq Khan, who is in Ankara, is continuing his contacts. He visited Finance Minister Adnan Baser Kafaoglu this morning and conferred with him for some time. The visiting minister expressed the belief that the economic relations between the two countries would further develop as a result of the meetings being held in Ankara by the joint Turkish-Pakistan economic committee. Ghulam Ishaq Khan visited Commerce Minister Kemal Canturk this afternoon.

This morning he visited Energy and Natural Resources Minister Fahir Ilkel. The energy minister briefed Ishaq Khan on Turkey's energy resources and other related issues. In turn, the Pakistani minister explained his country's situation on this subject. Later, Ishaq Khan visited Industry and Technology Minister Mehmet Turgut for talks. Meanwhile, the Turkish-Pakistani joint economic committee is continuing its work in Ankara.

OUR RADIO VIEWS PRESIDENT'S FAR EAST TOUR

TA281457 (Clandestine) Our Radio in Turkish to Turkey 0600 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Station commentary: "General Evren's Far East Tour"]

[Text] Dear listeners, head of the military junta General Evren's Far East tour has been concluded. In every country he visited during his tour, General Evren talked about establishing good relations between Turkey and all countries that respect its independence and do not interfere in its internal affairs.

Dear listeners, undoubtedly establishing good relations with all countries based on equality and mutual benefit is a very constructive goal. However, let us take a look to what General Evren said in every country he visited: statements that grossly interfere in the internal affairs of the Democratic Republic of Afghanistan and Kampuchea and which cast a shadow on the legitimacy of the Afghan and Kampuchean Governments. Has not Evren himself, by making such statements, been the one to violate the very principle of noninterference in the internal affairs of others which he professed in his various statements?

In his statements, Evren talked about establishing good relations with all countries that respect Turkey's independence and which do not interfere in its internal affairs. However, he does not mention the country which (?settled) on our borders through its military bases, its missiles and its exactly 5,200 Yankee troops. Neither does he utter the name of the country which not only interferes in our internal affairs, but has for years trampled upon our independence. The U.S. imperialists have not only interfered with our domestic affairs but also have [words indistinct]. What will be left of our country's independence after our armed forces have been submitted to NATO command and the strings of our national economy have been handed over to the IMF? How can General Evren, who has allowed the trampling of the independence of his country by the imperialists -- first and foremost by the U.S. imperialists -- through NATO, the IMF and the stationing of the RDF, speak about respect for independence. Is not this junta and the head of the junta General Evren who have allowed the trampling upon our independence, blindly following U.S. and Reagan policies.

During his Far East tour, Evren spoke about close cooperation with Indonesia on the subject of terrorism, recalling that in 1965 Indonesia experienced worse violent incidents than Turkey did. Evren wants to cooperate with General Suharto, the executioner who overthrew the legal Sukarno rule with the CIA's assistance and butchered 1.5 million patriots. There is nothing left to say in the fact of this situation, dear listeners.

In his statements, Evren highly praised the despotic administrations in the ROK and Indonesia. However, both these countries bestially violate human rights and do not maintain a semblance of democracy. They are both militarist and police states. These are the regimes Evren finds worth praising. The proverb about people always meeting those like themselves seems appropriate here. Even Metin Toker, in his article in the Istanbul MILLIYET in which he flatters Evren for his Far East tour, has to mention the lack of democracy in Indonesia, the murder of the generals in the ROK and an overwhelming referendum in Bangladesh.

In Seoul, Evren talked about his service in the Turkish brigade in Korea 25 years ago and the assistance provided by Turkey to that country. He preferred to keep quiet about the fate of thousands of Turkish soldiers martyred in Korea by orders of the United States and with the consent of the Turkish leaders of the time -- Bayar and Menderes. Evren tries to conceal the fact that Korea was divided into two as a result of the imperialist aggression some 30 years ago and that since then South Korea has been ruled by a U.S. puppet antipeople regime. On the contrary, he praises the South Korean regime which has prosecuted opposition (?members) and murdered thousands of patriots in a barbaric way.

ECONOMIC PROGRAM FOR 1983 PUBLISHED IN GAZETTE

TA291125 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] The 1983 economic program has been published. The program envisages a growth of 4.8 percent in GNP, lowering the inflation rate to 20 percent and bringing exports up to $7.1 billion. According to the new economic program published in today's Official Gazette, measures will continue to ensure stable economic development, to bridge the payment deficits gap and to increase economic efficiency. Next year increasing exports will still be the most urgent goal to achieve, and the same conditions as those of last year will be provided in order to realize this. Efforts to further liberalize both imports and exports will continue in 1983, and preparations in connection with the establishment of free trade regions will be finalized.

The program also envisages new arrangements in the banking field in order to provide banks with the possibility of coping with changing economic conditions and for more financial means for commercial firms. The program states that in 1983, measures will be taken to solve the housing problem and particular efforts will be made in the fields of agriculture, energy, mining, transportation and communications.

The program, which also includes an evaluation of the 1982 economic situation, says that inflation is expected to reach 25 percent and exports to reach $6 billion at the end of the year.

HEROIN DEATH RESULTS IN 35 ARRESTS IN ISTANBUL

NC290934 Istanbul GUNES in Turkish 23 Dec 82 pp 1, 8

[From the news center]

[Excerpt] New clues were obtained when Kastelli's stepson Hankan Bahadir died of heroin in Istanbul and when famous fashion designer Halil Kadirbeyoglu was caught using heroin. The persons who sold the heroin to Bahadir and Kadirbeyoglu have been identified. The police engaged in "heroin operations" in Istanbul have detained 35 persons. The well known fashion designer and model Kadirbeyoglu, who was detained in Ankara some time ago by the narcotics branch, was released by the prosecutor's office. In his statement to the prosecutor, Halil Kadirbeyoglu, the son of a well-known Istanbul businessman, Gurbuz Kadirbeyoglu, argued that he was not a "seller" but a "user." He was released on the grounds that he needed treatment.

In his statement, Kadirbeyoglu talked about Sinan Kilic, a friend of his, who has been poisoning Istanbul youths by providing the market with narcotics. The Ankara narcotics branch communicated the matter to the Istanbul narcotics branch. Investigations revealed that Sinan Kilic was a heroin addict receiving treatment at a clinic, the name of which is being kept secret.

Police Raids, Arrests

NC291058 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 25 Dec 82 p 8

[Report by Savas Ay]

[Excerpts] We have closely watched an operation conducted by teams of the directorate of the narcotics branch. We have become acquainted with the "common smokers," "pleasure-seeking smokers," "thieves," "look-out men," "street peddlers" and the "general distributors" and have witnessed how a handful of policemen campaign day and night against this malady corroding the society internally, and how they managed to seize 17 kilograms of hashish, high-grade heroin and various other types of narcotics.

Acting on special information, the police raided the house of Sevket Ulumbey at Cerrahpasa, who was discovered to be the general distributor in the Aksaray, Fatih, Zeytinburnu, K.M. Pasa, Topkapi and Bakirkoy quarters of Istanbul. Our guess that a man who undertakes the general distribution of narcotics over such a vast area would be fairly prosperous was futile. Sevket Ulumbey, whose nickname is "Artist," lives in a shanty with his wife and children. He was not difficult with the policemen who carried out the raid on his house. He immediately handed over the hashish he had placed in his socks, pajamas, pillow cases and backgammon case. He then told the policemen, "I have been a salesman for the past 23 years. I have always worked with the Kasimpasa group. Once a week I go and collect bags full of hashish hidden among the litter and distribute them, sometimes myself and sometimes through others. I call at the same litter house and hide money there."

As the investigation progressed, general distributor Artist Sevket disclosed names and addresses. This information was then passed on to the other members of the narcotics branch and a series of operations was launched. The teams, which carried out nonstop operations until morning, discovered another "big hiding place," Zula at Acisu Avenue at Besiktas. In a raid on the Idial apartment house, Sukru Eymel and Cumhur Alt were arrested. When the place was searched, policemen discovered 12 kilos of hashish in bags ready to be distributed in the Kasimpasa and Tophane areas in the eastern parts of the city.

The information, given by two men caught with 12 kilos of hashish, led to the discovery of other hashish nests. In the raids that followed in various areas, a total of 5 kilos of hashish was seized in the houses of Mehmet Ustparmak, Mustafa Dogruok, Emine Tuzel, Vedat Esin and Suleyman Guzel, all principal narcotics sellers.

The narcotics branch officials have said that "such operations would continue nonstop," and added that "they would fearlessly conduct the campaign against this malady, which has engulfed the nation like cancer."

While teams of the narcotics police branch are continuing their searches in various parts of Turkey, a network of 26 persons was caught in Izmir the other day. These persons were found in possession of 10 kilos of hashish worth 5 million liras.

70,000 Drug Users in Istanbul

NC290836 Istanbul GUNAYDIN in Turkish 24 Dec 82 pp 1, 4

[Excerpt] The heroin incident that resulted in the death of Kastelli's stepson Hakan Bahadir revealed that about 70,000 persons use drugs in Istanbul. This information, which we have obtained from Yildirim Aktuna, chief medical officer of the Bakirkoy mental hospital, has been confirmed by the narcotics police branch and helped us to verify this figure.

According to Yildirim Aktuna, chief medical officer of Bakirkoy mental hospital, "the fact that heroin addiction is rapidly spreading, particularly among children of prosperous families -- despite heavy punishment for sellers and users -- is due to social development and socio-economic changes and developments. Drug addiction, which has become a contemporary malady both in the United States and in European countries in the past 10 years, is now dangerously knocking at our door. This heroin addiction, which we have imported from Europe, is assuming extremely dangerous dimensions."

Why is it spreading in Turkey also, why is it becoming increasingly difficult to prevent this addiction? According to the narcotics branch authorities, the answer to these questions lies the failure of families to take appropriate measures.

12 KURDISH SEPARATISTS CAPTURED IN KARS

TA281642 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Statement by the Army IX Corps and Erzurum, Agri, Kars and Artvin Martial Law Command Press and Public Relations Department; date not given -- read by announcer]

[Text] In a series of operations conducted by the martial law security forces in Kars Province during the past few days, 12 members of the illegal Kordestan Workers Party [PKK] organization, including three high-ranking officials, were apprehended. During their interrogation, the militants admitted that prior to 12 September 1980, they organized seminars and propaganda in Kars and its districts on behalf of the organization, collected money, fired shots at residences and offices, threw explosives, carried out robberies and, because of his opposing views, wounded Selahattin Ozagdas in December 1979. Ozagdas subsequently died of his wounds.

During the operation, the security forces found 1 rifle, 8 pistols, 264 rounds of ammunition and numerous banned publications. Legal steps are being taken against the suspects.

EANES COMMUNIQUE ON NOMINATION PROCEDURES

LD282200 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2100 GMT 28 Dec 82

[Communique issued on 28 December by the office of the president]

[Text] Following its first revision, the Constitution of the republic modifies the rules that govern the nomination of a prime minister. It states that a prime minister is nominated by the president of the republic after hearing the views of the parliamentary parties in the order of their strength in the Assembly of the Republic.

The president of the republic conveyed to the parliamentary parties' delegations his conviction that it is necessary to find a solution that is both immediate and capable of resolving the present political crisis.

In these circumstances, the president of the republic considers that he will decide to nominate a new prime minister or to dissolve the Assembly of the Republic only after appraising the solidity of the proposal to be put forward by the Democratic Alliance.

TWO CIVIL GUARDS KILLED NEAR FRENCH BORDER

NC290847 Paris AFP in English 0842 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] Irun, Northern Spain, Dec 29 (AFP) -- Two civil guards were killed early today in a burst of submachine gun fire in the train station in Irun on the French border, police sources said.

First reports said two youths opened fire on the guards, assigned to the Customs Office. One man, aged 40, was killed instantly while the second, 22, died shortly after being taken to hospital. Witnesses said the incident provoked a panic among travellers who had just arrived by train from France.

It was the second fatal attack in the Spanish Basque country since the Spanish Socialist Party came to power early this month. A civil guard was killed and another seriously injured in Tolosa on December 12. Forty-five persons have now died this year in terrorist incidents in Spain.

LACINA ON RELATIONS WITH U.S., WASHINGTON TALKS

AU291044 Vienna ARBEITER-ZEITUNG in German 29 Dec 82 p 2

[Excerpts] Vienna (SK) -- Economic relations between Austria and the United States have essentially improved during the past few years, contrary to the claims of the Austrian People's Party [OeVP]. This was stated on Tuesday by State Secretary Lacina.

Lacina: "In 1981, our exports [to the United States] went up by nearly one third, and in the first 10 months of 1982 Austrian exports were about 28 percent higher than a year ago." Investment activity [of U.S. companies] in Austria has also increased, as is shown by the biggest industrial investment project of the past few years, General Motors, and the electronic joint venture of the Voest-Alpine and Ami.

In the political field, Austria's policy is meeting with great understanding in the United States. Thus, Austria's role in the refugee sector is highly appreciated, and also its Middle East policy has met with increasing recognition, which is clearly indicated by the U.S. President's letter to Chancellor Kreisky.

In Austria itself, however, in the pre-campaign climate, the OeVP is more and more steering the course of renouncing the joint foreign policy, even at the expense of harming Austrian economic interests, which might lead to jeopardizing jobs in Austria.

Lacina added: "However, the friendly and pleasant atmosphere of the talks I held last week in Washington has shown that the OeVP obstructionism has made hardly any impression to date in the United States."

KREISKY COMMENTS ON 'MODERATE' 'ARAFAT POLICY

[Kurt Seinitz report on NEUE KRONEN-ZEITUNG telephone interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Palma de Majorca on 28 December on Kreisky's 27 Dec meeting with PLO leader 'Arafat and related issues]

[Excerpt] Kreisky on his meeting with 'Arafat: "The PLO chief has maintained an astonishingly moderate and realistic course in the past few weeks. What is important now is whether this moderate policy finds a certain recognition, especially in the United States. If the West continues to cold-shoulder 'Arafat, the PLO chief will find it difficult to assert his policy within his organization. Recently, 'Arafat has made a few statements which actually can no longer be ignored. He has paid tribute not only to the Israeli peace movement, but also to Israeli President Navon. Thus, Israel really should not find it difficult to get into political contact with the PLO, but the current government...."

KREISKY WANTS U.S. AID ON NUCLEAR WASTE DISPOSAL

[Hans Werner Scheidl report on telephone interview with Chancellor Kreisky in Palma de Majorca on 29 December 1982]

[Excerpts] Vienna/Palma de Majorca -- On Wednesday, Chancellor Kriesky for the first time indicated the possibility that, in order to forestall the Soviets, America might take charge of European nuclear waste disposal. A clarification of this question could be attempted during the forthcoming visit of the Austrian Government chief to Washington. "And when that has been clarified, then the time will certainly have come for a new referendum [about putting the mothballed Zwentendorf nuclear powerplant in lower Austria into operation], Kreisky declared in a DIE PRESSE telephone interview from Majorca.

Thus Kreisky commented on the latest unexpected demand of Christian Union leader Gassner, who had called for a new referendum on Zwentendorf even if the problem of nuclear waste disposal continued unresolved. Kreisky: "It is not at all certain that this problem will not be resolved shortly. First, there are further developments in the technological sector and, second, in the political field." The chancellor, who is taking a vacation in Majorca, thinks that there might soon be a change in the Soviet Union's attitude regarding this question ("because everything is changing there at present") so that the United States, too, would have to change its position," the more so as President Reagan, as distinct from President Carter, holds a much more positive attitude toward nuclear energy." It is true, he said, that there is still a negative attitude in the U.S. congressional bodies, "but the Americans cannot maintain their line if the Soviets change theirs. This is my opinion." After all, the Reagan administration knows that the question of nuclear waste disposal "is of eminent importance for the West European economy."

Kreisky will probably also discuss this question with Reagan during his forthcoming visit to Washington. "For, the nuclear waste disposal issue might well lead to similar complications between Europe and America as the natural gas issue. One cannot demand of the Europeans greater self-sufficiency regarding energy supply -- also vis-a-vis the Soviet Union -- unless one offers them alternatives. I cannot imagine that the Americans will pursue a merely defensive policy, but must make certain concessions to the Europeans.

Thus the question of nuclear waste disposal is by no means a hopeless one, Kreisky said, and added: "and when this question can be resolved, then the time will certainly have come for a referendum. It is necessary to give the Austrians a clear-cut answer." The question of the dangers of a nuclear powerplant also needs to be reconsidered, Kreisky said. "Actually, the dangers will soon have increased 18-fold -- because soon 18 nuclear powerplants will be in operation just outside our country." Hence, everything has changed, and "therefore it is necessary to adopt a new position and to ask the Austria people what they want."

In the interview, Kreisky also stressed that he had studied the reports following the Harrisburg reactor accident. There is a completely new study which "proves that a nuclear powerplant can be brought under control even in the event of an extreme accident," he said.

REPORT ON CHANCELLOR KOHL'S NEW YEAR ADDRESS

LD301130 Hamburg DPA in German 1020 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA) -- According to Federal Chancellor Helmut Kohl, 1983 will be a year "of political and economic challenge." "The Federal Government has accepted this challenge," Kohl said in his New Year address broadcast on radio and television. He drew attention to the fact that many fellow-citizens are concerned about their jobs and about peace and are worried about their future. "Your concerns are my concerns, too. We want to and can overcome these problems," the chancellor said.

Kohl, who said his main concern is the more than 300,000 unemployed young people, stressed that revival of the economy will require time and sacrifice by everyone. "We must tread together" the road toward improving the economy, toward more freedom of decision for our citizens, and hence less state control. The government alone cannot lead the way out of the crisis. The chancellor said that the halt in price increases, falling interest rates and the revival of the construction industry are signs of a new upsurge. Kohl said "our industry is investing again."

With regard to foreign policy, the chancellor gave priority to German-French friendship, which has become part of daily life. "In January, we shall celebrate with gratitude and pride the 20th anniversary of the friendship treaty signed by Konrad Adenauer and Charles de Gaulle." Referring to his visit to Washington soon after assuming office Kohl stressed that German-U.S. friendship has been consolidated again after one or two upsets over the past few years. He named as the most important goal of Bonn's foreign policy the safeguarding of peace in freedom. With regard to the planned visit to Bonn by Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko on 16 January, the chancellor said: "We will have to discuss Soviet advance arming and use every opportunity for real and controlled disarmament."

The chancellor, who drew attention to the continuing violations of human rights in many parts of the world, expressed his concern at the situation in Poland and the war in Afghanistan. With regard to intra-German relations, he said it remains a commitment of our Constitution to preserve the nation's unity and to overcome the division of our fatherland. The Federal Government will make every effort to make the consequences of the division more tolerable for the people. Anyone who improves family and friendly relations with compatriots in the GDR is a "German patriot, is a messenger of peace." This helps to reduce distrust and to create trust -- "this is a service to peace."

Kohl also drew attention to the fact that 1983 will be the 50th anniversary of the National-Socialists seizing power. This will recall an epoch of our history "which brought suffering and injustice to our people and to the world." Referring to the 30th anniversary, on 17 June 1983, of the people's uprising in East Berlin, the chancellor said that at that time the Germans in East Berlin and the GDR had proved that tanks cannot stifle the will for freedom. According to Kohl, 1983 will also see the celebration of the 500th birthday of Martin Luther, whose spirit and language are a "common heritage and a binding bond."

In a New Year's message aimed primarily at Germans living abroad, transmitted by DEUTSCHE WELLE, Kohl said the cultivation of friendship and cooperation with our partners and allies in the world is more important today then ever before.

It is important to preserve peace and freedom in Europe and to make our contribution toward ensuring that peace and freedom in the world gets a better chance. The European Community, the presidency of which will be taken by the FRG on 1 January, was described by Kohl as a community of peace and an example to others. The United States is the primary and most important partner outside Europe. According to Kohl, Bonn's policy for peace also includes, however, dialogue and cooperation with the Soviet Union and the Eastern European countries. With regard to the disarmament negotiations, the chancellor said that in view of the great destructive power of nuclear weapons, it is a moral duty to use every opportunity for true disarmament. New missiles will have to be sited in the Federal Republic, however, if Moscow does not dismantle its missiles.

MERTES ON ANDROPOV PROPOSALS, BONN REACTION

DW301115 Mainz ADF Television Network in German 1915 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Interview with Alois Mertes, minister of state in the Foreign Ministry, by moderator Gerhard Loewenthal in the programm ZDF Magazine in Bonn -- live]

[Excerpts] [Question] SPD faction Deputy Chairman Horst Ehmke terms Bonn's reaction to Andropov's proposals as wrong and dangerous because the Federal Government joined the American veto line after just a short examination. What do you say to these accusations?

[Answer] These accusations are unjustified. The reaction of the Federal Government is correct. It is appropriate and it does justice to the possibly positive elements of General Secretary Andropov's proposal. What Andropov has publicly outlined generally repeats a more accurate proposal made by the Soviet Union at the Geneva disarmament negotiations in mid-November, so that the West has had an opportunity since then to examine the new Soviet consideration. It is absolutely natural that all proposals of the Soviet Union are being carefully examined.

When Andropov outlined these proposals to a broad public in Moscow, the Federal Government and the Western allies were in a good position to quickly realize what could possibly be a step in the right direction, as well as what would be unacceptable for us. The judgement of colleague Ehmke is therefore incorrect. The position of the Federal Government is absolutely identical with the standpoint of the Schmidt/Genscher government on this matter.

SPD'S VOIGT CRITICIZES U.S. APPROACH IN GENEVA

DW301035 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany 0618 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Interview with SPD foreign and security policy spokesman Karsten Voigt by reporter Lenz, place not given -- recorded]

[Excerpts] [Question] The Social Democrats in the Federal Republic reached their final decision on deployment [of medium-range missiles], stating that it depends on serious negotiations on both sides, Washington and Moscow, in Geneva with the intention of achieving a fair agreement. The reminder to hold serious negotiations is logically not addressed exclusively to Washington, because if Moscow will not negotiate seriously, the dual decision will automatically go into effect. Should the Geneva negotiations fail because of Moscow, counterarmament will take place; should the Geneva negotiations fail because of Washington, counterarmament will be rejected. Is this a correct description of your position?

[Answer] It is correctly described that we will try to avoid counterarmament through negotiations. We thereby want to avoid deployment if possible.

In order to achieve this, we deem it necessary that the Soviet Union eliminate a considerable part of its stock of medium-range weapons. However, we are also of the opinion that the Americans must not stop at their current position. In order to give them an incentive to move, we say: If you will not move it is possible that we will refuse to agree to deployment. This is why we reject automatic deployment. We want to reach a political decision first, which we Social Democrats will make at our party congress in the fall of 1983.

[Question] How do you plan to find out whether the Americans are negotiating seriously or not or whether they will move, as you just formulated it?

[Answer] We rely on the agreement of the current Federal Government that it will inform us just as we informed the former opposition. Naturally, we hope that we will represent the government next fall ourselves. In such a case, it will be simpler anyway, but both sides -- the United States and the Soviets -- agreed to inform us on the state of negotiations. Therefore, there will be no difficulties in obtaining information on the state of negotiations. However, it will be difficult to assess how the negotiations are being handled by the countries involved.

An American approach would be unacceptable if it adhered to the current starting position regarding Reagan's definition of a zero option. We welcomed it as a starting point of the negotiations, but if you remain at that position you will not advance. In such a case, negotiations will not have been taken seriously by the United States. The Soviet Union has moved through Andropov's proposal. According to our opinion, it has not moved sufficiently though. I do not believe that the Soviet Union expects its proposal to be accepted just like that. Additional probing is necessary there; more must be achieved. I deem that possible.

It would be completely unsatisfactory, however, to simply reject the Soviet proposal or merely term it a trick. There is some movement involved. Here are chances which must be explored. It is now up to the American side to make a move. It must also move.

For the German side it is not sufficient to repeat and praise Reagan's starting points like a prayer wheel. The German side must bring active influence to bear on both negotiating parties -- as Chancellor Schmidt did, which made them go to the Geneva negotiation table, -- in this case particularly on the U.S. alliance partner to make a move in the negotiations. We do not want the confrontation between the two big powers to be fought on the backs of us Germans and Europeans. We want the zero option to be seriously pursued. We want no deployment in our country if possible.

DC SECRETARY'S REMARKS UPSET SMALL LAIC PARTIES

AU291545 Rome ANSA in English 1520 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) Rome, December 29 -- The polemic between Christian Democrat Party Secretary Ciriaco de Mita and the small centrist parties with which the Christian Democrats often form government coalitions continued to hold the attention of political analysts in the Italian dailies this morning. The polemic broke out when De Mita told the weekly, IL MONDO, that there were no other political forces in Italy, apart from the Christian Democrats and the Communists, which could act as an "alternative reference for a democratic majority."

The Communists, the major force on the opposition benches, rank second, just behind the Christian Democrats. The protests came from the small Social Democrat, Liberal, and Republican Parties, the first two of which are in the ruling coalition led by former Senate Speaker Amintore Fanfani.

In a letter to the editor-in-chief of the Milan daily, IL GIORNALE NUOVO, today, De Mita said that the two major parties are "destined to exclude each other mutually from power," but they may be able to "build new rules and new equilibria of liberty." In effect, reading between the lines, De Mita was taken to be denying that his party secretly nourishes the desire for an alliance with the Communists on the lines of a great coalition.

According to the reading offered by the Turin daily, LE STAMPA, De Mita is replying to criticisms from the other government partners by saying that he does not believe the smaller non-Christian Democrat parties, including the Socialists, can ever band together to form a "laic pole" capable of offering an alternative to both the Christian Democrats and the Communists.

According to LA STAMPA, De Mita is in fact reiterating his political vision in which the two major parties offer the only real alternative, (?and) "irritated the laic parties."

The Rome daily, PAESE SERA, said that De Mita's "discourtesy" was "too brutal" for the laic parties to let it by without comment. According to this daily, the Social Democrats and Liberals are now "dramatizing" things and charging De Mita with aggravating the government's difficulties with the aim of forcing early elections. As for the Socialists, PAESE SERA said, they have replied to De Mita's "scornful attitude in the same coin, "but they are also careful not to mix it up with the Fanfani government's survival, "apparently because they want to keep it alive for a couple of months."

The Socialist daily, AVANTI made no official editorial comment, but published a heavy-handed remark from the party's lower house whip Silvano Labriola. Labriola accused De Mita of "launching signals already outdated by Italian society, which has gone a long way ahead, dissolving the theory of the two poles, which is outside the deployment of the West European states." Labriola added that, if De Mita's interview is the preamble to an election campaign, "it promises his party a considerable isolation and will make it a centre for the collection of only conservative votes, which are a complete minority in Italy today."

ARMS DEALERS ARRESTED; BULGARIAN SINGER PRESENT

AU300830 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 22 Dec 82

[Text] (ANSA) -- Milan, December 30 -- A Milan lawyer and his brother were arrested Wednesday as part of a probe into arms trafficking to the Middle East and above all to Iran. The names of the two men were not released. It was known only that the lawyer was arrested in Padua in the company of a Bulgarian singer.

The two brothers were said to be involved in the trafficking of Russian-made machine guns and Leopard tanks. The case is said not to be linked with the arms and drugs ring run by Henri Harsan of Syria.

MAFIA DEATHS SAID TO BE OVER NARCOTICS TRADE

NC291302 Paris AFP in English 1249 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] Palermo, Sicily, Dec 29 (AFP) -- Vincenzo Buscetta, the 64-year-old brother of a suspected mafia chief, and his son, Benedetto, 42, were shot and killed here early today, police sources said. The double assassination brings to nine the number of deaths attributed to the mafia here in the past three days, and to 150 the number killed this year.

Mr. Buscetta, the owner of a bathroom fixture business, was the brother of Tomaso Buscetta, whom police consider to be a principal mafia leader and a key Sicilian drug smuggler. Investigators theorized that the recent upsurge in mafia violence could be linked to Tomaso Buscetta's return to Palermo after a two-year absence. Besides today's murders, three other persons killed since Sunday have belonged to his family.

Police said the stake in the apparent war between various mafia families here was the lucrative narcotics trade, which has an estimated annual value of around $570 million.

PSD NATIONAL COUNCIL ENDORSES CRESPO NOMINATION

LD300222 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0100 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Excerpt] The National Council of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] has just endorsed the nomination of Vitor Crespo for prime minister. The nomination will now be submitted to the president of the republic. Here is a report by Teresa de Sousa: The nomination of Vitor Crespo was endorsed about 1/2 hour ago by a vote of 46-0, with 5 abstentions. Immediately after, the PSD National Council ended its proceedings.

Democratic Alliance Postpones Summit

LD301046 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1000 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] A summit meeting of the Democratic Alliance coalition, scheduled for today to discuss the nomination of the alliance's candidate to succeed Pinto Balsemao as prime minister, has been postponed because a meeting of the Social Democratic National Council was adjourned until this evening without reaching a decision on whether to support Vitor Crespo as the Social Democratic Party candidate to lead the next Democratic Alliance government.

CDS National Council To Examine Nomination

LD301010 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0700 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] The National Council of the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS], which was in session until the early hours of this morning, adjourned its meeting without reaching any decision whether or not the CDS should support Professor Vitor Crespo as the Social Democratic Party's [PSD] chosen candidate for prime minister of the ninth constitutional government.

Meanwhile, the Centrists expressed their solidarity with Professor Freitas do Amaral, who tendered his resignation from the party chairmanship in a letter read at last night's meeting.

The CDS National Council, whose adjourned meeting is to resume this evening, decided that the party's now vacant chairmanship should not be filled until its February congress in Oporto.

Further on CDS National Council

[Dulce Varela report from Social Democratic Center Party, CDS, headquarters]

[Excerpt] The meeting of the CDS National Council has already ended but it will meet again tomorrow evening [as heard] in order to examine the question of the designation by the Social Democratic Party [PSD] National Council of Vitor Crespo for the post of prime minister.

The National Council decided that the CDS Executive Committee will be chaired by Basilio Horta until the next congress. The National Council also decided that the post of Professor Freitas do Amaral would not be filled. Tomorrow, as we said, the National Council will examine the designation of Vitor Crespo.

CDS PARTY CHAIRMAN FREITAS DO AMARAL RESIGNS

LD300218 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 0000 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Report by Lurdes Varela]

[Text] Freitas do Amaral resigned tonight as chairman of the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] and from all other posts he held by virtue of his position as party chairman.

Stressing that his decision was not taken against the CDS -- I belong to the CDS and will not give up being a CDS member, he stated in the document he read before the CDS National Council -- Freitas do Amaral explained the reasons for his resignation:

First, he says, because the tone of the deep reflection that the 12 December local government election results called for -- something indispensable and urgent -- did not take place. Instead, the course taken was geared toward choosing people before principles, strategies and criteria were defined.

Freitas do Amaral feels that the question is not of the individual chosen but rather of the intrinsic value of the decision taken and the objective lack of the necessary and sufficient conditions that are now more indispensable than ever.

On the other hand, Freitas do Amaral adds, the difficulties of coordination and harmonization among the Democratic Alliance [AD] component parties are greater and greater, and the differences of analysis or different interpretations of the joint program drafted in 1979 are increasingly wider. At heart, Freitas do Amaral says, the present AD is not the same as it used to be: It is another version, also possible and legitimate, but very different from the one I helped set up.

Freitas do Amaral later says: One might say that the best solution would then be that I, Freitas do Amaral, as CDS chairman, propose to you here tonight that we should reject the choice made by the majority party in the coalition. However, such an action does not seem to me to be correct either. The AD survived the tragic death of Sa Carneiro; therefore, can and must survive the replacement of the chairman of the CDS.

Freitas do Amaral feels that the recourse to early legislative elections at this time is no solution either because no solid and coherent majority would emerge from a general election. Abstentions would rise substantially, and the democratic parties would probably be weakened.

Finally, Freitas do Amaral's written statement says that he feels in his conscience, for moral and political reasons, that he should not support solutions in which he, deep down, does not believe. He then called on all CDS members and leading figures to remain at their posts in defense of their ideals.

The CDS National Council remains in session, now without Freitas do Amaral, and will decide first of all who is going to replace him. This was said to journalists by Rui Pena, who stressed that first the National Council is going to solve the CDS problems arising from Freitas do Amaral's decision. Concerning the country's problems, they can wait another 24 hours.

COMMUNIQUE ON FIRST COUNCIL OF STATE MEETING

LD300100 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 1900 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] After a long wait following the end of the meeting of the Council of State, a communique was read to the media at 1905 by Joaquim Letria, spokesman for the presidency of the republic.

[Begin Letria recording] In view of the fact that the Council of State held its first meeting today, the president of the republic saw fit to release the following communique:

The Council of State is a political advisory body to the president of the republic, set up in accordance with the 1st constitutional revision law. Its duties include passing judgement on the dissolution of both the Assembly of the Republic and the bodies in the autonomous regions; on the dismisal of the governments -- in the specific case envisaged in Article 198 clause 2 -- and on the appointment and dismissal of the ministers of the republic for the autonomous regions. It is also the council's job to advise the president of the republic on the performance of his duties, whenever the latter asks for such advice.

The first meeting of the Council of State was attended by the following members:

Dr Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida
Dr Francisco Pinto Balsemao
Pamplona Corte Real
Dr Joao Bosco Mota Amaral
Dr Alberto Joao Jardim
Engineer Alfredo Nobre da Costa
Lt Col Ernesto Melo Antunes
Prof Henrique de Barros
Prof Jorge Figueiredo Dias
Dr Miguel Galvao Teles
Prof Carlos da Mota Pinto
Dr Mario Soares
Dr Alvaro Cunhal
Dr Nuno Rodrigues dos Santos

Prof Diogo Freitas do Amaral did not attend the meeting, but he gave notification of his absence in advance to the president of the republic.

At its meeting today, the Council of State only dealt with the issue of its standing rules, and entrusted Dr Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida, Dr Miguel Galvao Teles and Prof Carlos da Mota Pinto with the task of drawing up a draft of the said standing rules.

BALSEMAO: PARLIAMENT'S DISSOLUTION NOT FORESEEN

LD301338 Lisbon in Portuguese to Africa 1200 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] Outgoing Prime Minister Francisco Pinto Balsemao has said that he did not expect Prof Freitas do Amaral's stand last night to lead to the dissolution of Parliament. Commenting on Freitas do Amaral's resignation from the chairmanship of the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS], Pinto Balsemao said that it will still be possible to find a solution or agreement at the meeting of the Democratic Alliance planned for today. In this case, Balsemao stressed there will not be any reason for early parliamentary elections.

GOVERNMENT RESIGNS; SORSA TO FORM NEW CABINET

NC201355 Paris AFP in English 1327 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] Helsinki, Dec 30 (AFP) -- The Finnish centre-left coalition government of Social Democrat Prime Minister Kalevi Sorsa submitted its resignation to President Mauno Koivisto today. The president accepted the resignation and asked the 52-year old Mr. Sorsa to form a new centre-left government without the Communists who sparked the Cabinet crisis yesterday by voting against the government's defence budget in Parliament. After his talks with the president, Mr. Sorsa said he hoped to form the new cabinet as early as tonight, and the new government might be appointed officially tomorrow.

SWEDEN

NAVY 'CONVINCED' OF SUB'S PRESENCE IN OCTOBER

NC291743 Paris AFP in English 1738 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] Stockholm, Dec 29 (AFP) -- The Swedish Navy is now convinced that one or more foreign submarines were present last October in waters near the secret navy base on Musko Island, south of Stockholm, a Navy spokesman said today. This opinion was based on photographs taken at the time which showed the "imprint" of a submarine on the floor of the Baltic Sea. The spokesman did not indicate the number of unknown intruders. But the Swedish press agency TT said two or three submarines "of a very special type" were present.

The photos were being examined but will not be published, the spokesman said. It said that during the hunt near Musko for the intruders Swedish Navy commanders on October 7 ordered a mine telecommand post "to close down" for three hours, during which time a submarine escaped. Citing sources close to the Swedish military command, TT said it did not know if the post was closed to let the intruder escape or if it was a mistake. A Defense Department spokesman said he knew the station had been temporarily ordered not to activate mines, but he refused further comment.

Also, a request on October 7 from a helicopter to take action against a submarine it had spotted by hydrophone was not granted by the military command, TT said.

Observers noted that Social Democrat Olof Palme took office on October 7, at which time political sources in Stockholm were concerned the "submarine" affair was about to become an international incident. From October 8 on, military sources spoke more and more frequently about a possible escape by the submarine, and the search slowed down.

Parliamentary and military investigating committees were expected to have their reports on the incident ready by March 1983. Naval authorities were already certain that "at least one" submarine had left characteristic traces about 20 metres (yards) long near Musko in October. Since then the Swedish Coast Guard has noted no new incursion, a reliable source said.

While the nationality of the submarines has not been determined, the press wrote this week about a Christmas "fishing expedition" in which Soviet diplomats posted in Stockholm brought home a catch of 25 kgs (55 pounds) from waters near the Musko base. Their fishing party was watched by Swedish security police.

Last Friday, two Soviet diplomats were called personna non grata in Sweden for having carried out espionage.

POSTPONEMENT OF TALKS UNTIL FEBRUARY LIKELY

NC300936 Nicosia O KIRIKAS in Greek 30 Dec 82 p 1

[Text] According to authoritative reports learned by O KIRIKAS last evening from diplomatic sources, no talks will be held before the presidential elections. The sources also consider it very doubtful whether the secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi, who chairs the meetings of the intercommunal talks in "Ledra Palace," will return to Cyprus.

When asked yesterday when Gobbi would return, the government spokesman replied that the return to Cyprus of the secretary general's special representative would be delayed and that the date for the resumption of the talks would be set in consultation with the two interlocutors.

It is recalled that the talks were suspended on 8 December and were to resume next Tuesday, 4 January. After the suspension of the talks, Gobbi left for his country to celebrate Christmas and the New Year and was expected to return to Cyprus before Tuesday.

Authoritative political circles told O KIRIKAS that the talks may not be resumed prior to 13 February, when the presidential elections will be held. This, they added, is favored by the Kiprianou government, which fears that the possible resumption of the dialogue will harm it, given the fact that no progress has been made on any point in the talks, something that has been noted by all sides, especially by the Greek Government, which in fact has asked for the suspension of the dialogue as it is currently conducted.

The same circles think if doubtful, if not impossible, that Gobbi will return as the secretary general's special representative in Cyprus because Gobbi has repeatedly expressed -- in private meetings -- his desire to be relieved of his duties in Cyprus.

Furthermore, Secretary General Perez de Cuellar is entrusting him with the role of chief of the international organization's investigatory committee on human rights in Poland, which makes his task in Cyprus difficult. Perhaps this may be used as an excuse for his departure from Cyprus.

It is expected that the entire issue will be settled in the coming days, when the United Nations will issue a statement.

PRESIDENT DENKTAS VIEWS MISSING PERSONS ISSUE

TA291357 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1115 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] President Denktas has said that the Turkish Cypriot side supported the resumption of the work of the autonomous missing persons committee, but would not accept any changes. The president was replying to a question on a meeting on missing persons held yesterday in southern Cyprus under the chairmanship of the foreign minister of the Greek Cypriot administration, Mr Rolandhis.

President Denktas repeated that it had been the Greek Cypriot side which had left the negotiating table. He added that unless the list of names of the Greek Cypriots who were murdered and buried in mass graves during the Greek Cypriot coup was announced, the missing persons issue could not be solved.

He pointed out that a book published by Mrs (Katsellis) was speaking of Greek Cypriot missing persons a day before the Turkish intervention and was asking the identities of these missing Greek Cypriots. He further pointed out that cemeteries (?preist Father Papasestos) had disclosed that people were buried in the cemetery where he officiated and that they were Turkish and Greek Cypriots whose identities could not be disclosed.

President Denktas said that Mr Kiprianou had told during the summit meeting that he had a list of those buried and he would hand it to President Denktas but such a list had not been delivered.

President Denktas recalled that many writers repeatedly stated that they were many graves where the identities of those buried in them were unknown. He pointed out that statements at gatherings in Athens to the effect that some of the missing persons were still alive were aimed at nothing but propaganda. He stressed that such actions could not contribute to the solution of the missing persons issue.

President Denktas repeated that the Turkish Cypriot side had been waiting for 4 years for a list of those thousands of people buried without the disclosure of their identities during the Greek Cypriot coup and (?before) the Turkish intervention. He stressed that no progress could be expected from negotiations unless these lists were produced and called on Mr Kiprianou to produce them as promised.

TURKISH CYPRIOT LEGISLATURE APPROVES 1983 BUDGET

TA301015 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 30 Dec 82

[Text] The budget of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus for fiscal 1983 has been approved by the Legislative Assembly at 17.76 billion Turkish lira. The new budget will go into effect on 1 January 1983.

In a speech following the approval of the budget, Prime Minister Mustafa Cagatay expressed the hope that the budget would be auspicious to the people and to the Turkish Federated State. He said that the Federated State had covered long distances in a short time in its struggle for self-sufficiency. He explained that the ratio of local revenues in the budget expenditures was 19.6 percent in 1975, while it rose to 50 percent in November 1982. He went on to say that in the 1983 budget, investments and transfer payments constituted 52.88 percent, and that measures were taken to increase the purchasing power of the population.

He added: The most significant characteristic of our new budget, which was prepared in accordance with our economic requisites, is the role played by the production-oriented investment projects and the weight given to the transfer payments that aim at social improvements and economic growth. We were careful to ensure that the budget helped eliminate economic bottlenecks, envisaged production-oriented investments and gave priority to social investments and expenditures. The prime minister announced that a central bank and a development bank would be established in 1983.

NEW 'WORKING PEOPLE'S PARTY' ESTABLISHED

TA291601 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 1530 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] Following the establishment some time ago of a new party called the Nationalist Turkish Party, another new party called "the Working People's Party" [Calisan Halkin Partisi] has been established. A statement issued by the administrative council states that the major difference that will set this party apart from the others will be, to defend the interests of the toiling masses (?in words and deeds) under all conditions and to ensure democracy within the party. The statement adds that it will secure the independence, sovereignty and nonalignment of Cyprus and its territorial integrity purged from bases, and therefore will be opposed to enosis and division. The party statement expressed the belief that a federal republican system would be the best solution. The statement says that the party aims at a government favoring the toiling people in the short term and that its ultimate goal is a socialist administration.

As can be recalled, it had been announced some time ago that activities were underway to establish a third party called "the Country Party." When these three parties begin their official activities, the number of political parties in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus will reach 10.

SPOKESMAN RESPONDS TO TURKISH REMARKS ON AEGEAN

[Text] The Greek Government spokesman commented on a statement by Turkish Foreign Ministry spokesman Akiman in connection with Greece's position toward the Law of the Sea Convention stating the following: Turkey has not signed the Law of the Sea Convention and has no right to cite it. Maroudhas stressed: We would have no objection, when Turkey signs the treaty, to implementing it in the Aegean in the strictest of ways.

I KATHIMERINI VIEWS GOVERNMENT TACTICS ON BASES

NC291912 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 29 Dec 82 pp 1, 3

[Text] Right now the Greek Government appears determined to sign -- barring unforeseen events -- the new Greek-U.S. agreement on the bases and to hasten the elimination of our country's outstanding issues with the Atlantic alliance. At least this is what emerges from a number of indications in government maneuvers in both the foreign and domestic policy areas. According to these indications, the government's basic goal is to limit the "outstanding foreign policy issues," having realized that the major problem our country faces at this time is the dispute with Turkey. This is a problem which, as the prime minister recently admitted during his visit to Limnos, determines the other outstanding issues within the complex of our relations with the Atlantic alliance and the United States. In this connection, it has been noted that the government's reasoning has been formed under the perspective that:

1. The difference with Turkey is difficult to solve and will last a long time.

2. It is easier to bring to an auspicious end -- actually, in a relatively short time -- outstanding issues with the United States and NATO.

3. The way these three outstanding issues influence one another obviously makes Greek foreign policy maneuvers difficult, which consequently should close the "open fronts" whenever this is possible, and in this specific instance, those within the framework of its relations with the West.

In this spirit, politicians do not preclude the possibility that the government's recent overtures to the left (recognition of national resistance, repatriation of political refugees) aim at preparing the ground so that the signing of the agreements for the bases and NATO should appear as "politically balanced" actions in the field of domestic policy. More specifically, developments in the bases issue appear as follows:

Immediately after the holidays, specifically in the middle of January, the third and more substantive round will begin, given the fact that the talks will center on the "appendices," which include many U.S. demands concerning the bases' operations and the range of their activity. Diplomatic circles note that during this stage, the most basic objective of the Greek-U.S. negotiations will be the timetable for the withdrawal of the bases from our country. This is an issue the prime minister will inevitably put forth in view of the commitments his statements before and after the elections have created for him. Nevertheless, the same circles claim that although linked with the settlement of an issue which is unpleasant for the U.S. side, such as the issue of the withdrawal of the bases, the timetable does not seem to predetermine a rift between the two sides, because according to some indications, it is foreseen that, despite the opposition manifested in the first stages of the talks, viewpoints will coincide toward a solution which will both satisfy the U.S. side and will not expose the Greek Socialist government -- because this is what the issue is about.

For instance, such a solution will be that the Greek-U.S. defense agreement will be valid for a specific period, after the expiration of which the bases will be withdrawn. However, it will be up to the discretion of the government at the time to decide otherwise -- that is, not to expel the bases -- on condition, however, that it will have the right to review certain conditions of the agreement, provided it considers this necessary, for their further stay.

However, even if the Greek-Turkish dispute and its predicted prolongation constitute a negative element in our country's negotiating position with the United States, the Greek side nevertheless does not seem to lack some advantages which the United States understandably takes into consideration in formulating its policy and consequently during the Greek-U.S. talks.

First, although Turkey may be armed by the West and constitute the "block" of U.S. interests in the broader Middle East area, our country has an enhanced geographical importance in case advanced "U.S. outposts" in the Middle East weaken for one reason or another.

Second, Greece dominates in the Mediterranean area with Crete as its point, while on the other hand, the United States in no way appears prepared to "break" the "defense continuity" reaching from the end of the Iberian Peninsula to Turkey.

After all, it is based on these facts that government optimism predicts that the U.S. side will agree to pay certain economic and other exchanges of value for our country.

KKE CONGRESS SENDS GREETINGS TO CYPRIOT PEOPLE

NC292004 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 29 Dec 82 p 3

[Message addressed to the Cypriot people by the 11th KKE Congress]

[Text] In the name of its members and followers, the delegates to the 11th KKE Congress sent to the long-suffering Cypriot people a warm brotherly greeting accompanied by sentiments of brotherly friendship and militant solidarity together with the assurance of unshakeable support in their just liberation struggle for a united, integral, independent, nonaligned and demilitarized Cyprus.

Eight years have passed with 37 percent of Cypriot territory occupied by the Turkish chauvinists and stratocrats, with the continuing plight of 200,000 refugees and with mortal dangers to the liberty and existence of the Republic of Cyprus. They were 8 years of incessant plots by U.S.-NATO imperialism in its efforts to enslave and turn the martyred island into an aggressive attack base against the neighboring Arab people and the socialist countries.

Our struggle is a joint struggle against the aggressive and divisionist aspirations of U.S. imperialism, the Turkish junta and its organs in Greece and Cyprus.

Despite the great difficulties raised by the Cypriot people's enemies, we can look to its victorious outcome with optimism. A guarantee for this is to be found in the strengthening of unity between the Cypriot patriotic and democratic forces. A guarantee for this lies in the firm solidarity with and support of democratic humanity by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries in the vanguard.

The 11th KKE Congress proclaimed our party's determination to continue and strengthen its efforts in behalf of the active support of the Greek people and government for a solution of the Cyprus issue based on the UN resolutions, for convening an international conference with the UN framework and for opening the dossier of treason.

We are certain that with our unified struggle and with the support of progressive humanity, there will be better days for martyred Cyprus and its heroic people.

December 1982.

[Signed] The 11th KKE Congress Presidium.

Greets Palestinians, Lebanese

NC291954 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 29 Dec 82 p 3

[Message of the 11th KKE Congress to "The Heroic Fighters and the Entire Palestinian Nation and to the Democratic Forces and the Long-Suffering People of Lebanon"]

[Text] The delegates to the 11th KKE Congress, expressing the will of all the Communists and working people of Greece, send you a warm brotherly greeting.

The Greek people followed with emotion and admiration your heroic struggle to repulse the unjust and inhuman attack by Israel, which was the logical sequel to the Camp David agreements. They raised a strong voice of protest and determinedly condemned the criminals and the organizer of the attack, U.S. imperialism. They expressed their solidarity with you and with the countless victims of the crimes in many different ways. At the same time, they differentiated between the Begin government and the Israeli patriotic forces which opposed its criminal plans.

The Greek people are a staunch ally in your struggle against imperialism. We have the same enemy. Your own struggles in defense of the ancestral land and for winning the right to have a fatherland are closely related with our own struggle for national independence and for the removal of the U.S. bases and nuclear weapons from Greece, in order to make the Mediterranean a sea of peace.

We assure you that we will continue and stand by your side. We shall continue to struggle for the resotration of peace in Lebanon and in the entire area. We support the struggle of the PLO, the sole legal representative of the Palestinian people, for the creation of an independent Palestinian state.

Long live the heroic people of Palestine!
Long live the democratic forces of Lebanon!
Peace for the east Mediterranean and the Near and Middle East!

December 1982. [Signed] the 11th KKE Congress Presidium.

BRIEFS

FLOUR EXPORTS PLANNED -- The first agreement scheduling the export of 350,000 tons of flour to Africa, the Middle East and the Soviet Union was signed today between National Economy Minister Yerasimos Arsenis and representatives of 65 Greek flour industries. The conclusion of this agreement secures employment for 10,000 people working in the flour industry, the flow of $100 million in foreign exchange and the saving of $30 million from the import of animal fodder. [Excerpt] [Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1700 GMT 23 Dec 82 NC]

NEW OIL DEPOSITS -- The oil boring at the Gulf of Kavala has uncovered two new oil deposits. An important zone with oil has been located by boring machine Votengo III at a depth of 2,300 meters. This zone is bigger than that of Prinos. The burning tests have been successful for one of the two deposits. According to experts of the northern Aegean oil firm, 25,000 to 30,000 barrels will be pumped everyday, although this quantity may be still higher. ARMENIAN GROUP TARGETS TURKISH CONCERNS

[Text] A printed announcement signed by the "Armenian Liberation Army (ASALA)" and sent to the Greek media reads as follows:

"All Turkish institutions and offices throughout the world are henceforth considered military targets of the Armenian Liberation Army. This includes airline offices, ships, business concerns, cultural centers and hundreds of other establishments. We warn citizens to stay clear of such places which we consider as enemy targets."

In the announcement, signed ASALA, December 25, mention is made of one of the movement's members alleged murdered near the Beirut harbor in an ambush by Turkish secret agents. Another member was seriously wounded in the same incident.

PROTOCOL SIGNED WITH PAKISTAN IN ANKARA

TA291500 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 29 Dec 82

[Text] The Turkish-Pakistani joint economic committee meeting that began in Ankara on Monday has ended. A protocol in connection with the decisions made at the meeting has been signed by Minister of State Sermet Refik Pasin and Pakistani Minister of Finance, Commerce, Planning and Provincial Cooperation Ghulam Ishaq Khan. The protocol envisages the further increase in the trade between the two countries. To achieve this goal, the businessmen and industrialists of the two countries will increase mutual visits and Turkey will open an exports goods fair in Karachi at the beginning of next year. The protocol also envisages joint steps to be taken by Turkey and Pakistan in the tractor and automotive industry, agricultural machines and equipment, glass, electrical and electronic industry. The protocol also stipulates that the Turkish scientific and technical research organization will extend aid to Pakistan through training programs in the fields of agriculture, livestock breeding, health, nutrition, chemistry, electronics, solar energy and environmental issues.

A draft agreement on the joint establishment of an engineering and consulting firm was also signed at the joint economic committee meeting. The firm in question will be established after the agreement is ratified by the governments of the two countries. The issue of preparing an agreement that will prevent double taxation, taking into consideration the increasing economic relations between the two countries and joint trade efforts, was also discussed at the meeting. The next meeting of the joint economic committee is to be held in Pakistan next year. Pasin said the following at the signing ceremony:

[Begin Pasin recording] I am convinced that the protocol that we have signed will yield very beneficial results for both countries. The economic relations between the two countries are not very developed. However, from now on as a result of the great efforts to be exerted by the two countries, the economic relations will increase and the commercial ties will reach a higher level. [end recording]

Ishaq Khan said that the protocol is a significant step in the efforts exerted to develop the trade between the two countries. He added that from now on [words indistinct]. Ishaq Khan also met with Minister of Energy and Natural Resources Fahir Ilkel and Minister of Industry and Technology Mehmet Turgut. He will leave Turkey on Friday.

ACTION TO CUT U.S. BUDGET DEFICIT URGED

PM300915 London DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 30 Dec 82 p 12

[Editorial: "Cut the Deficit"]

[Text] The state of the American economy is, at one and the same time, cause for considerable depression and restrained optimism. According to reports from Washington, the President's Council of Economic Advisers has warned that growth in 1983 is likely to be less than 2 percent, while budget deficits of over $200 billion annually can be expected for the foreseeable future. It is in this context that yesterday's news of a further half percent cut in the prime lending rate has to be seen. Despite the easing of the monetary reins, which began in the second half of the year when the Federal Reserve Board became seriously worried that continuing high interest rates were becoming a threat to the financial system itself, the real economy has remained chronically weak. If the CEA's forecast proves accurate, the prospects for the rest of the world's economy are bleak. As far as President Reagan is concerned, he faces the nightmare of running for re-election against a backdrop of three successive years of recession. The miracle of economic regeneration via "supply-side" tax cuts, which Mr Reagan offered the voters in 1980, is now only a bitter memory.

What reason, then, is there for any optimism? It lies in the fact that nearly all the President's closest advisers are urging him to take prompt and drastic action to cut the budget deficit by increasing taxes (or deferring tax cuts) and reducing expenditure on defence and social security. If the President was seen to be tackling the deficit, interest rates could fall much further and faster than would otherwise be the case, thus stimulating that elusive recovery. The President has four weeks to heed his advisers before he delivers his State of the Union message to Congress. It is better that he should turn at this late stage than not at all.
